Thus Menelaus got the chief priesthood by outbidding his brother; but being summoned to appear before the king at Antioch, for non-payment of the money, ³ he left Lysimachus, another of his brothers, his deputy in his absence, and, by his means, got many gold vessels out of the temple, which he selling at Tyre, and the cities round about raised money enough, not only to pay the king his tribute, but to bribe Andronicus ⁴ likewise to murder his brother Onias, because he supposed, that at one time or other he might stand in his way, and because he had lately taken the freedom to reprove him sharply for this gross piece of sacrilege.

Andronicus did it to earn the money, but was soon overtaken with justice at Antioch, ^c and Lysimachus ^d cities; and often he would give gold to any person whom he chanced to meet, though an entire stranger; and to another he would make a present of a few dates, or some such trifle. He outdid all his predecessors in the splendour of the games which he celebrated at Daphne in honour of Jupiter Olympius; but his conduct was so ridiculous that the foreigners who were present thought him insane. Yet he was so strict as to exclude all females from the exhibition. He paid little regard to the other gods, but for Jupiter Olympius he built a magnificent temple, made offerings to him at an unprecedented expense, and attempted to compel all his subjects, and the Jews among the rest, to worship him. But without referring to this persecution of the Jewish religion, the other parts of his conduct are amply sufficient to justify the appellation רשע, vile, contemptible, which Daniel gives him.—Jahn's Hebrew Commonwealth.—Ed.

^b This Andronicus seems to have been left by Antiochus at Antioch, to govern in his absence, and without this governor's interposition, Menelaus could not compass his end, to murder his brother; for Onias had fled to the asylum at Daphne, a small distance from the city, which always used to be a place of retreat, secure and inviolable: and therefore Menelaus was forced to give the governor a round sum, to engage him, by false promises of safety, to prevail with his brother to come out, and as soon as he had him in his power, to dispatch him.—Catnel's Commentary.

^c For Onias having, by his laudable carriage, while he lived at Antioch, gained much upon the esteem and affections of the people of the place, Greeks as well as Jews, they took his murder in such high indignation, that they both joined in a petition to the king against Andronicus for it. Hereupon, cognizance being taken of the crime, and the wicked murderer convicted of it, Antiochus caused him, with infamy, to be carried to the place where the murder was committed, and there put to death for it, in such a manner as he deserved. For Antiochus, as wicked a tyrant as he was, had sorrow and regret upon him for the death of so good a man; and, therefore, in the revenging it, he satisfied his own resentments, as well as those of the people who had petitioned him for it.—Prudeau's Connection, anno 172.

^d When it came to be known that Lysimachus had been the chief instrument in robbing the temple, the multitude, fired with indignation, gathered themselves together against him, and though he attempted to form a party, under the command of one Tyrannus, an old experienced officer, in order to resist their slain by the people of Jerusalem; yet such was the power of bribery at the Syrian court, that by the strength of this Menelaus, who was the contriver of all these mischiefs, found means to clear himself before Antiochus, and to get the three delegates from the sanhedrin, who came from Jerusalem on purpose to accuse him, condemned and executed.

While Antiochus was engaged in war with Egypt, a false rumour was spread in Palestine that he was dead; and Jason thinking this a fine opportunity for him to recover his station in Jerusalem as high priest, marched thither with above a thousand men; and having, by the assistance of the party which he had there, taken the city, and driven Menelaus into the castle, he acted all manner of cruelties upon his fellow-citizens, and put to death, without mercy, all that he could light on, whom he took to be his adversaries.

Antiochus, hearing of this, and supposing that the whole Jewish nation had revolted from him, marched with all haste out of Egypt into Judea; and¹ being informed, on his march, that the people of Jerusalem, on the news which came of his death, had made great rejoicings; the sense of this so provoked him against them, that laying siege to the city, and taking it by storm, he slew of the inhabitants, in three days' time, 40,000 persons, and having taken as many more captives, sold them to the neighbouring nations.

Nor did all this satisfy his rage; for, notwithstanding his father's edict, he forced himself into the temple,² and rage, and defend himself; yet the mob fell on them with such fury, that wounding some, and killing others, they forced the rest to flee; and then seizing upon Lysimachus, him they slew beside the treasury within the temple, and thereby, for that time, put an end to this sacrilege.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 172.

a Both the author of the second book of the Maccabees, (chap. v. 11.) and Diodorus Siculus, (b. xlvi.) tell us, that Antiochus took Jerusalem by force; and yet Josephus (in his 12th book of Antiquities, c. 7.) affirms, that he made himself master of it without any manner of difficulty, because the gates were set open to him by the treachery of a party he made in the town: but herein he is contrary to himself. For in his history of the Jewish wars, (b. i. c. 1.) he says, that Antiochus took it κατὰ κράτος, that is, by force; and there represents him as enraged by what he had suffered in the siege; and in the same history, (b. vi. c. 11.) he speaks of those who were slain at the siege, fighting in defence of the place. But the history of the Jewish wars, and that of his Antiquities, he wrote at different times, which might make him, in some places, not so consistent.—Prideaux's Connection.

b Several heathen authors, in their account of their king Antiochus, make mention of his taking a city, that was at peace and in alliance with him, meaning thereby Jerusalem, committing many cruelties there, and plundering the temple, wherein he found great riches; but Diodorus Siculus, in his relation of this matter, (b. xxxiv.) is more particular and express.—“That this prince having intruded into the most sacred place of the temple, which none but the high priest was permitted to enter, found there a stone statue of a man with a long beard, and a book in his hand, mounted upon an ass. This he took for Moses, the author of the law, and founder of the nation of the Jews, and of the city of Jerusalem; and, therefore, to remove the cause of that universal hatred which all nations bore to the Jews, he went about abolishing of their law; and, to this purpose, caused a large sow to be sacrificed to this image of their legislator, on an altar which he found there; and, having sprinkled the blood and the broth that he made of the victim, and therewith polluted the sacred volume of their law, he made the high priest, and other Jews, eat of its flesh, and put out the lamp which used to be kept perpetual-polluted, by his presence, both the holy place, and the holy of holies. He sacrificed a great sow upon the altar of burnt-offerings, and caused the broth (which was made of some part of the flesh) to be sprinkled all over the temple, that he might defile it as much as possible. He took away the altar of incense, the showbread table, the candlestick of seven branches, and several other golden vessels, utensils, and donatives of former kings, to the value of 800 talents of gold; and making the like plunder in the city, he returned to Antioch,² leaving behind him Philip a Phrygian, a man of a cruel and barbarous temper, to be governor of Judea; and Andronicus, another of the like disposition, to be governor of Samaria; and Menelaus, who was worse than all the rest, to continue still over them in the office of high priest.

Not long after this,³ there were seen at Jerusalem, for forty days together, strange sights in the air of horsemen and footmen, armed with shields, spears, and swords, and in great companies fighting against, and charging each other, as in battle array; which foreboded those calamities of war and desolation that soon after happened in that city and nation. For Antiochus, still breathing out rage against the poor Jews, sent Apollonius, one of his generals, with an army of 22,000 men, and an express order to kill all the men that remained in Jerusalem, and to sell the women and children for slaves. On his first arrival, Apollonius, carried himself peaceably, concealing his intent, and forbearing all hostilities, till the return of the sabbath, when he put his bloody commission in execution. For, falling upon the city while the people were at their devotion, he massacred many of the inhabitants, plundered the place, led away the women and children captives, and forced the few that escaped to betake themselves to deserts and caves for shelter. Nor was this all; for in a short time after Antiochus made a decree, commanding all nations to leave their ancient rites and usages, and to conform to the religion of the king; which, however expressed in general terms, was chiefly designed against the Jews.

⁶ The officer who was sent to see this decree put in execution, was one Athenæus, a man well versed in all the ceremonies of the Grecian idolatry, and therefore thought a proper person to initiate the people into the observance of them. On his coming to Jerusalem,⁷ all sacrifices to the God of Israel were superseded, and the rites of the Jewish religion suppressed. The temple itself was dedicated to Jupiter Olympius,^c (whose image ly burning.⁷ But several of these circumstances, (more especially that of a man mounted on an ass,) are nowhere to be found in any other history; and may therefore, not improperly, be placed among those fables, which the heathens invented and published, on purpose to give some colour for their inveterate hatred against the Jews.—Calmet's Commentary on 1 Mac. i. 23.

c This profanation of the temple, and the erecting of this idol in it, had long before been foretold by the prophet Daniel, under the name of ‘abomination of desolation,’ chap. xi. 31. For this is the description which he gives of the reign of Antiochus, and the bitter persecutions which he raised: ‘He shall return with indignation against the holy covenant, and have intelligence with them that forsake it. Armies shall stand on his side, and he shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and there place the abomination, or abominable was set up on the altar of burnt-offerings,) and all the people, upon pain of death, were obliged to sacrifice to it. Those who met in caves to keep the sabbath, if they happened to be discovered, were burned. The book of the law was torn and cast into the fire; the circumcising of infants was forbidden; and women accused of having circumcised their children, were led about the streets with those children hanging about their necks, and then both cast headlong over the steepest part of the walls.

No less severity was used to enforce upon the people the heathen worship, which the decree enjoined, than there was to deter them from their own. In every city, altars, groves, and chapels, for idols were set up, and officers sent to compel them, once every month, to offer victims to the Grecian gods, and to eat of the flesh of swine, and of other unclean beasts, that were at that time sacrificed. In short, no manner of cruelty was omitted to force the Jews to abandon their religion, and turn idolaters; but though, in this terrible persecution, some of these wretched people yielded to violence, many of them chose rather to die, than to forsake the law of their God.

Among the latter sort, ¹ those of the most memorable note were a Eleazar, a chief doctor of the law, and that heroine Solomona, and her seven sons. Eleazar was a very aged man; yet, when his persecutors would thing, that maketh desolate, or (as in the margin) quite astonisheth. Such as do wickedly against the covenant, shall he corrupt by flatteries, but the people that know their God, shall do great exploits; and they that have understanding, shall instruct many; yet they shall fall by the sword, by famine, by captivity, and by spoil; and the king shall do according to his will, and shall exalt and magnify himself above every God. He shall speak wonderful things against the God of gods, and shall prosper, till the indignation be accomplished; for that which is determined shall be done, ver. 30.

a Some interpreters are of opinion, that this was the same Eleazar, who, at the head of the seventy-two interpreters that were to translate the Sacred Scriptures, was sent into Egypt, and that he suffered at Jerusalem, in the presence of the governor named Felix; but Rufinus (in his Latin paraphrase on the book of Josephus, concerning the Maccabees) will needs have it, that not only Eleazar, but the mother and her seven sons, namely, Maccabeus, Aber, Machir, Jadas, Ahas, Areth, and Jacob, (for these are the names which he gives them,) were all carried from Judea to Antioch, and there suffered martyrdom. The reason of the thing, however, as well as the tenor of the history, which is given us by the author of the second book of Maccabees, chap. vi. and vii. and by Josephus in the above-mentioned book, made it much more likely, that Jerusalem, and not Antioch, was made the scene of this cruelty; especially since it being designed for an example of terror to the Jews in Judea, it would have lost its force had it been executed in any other country. But wherever this happened, it is certain that Eleazar deserved all the commendation which the fathers have given him: for, whether we consider the purity of his sentiments or the sublimity of his doctrine, or the delicacy of his conscience, we must acknowledge, that there are few saints in the Old Testament that have given us a more exact pattern of charity, sincerity, and magnanimity. 'It becometh not our age,' saith he, 'in any wise to dissemble, whereby many young persons might think, that Eleazar being fourscore years old and ten, was now gone to a strange religion, and so they, through my hypocrisy, and desire to live a little time, and a moment longer, should be deceived by me, and I get a stain in my old age, and make it abominable. For though, for the present time, I should be delivered from the punishment of men, yet should not I escape the hand of the Almighty, neither alive nor dead: wherefore now, manfully changing his life, I will show myself such a one, as my age requireth,' 2 Mac. vi. 24, &c.—Calmel's Commentary, and Prideaux's Connection, anno 167.

have compelled him to eat swine's flesh, which they forced into his mouth, he spit it out, and even when some, in pity to his age, would have given him leave to elude the sentence, by taking a piece of any other flesh and eating it as swine's flesh, he scorned to purchase his life at so sordid a rate, desiring them to dispatch him, rather than suffer him to be guilty of dissimulation, and stain the honour of his grey hairs with so mean an act. Nor were the seven brothers and their mother inferior to him in religious courage and magnanimity: for when the king, pretending pity to their youth, and respect to their family, which was noble, persuaded them to renounce their religion, and embrace that of the Gentiles, promising them great rewards and promotions, if they would comply; and when finding that this would have no effect, he ordered the great variety of torments, which he had provided, to be shown them, thinking thereby to affright them with the sad prospect of what they were to suffer; the instruments of death did no more terrify, than the allurements of the tyrant did persuade them; but inspired with a truly holy zeal and celestial bravery, "they unanimously declared their obedience to the law of God, and the precepts which he had delivered by Moses; assuring him, that all his cruelty could not hurt them; that the only effect their tortures could have, would be to secure to them the glorious rewards of unshaken patience and injured virtue; but, at the same time, admonishing him, that, by the murder of so many innocent men, he would arm the divine vengeance against him, and for the momentary pains which he inflicted on them, would himself become obnoxious to everlasting torments."

This is the main purport of most of their speeches; but the variety of their tortures was almost innumerable, and for the horror of them inexpressible. All this while their mother stood by, beholding their sufferings, and exhorting every one, as it came to his turn, to behave gallantly. At length when herself was only left, and the soldiers were approaching to carry her to execution, she prevented their rage, and all attempts upon her person, by throwing herself voluntarily into the fire.^b Thus ended this doleful, but glorious day, with the death of the victorious Solomona, who triumphed in the sharpest agonies of her sons, and her own sufferings, and through a sea of the most exquisite pains, waded to the port of eternal rest!

While this persecution raged at Jerusalem, ² Mattathias, the son of John, the son of Simeon, the son of Asmonaeus, from whom the family had the name of Asmonaeans, a priest of the course of Joarib,^c with his five

b The Latin version says, that she was dragged on the ground to execution, where having cut off her breasts, and scourging her naked body, they flung her into a boiling caldron: but the Arabic version, on the contrary, confirms, that, having lived to see her seven sons martyred, and lying dead on the ground before her, she flung herself into the midst of them, and praying to God to take her out of the world, immediately expired.—Universal History, b. ii. c. 11.

c This was the first of the twenty-four courses of the priests that served in the temple, (1 Chron. xxiv. 7) and because Mattathias undertook to determine for the necessity of fighting on the sabbath, in case they were assaulted by the enemy, some have from hence inferred, that the people had made choice of him for their high priest: but, besides that, this decision is not sufficient to prove this, and that it no where appears, that he ever performed sions, John, Simeon, Judas, Eleazar, and Jonathan, retired to Modin, a little place in the tribe of Dan, and there bemoaned the hard fate of their religion and country. But they had not been long in this retreat, before Antiochus sent one of his military officers, named Apelles, to put his decree in execution.

Apelles having called the people together, and told them the intent of his coming, addressed himself more particularly to Mattathias; persuading him to comply with the king's commands, that, by his example, he might influence others; and promising him withal, that in case he would do so, he should be taken into the number of the king's friends, and promoted to great honour and riches. But to this Mattathias made answer, with a loud voice, and in the audience of all the people, that no consideration whatever should ever induce him, or any of his family, to forsake the law of their God; that the examples of those who had apostatized, were no rule to him, nor the commandments of the greatest monarch of any validity, when they were sent to oblige him to embrace idolatry: and with these words, seeing a Jew of the place presenting himself at the heathen altar, in order to offer sacrifice according to the king's injunctions, he ran up to the apostate, and, with a zeal like that of Phineas, slew him with his own hand; and then turning upon the king's commissioner, by the assistance of his sons, and those that were with them, dispatched him likewise, and all that attended him.

After this, Mattathias overturned the altars, and pulled down the idols that were in the place; and, having got together his own family, and invited all that were zealous for the law, to follow him, he retired to the mountains, in order to make there the best defence he could: but the Jews ^a had one principle, which, in the the office of high priest, but only put himself at the head of a poor distressed people, as being a person of the greatest power and authority among them. It is certain, that both Menelaus and Alcimus were then alive; and though they were wicked men, and intruders into the office, yet they were nominated by king Antiochus, who then assumed the right of nomination, and so were looked upon as high priests.—Calmet's Dictionary, under the word Mattathias.

^a By the law of Moses, the Jews were commanded 'to do no manner of work on the sabbath day;' but this was a precept which would admit of some exceptions, and what some people took in a more rigorous sense than others. The Samaritans, for instance, thought themselves obliged to observe it to such a degree of strictness, as not to stir out of their places on that day, because the law is literally so expressed. (Exod. xvi. 29:) but the Jews were of opinion, that they were permitted to make their escape from danger, or to walk such a compass of ground, which they called a 'sabbath day's journey,' if it were for any necessary occasion on that day. In our Saviour's time, it was allowable, they thought, to pull any animal out of a pit, or a ditch, on that day, (Mat. xii. 11:); but the Talmudical doctors were for revoking that permission, and found fault with him for even healing the sick and the lame, on the sabbath. Mattathias, and his company, by sundry experiences, were convinced, that too scrupulous an observance of the sabbath had brought several calamities upon their nation; that Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, the first king of Egypt of that name, by assaulting Jerusalem on the sabbath day, (wherein the Jews would do nothing to defend themselves,) became master of it without opposition; and that, but just lately, a great number of their brethren had been passively slain, because they would not so much as handle their arms on that day; and thereupon they came to a resolution to defend themselves, whenever they were attacked, be the day what it would; but we do not find that they came to any decision, whether they themselves were to attack the enemy on the sabbath. On the contrary, it seems as if they had determined, that beginning of this resistance, had like to have ruined them quite, and that was the scrupulous observation of the sabbath, even to such a degree, as not to defend themselves on that day; whereof their enemies taking the advantage, destroyed great numbers of them, without their making the least opposition. Mattathias however and his followers, finding the fatality of their mistake in this particular, ¹ made a decree, (which was confirmed by the unanimous consent of all the priests and elders among them,) that, whenever they were attacked on the sabbath day, it was lawful for them to fight for their lives, and to defend themselves in the best manner they could, which afterwards became a general rule in all their wars.

While Mattathias abode in the mountains, great multitudes of Jews, who had any true concern for their holy religion, came, and joined him; and, among these, there was a good company of Assideans, ^b men mighty in valour, and extremely zealous for the law; so that, when he had got together such a number, as made the appearance of a small army, ² he came out of his fastnesses, and, going round the cities of Judah, pulled down the heathen altars; re-established the true worship; caused the children to be circumcised; cut off all apostates, that fell in his way; and destroyed all persecutors, wherever he came. Having thus acted the part of a brave and prudent general, for the small time he had the command of his little army, Mattathias was they were only permitted to repel force by force; and therefore we read, that, when Pompey besieged the temple, observing that the Jews did barely defend themselves on the seventh day, he ordered his men to offer no hostilities, but only to raise the batteries, plant their engines, and make their approaches on that day, being well assured, that in doing of this, he should meet with no molestation from them; and, by this means, he carried the place much sooner, than he otherwise would have done.—Jewish Antiq. b. xiv. c. 8; Jewish Wars, b. i. c. 5; and Calmet's Commentary on 1 Mac. ii. 14.

^b When the Jewish church came to be settled again in Judea, after the return of the Babylonish captivity, there were two sorts of men among the members of it; the one, who contented themselves with that only, which was written in the law of Moses, and these were called zadikim, that is, the righteous; and the other, who, over and above the law, added the constitutions and traditions of the elders, and, by way of supererogation, devoted themselves to many rigorous observances; and these being reckoned in a degree of holiness, above the others, were called chasidim, that is, the pious. From the former of these were derived the sects of the Samaritans, Sadducees, and Karaites, and from the latter the Pharisees, the Essenes, and Assideans. These Assideans, or Chasidians, rather, as they should be written, were a kind of religious society, whose chief and distinguishing character was, to maintain the honour of the temple; and therefore they were not only content to pay the usual tribute for the reparation of it, but charged themselves with farther expenses upon that account; for every day, except that of the great expiation, they sacrificed a lamb, besides those of daily oblation, which was called the 'sin-offering of the Assideans.' They practised greater hardships and mortifications than the rest, and their common oath was by the temple, for which our Saviour reproves the Pharisees, (Mat. xxiii. 16. who had learned that oath of them. Mattathias, however, being joined by men of this principle, who made it one of the main points of their piety to fight zealously for the defence of the temple, which was then fallen into the hands of the heathen, was not a little strengthened in his party, and in some measure able to take the field.—Scaliger, in Elench. Tr. heresii, &c.; Prideaux's Connection, anno 197; and Calmet's Commentary.

forced at last to submit to the weight of 146 years; but before his death,¹ he called his five sons together, and, having exhorted^a them to stand up valiantly for the law of God, and, with a steady courage and constancy, to fight the battles of Israel against the present persecutors, he appointed Judas to be their captain in his stead, and Simeon to be their counsellor; and so, giving up the ghost, he was buried at Modin, in the sepulchres of his forefathers, and all the faithful in Israel made great lamentation for him.^b

^a The speech which Josephus puts in the mouth of old Mattathias upon this occasion, is widely different from what we find in 1 Mac. ii. 49, &c., but not undeserving of our observation. "My dear sons," says he, "my life is drawing to an end; but I am to charge you, upon my blessing, before I leave you, that you stand firm to the cause that your father has asserted before you without any staggering or shrinking. Remember what I have told you, and do as I have advised you. Do your utmost to support the rights and laws of your country, and to restore the order of a nation that wants but very little of being swallowed up in confusion. Have nothing to do with those that, either for fear or for interest, have betrayed it. Show yourselves to be sons worthy of such a father; and, in contempt of all force and extremity, carry your lives in your hands, and deliver them up with comfort, if any occasion should require it, in defence of your country; computing with yourselves, that this is the way to preserve yourselves in God's favour, and that, in consideration of so unshaken a virtue, he will in time restore you to the liberty of your former life and manners. Our bodies, it is true, are mortal; but great and generous actions will make us immortal in our memory; and that is the glory I would that you aspire to, that is to say, the glory of making the history of your lives famous to after ages by your illustrious actions." The rest of his speech agrees with what we find in the book of Mattathias, wherein he distributes to each son the office that he knew him best qualified for; and then concludes, "Do but mind your business, and depend upon it, that all men of honour and piety will join with you."—Jewish Antiq. b. xii. c. 8.

^b Why Judas and his successors were called Maccabees is uncertain. The book from which this epithet is derived, being written in Greek, we have no certainty which were the original letters of the word. It might seem, at first sight, to be derived from the Hebrew term maccabeh, a word which signifies hid, as a contemptuous epithet bestowed on them by their adversaries, or their apostate countrymen, because they concealed themselves in caves and rocks; but who having afterwards wiped off that reproach by their bravery, still retained that appellation in memory of their former concealment: or, from the word makkabah, a cavern; and so, they might be called caverners, or those who lurked in caverns. The book itself, which contains the history of Judas and his successors, down to the death of the high priest Simon—a period of forty years,—was originally written in that dialect of the Hebrew which the Jews used after their return from the Babylonish captivity, but of which book we now possess only the Greek version; but by whom the translation was made, or the original composed, is unknown. It is plain, however, that the author of this book has forfeited all title to an honest veracious historian; his exaggerations are so monstrous, and his discrepancies so manifest. I by no means dispute the fact, that a number of faithful Jews stood out against the invaders of their country, and were zealous for the God of their fathers. I as really believe this, as I believe in the existence of Wallace, the hero of Scottish romance. It is the tissue of gross exaggeration which runs through the whole narrative of the Jewish hero's exploits, with which fault is here found. Of this I am firmly persuaded, that no sensible, well-informed man, will ever place such a romantic history as that of the first book of the Maccabees on a level with the historical books of the Old Testament; as the facts there narrated bear internal evidence of their truth, and are perfect sobriety compared with the deeds of a hero, whom his biographer has made, in the same manner as his father had done, destroying every where all utensils and implements of idolatry; slaying all idolaters and apostate Jews; rescuing the true worshippers of God from the hands of their oppressors; and for their better security for the future, fortifying their towns, rebuilding their fortresses, and placing strong garrisons in them. These proceedings gave the Syrian court some umbrage; and therefore Antiochus² ordered Apollonius,^c his governor in Samaria, to raise forces, and go against him; but Judas having defeated and slain him, made a great havoc among his troops, and, finding the governor's sword among the spoils, he took it for his own use, and generally fought with it all his life after. Seron, the deputy governor of some part of Cælo-Syria, hearing of Apollonius's defeat, got together all the forces that were under his command, and, in hopes of gaining himself honour,³ came in pursuit of Judas; but, instead of that, he met with the same fate, being vanquished and slain in the manner that Apollonius was.

Enraged at these two defeats, Antiochus sent three eminent commanders, Ptolemy-Macron, Nicanor, and Gorgias, to manage the war against the Jews; who, with an army of forty thousand foot, and seven thousand horse, together with a great number of auxiliaries from neighbouring nations, and renegado Jews,⁴ came, and encamped at Emmaus,^d not far from Jerusalem. Judas, on the other hand, marched with his men to Mizpeh,^e where, having implored God's merciful assistance in this time of distress, and^f encouraged them in words in the number and splendour of his victories, to exceed all those recorded of a Joshua and a Jephthah, a Barak and a Gideon; with this difference, that, in the former, the Israelites obtained peace and rest in consequence of divine interpositions, whilst, in the latter, such were wholly unavailing, till the growing weakness of the Syrian power, and the frequent political struggles for the crown among the worthless descendants of Seleucus, enabled the Jews gradually to throw off the yoke of their pagan rulers, and secure their independence.—Bell's Rollin, vol. ii. p. 609.—En.

^c This, in all probability, was the same Apollonius whom Antiochus sent at first to plunder Jerusalem, and afterwards to set up the statue of Jupiter Olympius, and to compel the Jews to relinquish their religion.—Calmel's Commentary.

^d This was a village lying to the west of Jerusalem, and between seven and eight miles from it. It was honoured with our Saviour's presence after his resurrection, and therein were hot baths, for Emmaus comes from the Hebrew Chamath, which signifies baths of hot water, that were very beneficial to those that used them.—Calmel's Dictionary under the word.

^e At this time Jerusalem was in the hands of the heathen, and the sanctuary trodden under foot; so that Judas could not assemble his men there to implore the assistance of God in this time of imminent danger; and therefore he repaired to Mizpeh, a place where the people oftentimes used to assemble for prayer, (Jud. xx. 1. 1 Kings xv. 22. 2 Chron. xvi. 6.) Here he and all his army addressed themselves to God, in solemn fasting and prayer, for his assistance and protection; and herein he acted the part of a wise and religious commander, as knowing that the battle was the Lord's, and that therefore it would be impious to begin any such enterprise, without first imploring the divine aid.—Pridcaux's Connection, anno 166.

^f The speech which Judas makes to his men upon this occasion, as we have it in Josephus, is a very excellent one:—"We shall never have," says he, "my fellow soldiers and companions, such an opportunity again of showing our bravery in the defence of our country, and the contempt of all dangers, as we have now proper on such an occasion to fight for their religion, laws, and liberties, with a courage undaunted, and, as the cause was God's, with a firm assurance of success, he led them forth to the engagement. But, having first caused proclamation¹ to be made, that all such as had that year built houses, planted vineyards, betrothed wives, or were in any degree fearful, should depart, his six thousand men, which he had at first, were reduced to three thousand.

² With this handful of men, however, he was resolved to give the enemy battle. But hearing that Gorgias was detached from them with five thousand foot, and a thousand horse, to surprise his camp by night, he countermined his plot by another of the same kind: for, quitting his own camp, and marching towards the enemy, he fell upon them, while Gorgias with the best of his forces was absent, and put them into such a surprise and confusion, that they took to their heels, and fled, leaving him master of their camp, and three thousand of their men dead upon the spot.

Gorgias, coming to the Jewish camp, found it empty; and concluding from thence, that Judas had fled into the mountains for fear, he pursued him thither; but, when he found him not, and was returning to his own camp, he understood that it had been entered and burned; that the main army was broken and fled; and that Judas was ready in the plains to give him a warm reception. Hereupon he could no longer keep his men together; for, seized with a panic fear, they flung down their arms, and fled: when Judas, putting himself in pursuit of them, slew great numbers more, so that the whole amounted to nine thousand, and of those that escaped from the battle, most were sorely wounded and maimed. Judas,³ with his victorious army, returning from the chase, entered the enemy's camp, where he found plenty of rich plunder; and so proceeding in triumph to Jerusalem, celebrated the next day, which was the Sabbath, with great devotion, rejoicing and praising God for this signal and merciful deliverance.

Judas, after this, having intelligence, that Timotheus, a governor of the country beyond Jordan, and Bacchides, another lieutenant in those parts, were drawing forces together, in order to invade him, marched directly against them; and, having overthrown them in a great battle, slew above twenty thousand of their men, enriched his army with their spoils, and, out of them, provided himself with arms, and other things necessary for the future carrying on of the war.

By this retreat of his, Judas having made himself master of all Judea, thought it his duty to purge the house of the Lord, and to remove those profanations, which for three years last past it had been forced to submit to. To this purpose, he appointed a certain number of priests to cleanse the sanctuary, to pull down the altar which the heathens had set up, and to build another of ⁶ unhewn stones, to consecrate the courts anew, and to make all things again fit and commodious for the service of God.

Antiochus, in his sacrilegious pillage of the temple, which we have related, had taken away the altar of incense, the table of the showbread, the golden candlestick, and several other vessels and utensils, without which the service could not regularly be performed; but out of the spoils⁷ which Judas had taken from the enemy he was able to have all these things made anew, of the same metal, and in the same manner as they were before; and having thus put all things in their proper

^a It had been fortified by king Rehoboam, (2 Chron. xi. 7.) and was, at this time, a very important fortress, as being one of the keys of Judea on the south side of Idumea.—Universal Hist. b. ii. c. 11.

^b Wherever the name of Idumea, or the land of Edom, occurs in any of the writings of the Old Testament, it is to be understood of that Idumea, or land of Edom, which lay between the Lake of Sodom and the Red Sea, and was afterwards called Arabia Petraea. But the inhabitants of this country, being driven out by the Nabathians, while the Jews were in the Babylonish captivity, and their land laid desolate, they then took possession of as much of the southern part of it as contained what had formerly been the whole inheritance of the tribe of Simeon, and half of the tribe of Judah, where, at this time, they dwelt, but had not as yet embraced the Jewish religion. And this is the only Idumea, and the inhabitants of it the only Idumeans, or Edomites, which are any where spoken of after the Babylonish captivity. After their coming into this country, Hebron, which had formerly been the metropolis of the tribe of Judah, became the capital of Idumea, and between that and Jerusalem lay Bethzura, a strong fortress, which the author of the second book of Maccabees, (ch. xi. 5.) places at no more than five furlongs' distance from Jerusalem; but this is a visible mistake; for Eusebius makes it, at least, twenty miles distant from it.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 165.

before us; for, upon the issue of to-morrow's combat depends, not only our liberty, but all the comforts and advantages that attend it; and, over and above the blessing of such a freedom, our very religion lies at stake with it too, and we cannot secure the one but by preserving the other. Bethink yourselves well, therefore, what it is you are to contend for, and you will find it to be no less than the sum and substance of the greatest happiness that you have ever enjoyed, that is to say, in the peaceable possession of your ancient laws, rites and discipline. Now, whether you will rather choose to perish with infamy, and to involve the miserable remainder of all your countrymen in the same ruin, or to venture one generous push for the redemption of yourselves and your friends, that is the single question. Death is the same to the coward that it is to the valiant man, and as certain to the one as the other; but there is great difference in point of honour, and everlasting fame, between a gallant man, that falls in vindication of his religion, liberties, laws, and country, and a scoundrel that abandons all for fear of losing a life which he cannot save at last. Take these things into your thoughts, and make this use of the meditation. You have nothing to trust to but God's providence, and your own concurring resolutions, and, at the worst, while we contend for victory, we can never fail of glory."—Jewish Antiq. b. xii. c. 11.

order, he had the temple dedicated again, with as much solemnity as the present state of affairs would permit, and in commemoration hereof, appointed a festival ^a of eight days' continuance, which began on the fifth of the month Chisleu, much about the twentieth of our November, to be annually observed.

But though the temple was recovered and restored to its former use, yet Apollonius, at his taking Jerusalem, had erected a fortress on mount Acra, ^b which commanding the mountain of the temple, and being still in the hands of the enemy, gave him the advantage of annoying all those who went up to the temple to worship. To remedy this inconvenience, Judas at first blocked up the fortress; but finding that he could not conveniently spare such a number of men as were necessary for that purpose, ^c he caused the mountain of the temple to be fortified with strong walls and high towers, and placed therein a sufficient garrison, both to defend it, and protect those who went up to worship.

When the neighbouring nations came to understand that the Jews had recovered the city and temple of Jerusalem, and again restored the worship of God in that place, ² they were moved with such envy and hatred against them, that they proposed to join with Antiochus in the extirpation of the whole nation; and accordingly had put all to death whom they found sojourning among them: but Judas having first fortified Bethzura, to be a barrier against the Idumæans, who, at this time, were bitter enemies to the Jews, made war against them, and all the other nations that had confederated against him, in such a manner, and with such success, as shall hereafter be related.

successful as he expected: for, ³ being informed that Elymais, a city in that country, was an opulent place, wherein stood the temple of Diana, ^c where immense riches were to be found, he marched his army thither, with an intent to plunder both it and the temple: but the country round about, taking the alarm, joined with the inhabitants in the defence of the city and temple, and having beat him off, they obliged him to return to Ecbatan in Media, where, with shame and confusion, having received news of the ill success of his arms in Judea, and how the Jews had pulled down the images and altars that he had erected, recovered their temple at Jerusalem, and restored that place to its former worship, he made all the haste home he possibly could, threatening, as he went along, utterly to destroy the whole nation, and make Jerusalem the common place of sepulchre to all the Jews. But ⁴ while these proud words were in his mouth, the judgments of God overtook him; for he was instantly seized with a pain in his bowels, and a grievous torment in his inward parts, which no remedy could assuage. Being resolute however in his revenge, he ordered his charioteer to double his speed; but in the rapid motion, the chariot was overturned, and he thrown to the ground with such violence, as sorely bruised his whole body, and mashed, as it were, his limbs with the fall; so that being able to travel no farther, he was forced to put in at Tabæ, a little town in the confines of Persia and Babylonia, where he suffered most exquisite torments both of body and mind. In his body, a filthy ulcer broke out in his privy parts, wherein were bred an innumerable quantity of vermin, continually flowing from it, and such a stench proceeding from thence, as neither those that attended him, nor even he himself could well bear: and in this condition he lay, languishing and rotting, till he died. In his mind, his torments were no less, by reason of the several spectres and apparitions of evil spirits which he imagined were continually about him, reproaching and stinging his conscience with accusations of the evil deeds which he had been guilty of. Being made sensible at length by his

^a This festival is commemorated in the gospel, (John ii. 23.) and our blessed Saviour, we are told, came up to Jerusalem on purpose to bear a part in the solemnizing of it. Some indeed are of opinion, that it was another dedication-feast, which Christ thus honoured with his presence: but besides that the dedications both of Solomon's and Zerubbabel's temples, who, though they were very solemnly celebrated at the first erection of these temples, had never any anniversary feast afterwards kept in commemoration of them, the very history of the gospel, which tells us that it was kept in winter, confines us to this dedication of Judas only. That of Solomon was on the seventh month, which fell about the time of the autumnal equinox: and that of Zerubbabel was on the twelfth month, which fell in the beginning of the spring; but that of Judas Maccabeus was on the twenty-fifth day of the ninth month, which fell in the middle of winter. So that the feast of the dedication which Christ was present at in Jerusalem, was no other than that which was instituted by Judas, in commemoration of his dedication of the temple anew, after that it had been cleansed from idolatrous pollutions; and from hence Grotius, in his commentary on the gospel of St John, (ch. x. 22.) very justly observes, that festival days, in memory of public blessings, may be piously instituted by persons in authority, without a divine command.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 166.

^b The word Acra, which is of Greek original, signifies in general a citadel, in which sense the Syrians and Chaldeans used it; but when Antiochus gave orders for the building of a citadel on the north side of the temple upon an eminence, that commanded it, the hill itself was called by the name of Acra; which, according to Josephus, (b. xii. c. 7, and 14.) was in the form of a semicircle. John Maccabeus took it out of the hands of the Syrians, who there kept a garrison, and pulled down its fortifications, and in their room were afterwards built the palace of Helena, and that of Agrippa, a place where the public records were kept, and another where the magistrates of Jerusalem assembled.—Calmel's Dictionary under the word.

^c Other authors agree with the account in the first book of Maccabees, that the temple of Elymais was prodigiously rich; and both Polybius and Diodorus Siculus (as they are cited by St Jerome, on Dan. xi.) mention this attempt of the king of Syria to plunder it. But the manner in which he came to be disappointed, is related quite differently in the second book of Maccabees. For therein we are told, that when Antiochus, pretending that he would marry the goddess of the temple, whose name was Nanea, that thereby he might have the better title to the riches of it, by way of dowry, was let into the temple, to take possession of them, the priests opened a secret door that was in the ceiling, and from thence threw upon him and his attendants such a shower of stones as quite overwhelmed them, and so cut off their heads, and cast them out. (2 Mac. i. 13, &c.); but who the goddess Nanea, who had this temple at Elymais, was, the conjectures of the learned are various, since some will have her to be Venus, and others Cybele the mother of the gods, because the word in the Persian language signifies mother, though the most common opinion is, that she was Diana, or the moon, the same that Strabo calls Anais, or Anaitis: for that she was held to be a virgin goddess is plain, because Antiochus pretended to espouse her, and that she was a chaste goddess, Plutarch (de Artaverres) seems to intimate, when he tells us, that Artaxerxes took the beautiful Aspasia, with whom he himself was in love, from his son Darius, and devoted her to a perpetual virginity, in the service of Anais, the goddess of Ecbatan.—Calmel's Commentary on 1 Mac. vi. 1.

afflictions, that all his sufferings were from the hand of God, for his plundering and profanation of his temple at Jerusalem, and for his hatred and cruelties to his servants, who worshipped there, ¹ he made an ample acknowledgment of this before he died, and many vows and solemn promises of a full reparation, in case he recovered. But his repentance ^a came too late; and therefore, after having languished out a while in this miserable condition, and under these horrid torments of body and mind, at length, being half consumed with the rottenness of his ulcer, he gave up the ghost, and died, after he had reigned eleven years.

OF what weight and authority both the history of the Maccabees, and that of the Jews by Josephus ought to be accounted, we shall have occasion to inquire in the two following chapters, and need only here observe, that what the Maccabean history has recorded of Antiochus Epiphanes is, in a great measure confirmed by the testimony of Polybius, an exact historian, who was contemporary with him, and could not therefore be at a loss for proper instructions in what he wrote, Epiphanes, according to ² him, was a man of great expense, and squandered away vast sums in the gratification of his lusts and amours, in the gifts he bestowed upon his favourites, and the entertainments he made for the people: but then Athenæus ³ informs us, “that all these expenses were made, partly out of the gifts which his friends sent him, partly out of the prey which he took from Ptolemy king of Egypt, when he was a minor; but chiefly out of the spoils of the many temples which he sacrilegiously robbed.”

⁴ “I was bountiful, and beloved in my power, and ⁵ I have done great benefits,” both public and private, to the Jews. These were the vain boasts of the dying tyrant: but since the same Polybius ⁶ tells us, that his distemper so far grew upon him, as to come to a constant delirium, or state of madness, these expressions, we may suppose, came from him, ⁷ when he was in that condition. For we know no instance of his kindness, but many of his cruelty to the people of God; and, as to his bounty, as he calls it, this he usually committed in his drunken frolics, ⁸ in which he spent a great part of his revenues, and used often to go out into the streets, and to scatter his money in handfuls among the rabble. We may therefore reasonably suppose, that such a wild, crackbrained creature as this, had seldom any serious thought of establishing an uniformity in religion, though that religion, by the bye, was impious, in his dominions; but that, to justify the depredations that he made upon the Jews, and to revenge the defeats which they had so frequently given to his armies, these were the true reasons of his exasperation against them; because it is not conceivable, how he could have any sober sense of religion, who, to satisfy his greedy avarice, was not afraid to rob the temple of Diana.

This robbing of temples, in the opinion of all sober heathens, was accounted a crime of so heinous a nature as justly deserved the vengeance of heaven; and therefore Polybius, ⁹ as well as the author of the Maccabees, informs us, that Antiochus, before he died, was scared with visions, and apparitions of evil spirits; but then he supposes, that it was the goddess Diana, that thus haunted him, for his attempting to pillage her temple at Elymais; whereas he himself, in the presence of all his friends, openly declares, that these troubles were come upon him, because ¹⁰ he ‘had taken all the vessels of gold and silver that were in Jerusalem,’ and had destroyed ‘the inhabitants of Judea without a cause.’

The sacrilege at Elymais was only intended, not executed: but that at Jerusalem was committed, with horrid impiety against God, and as horrid cruelty against all those that served him there. But even if the former had been committed, it was only against a false deity; whereas the latter was against the true God, the great and almighty Creator of heaven and earth: and therefore we need less wonder, that the marks of a divine infliction were so visible in the nature of his disease. Appian ¹¹ and Polybius, ¹² as well as Josephus, and the author of the books of Maccabees, have informed us, that he died with ulcers, and putrefying sores in his secret parts; and, upon this occasion, we cannot forbear remarking, that most of the great persecutors of the church of God have been smitten in the like manner: that thus died Herod, the great persecutor of Christ, and the infants at Bethlehem; thus Galerius Maximianus, the author of the tenth, and greatest, persecution against the Christians; and thus Philip the second, king of Spain, who was as infamous for the cruelty of his persecution, and the numbers destroyed by it, as any of the other three. ¹³ It is no small confirmation therefore of what the Jewish writers relate concerning the judgments of God upon Antiochus, that these heathen authors, whose credit is thought indubitable, do agree with them as to the matter of fact, though they differ from them, in assigning a wrong cause for it.

¹⁴ ‘If you will walk in my statutes, and keep my commandments, and do them, ye shall chase your enemies, and they shall fall before you: five of you shall chase an hundred, and an hundred of you shall put ten thousand to flight, and your enemies shall fall before you by the sword.’ This is the promise which God made to the children of Israel, upon their entrance into the land of Canaan: and, in virtue of this promise, we find that their leader Joshua was so very successful, that, after he had relieved the city of Gibeon, destroyed twelve kings, and made himself master of their dominions, in one campaign only, it is said of him, that 'he returned, and all Israel with him, unto the camp to Gilgal;' and therefore we need less wonder, that the Jews, who at this time were under the conditions of God's promise, nay, under a state of persecution upon the account of their religion, and were consequently the proper objects of his more immediate care and compassion, should come off victorious, even though they were but poorly armed, and sometimes without the loss of one man, having the Lord of hosts on their side, both to inject terror into their enemies, and to 'cover their heads in the day of battle;' but, even without this supposition of a divine interposal, might there not be some remarkable difference in the soldiers and generals themselves?

^a This wicked king is an example of all hardened sinners, and false penitents, whose only motive of turning to God, is their fear, or feeling of punishment. The Maccabean martyrs had threatened, or rather foretold, that ‘through the judgment of God, he should receive a just punishment for his pride,’ (2 Mac. vii. 36), and, therefore, ‘when he called, God would not answer;’ but, as the royal penman expressed, ‘laughed at his calamity, and mocked when his distress and anguish came upon him,’ Prov. i. 26, 27.

Judas Maccabeus, an excellent commander, bold and enterprising, with a small body of men, but all determined to conquer or die, attacks one of no capacity, with a much larger army indeed, but made up chiefly of raw men, and forces levied in haste. He attacks him, I say, and defeats him; and are not miracles of this kind very common? Do not both ancient and modern history furnish us with victories in great abundance of this sort, and much more surprising than any obtained by the Maccabees? ² The contempt of a weak enemy, whose forces are so disproportionate to the numerous army which comes against them, is one of the greatest errors, as well as dangers, that can happen in war; because in this case people are less upon their guard, not thinking the enemy capable of daring to undertake any thing against them, until they are surprised in their security; and an army surprised in their camp, we know, is an army half conquered.

Though therefore the Jews, under the command of the gallant Judas, were always fewest in number, yet, considering the boldness of their undertakings, and the prudence of their conduct, their skill in the military art, and the providence of God, which attended and prospered their arms, the wonder is not much, that they were, in a manner, always superior to their enemies.

'There shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars,' that is, in the heavens, where they move, 'and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity:' these were the presages, which our Saviour foretold; and, accordingly Josephus ³ informs us, that, before the last siege of Jerusalem, there were seen in the air, a little before sunset, for some days together, chariots and armed men, passing along the clouds, round about the city; "which I would hardly venture to report," says he, "but that I can produce sundry eye-witnesses, that are still alive, to confirm the truth of it." Several accounts of this kind we have in Livy and Suetonius: and though it must be owned, that too great a credulity in some historians may possibly have enlarged, or multiplied these prodigies, yet we must not therefore imagine, that there never were any such things, because very good reasons may be given why God should exhibit them: and, as to the phenomena that ⁴ are now under consideration, they certainly have all the marks of credibility in them that we can well desire. For they are related by an author that was contemporary, or very near contemporary, with them. They were seen, not transiently, and by a few weak superstitious people; but, for forty days together, they appeared to the view of a whole city, wherein were above an hundred thousand inhabitants, most of sound intellects, and some of them of so little superstition, as to abandon the laws and customs of their country for fear of persecution.

The Jews have a tradition, founded upon what we read in the second book of the Maccabees, ⁵ namely, that, some time before the Babylonish captivity, the prophet Jeremiah received instructions from God to hide the ark of the covenant in a cave in Mount Nebo, which accordingly he did, and at the same time declared that the place should not be discovered until the people's return from their captivity; that, after the people's return, in the time of Nehemiah, this ark was found out, and replaced in the sanctuary of the temple; that when Pompey ⁶ entered the sanctuary, he saw an ark and cherubim, like those which Moses had made; and that, some time after, the same ark was carried before Vespasian, when, from the Jewish wars, he returned to Rome in triumph.

Now, upon the supposition that there is any truth in this tradition, and the ark of the covenant was in fact replaced in the second temple, the history of Uzzah will inform us of what sacred account, in the esteem of God, this repository of the divine covenant was, and how severely God, in his case, was pleased to avenge the least violation of it. For, if the 'anger of the Lord was kindled against Uzzah,' so that he smote him dead upon the spot 'for his rashness in taking hold of the ark,' even because he was no priest, no descendant of the house of Aaron; why should it be thought a strange thing, that God should show some tokens of his displeasure against a heathen prince, intruding into the place which he had consecrated for his own presence and inhabitation? Or, if we suppose, that the shekinah, or presence of God, was not resident in the second temple; yet still the holy of holies was reserved for the entrance of none but the high priest; and therefore it is no more than what might be expected, that he, who, in contempt of the divine command, and the remonstrances of all about him, would intrude into it, should meet with some severe rebuke, that thereby he might be convinced of the power of the God of Israel, and of the divine institution of their religion. And, though it be acknowledged that Pompey met with no remarkable judgment, in the instant when he was guilty of the like profanation, yet ⁷ our learned connector of the sacred and profane history has observed, that after this act he never prospered; that this put an end to all his successes; insomuch, that this, over the Jews, was the last of his victories. So mindful has God all along been, not to suffer the profaners of his sanctuary to go unpunished!

The intended destruction of all the Egyptian Jews at Alexandria, in the barbarous manner wherein the author of the second book of the Maccabees has related it, can hardly be thought an incredible thing to those who have read in Philo, ¹ the like, if not worse, cruelties, which the same people underwent in the same town, in the reign of Caligula, and under the administration of Flaccus.—That they were not only driven from their habitations, plundered of their goods, and cooped up in a narrow corner of the city in order to be starved; but that, if any attempting to make their escape were apprehended, they were either knocked on the head, torn limb from limb, or tortured to death, and their dead bodies dragged through the streets; and, if any pretended to lament them, they were immediately seized, whipped without mercy, and having suffered all the torments that cruelty could invent, were condemned at last to be crucified:—That, without any regard to sex or condition, without any respect to the aged, or compassion to the young, not only whole families were burned together, but some, being tied to stakes, had fires of green wood kindled round them, in order to prolong their torments, and that the spectators might have the horrid pleasure of seeing the poor creatures suffocated in the smoke.—That, on the very festival of the emperor's birth-day, which generally lasted for some time, thirty-eight of their council, persons of the most distinguished note among them were bound like criminals, some with chains, and so dragged through the market-place to the theatre, and were whipped so unmercifully, that some of them did not long survive it.—Nay, that at this time more especially, it was a usual thing with the people, when they came to the theatre, first to entertain themselves with scourging, racking, and torturing the poor Jews at their pleasure, and then, to call for their dancers and players, and other diversions in use among the Romans: whoever has read, I say, the account of these cruelties, as Philo has related them, need not much wonder to find an exasperated prince, as Ptolemy was, intending the total destruction of a people he imagined had offended him; when a bare Roman prefect, as Flaccus was no more, without any provocation that we hear of, was not afraid to treat the same people in this inhuman manner.

But then, as to the former case, if we will allow the providence of God, and its interposition in the occurrences of this world, we need not want a reason, why he should turn the elephants, which were designed to destroy the innocent, upon the spectators, who could not be so; because both his justice and mercy seem to plead for the deliverance of those, whose only crime was their profession of his true religion, and for the punishment of such as came to glut their eyes with the hellish pleasure of seeing their fellow creatures trampled to pieces. In this sense, there seems to be a necessary call for a divine interposition; but, abstracted from this consideration, the wonder is not great, that creatures intoxicated, as these elephants are said to have been, should mistake their objects, and fall foul upon those that they were least of all intended to destroy.

There is something, we confess, more wonderful, in the appearances of angels mounted, as it were, on horseback, ² heading the Jewish army, ³ protecting the Jewish general, and ⁴ defending the sacred treasures of the temple; but as we esteem these books of the Maccabees no part of divine writ, we leave the proper defence of them to those who have received them as canonical, and shall only add, ⁵ with the learned Huetius, upon this subject,—That, how improbable soever these accounts may be thought by some, they are not destitute of examples of the like nature in several heathen histories; that, in the battle which the Romans had with the Latins, at the lake Regillus, Castor and Pollux were seen mounted on horseback in the Roman army, and, when the victory was wavering, they restored the fight, and gained the field, and carried the news thereof to Rome that very evening; that, when the Romans invaded the Lucani and Brutii, Mars, the great founder of their nation, led their forces to the onset, and assisted them not a little in taking and destroying great numbers of their enemies; and, to name no more, that, at the battle of Marathon, Pan appeared on the side of the Athenians, made great slaughter among the enemy's army, and injected such a terror into them all, as, from that time, it has obtained the name of a panic fear.

Now, though there might be a good deal of fiction in these instances, yet since we find some of the best Roman historians relating them, and so grave an author as Tully, even ⁶ in some of his most serious pieces, making mention of the first of these as a matter of just credibility, we cannot but suppose, that the common tradition at this time was, that, to the victorious army, especially when it was much inferior in numbers, some celestial and superior beings were always assistant; and, consequently, that the author of the book of the Maccabees, in this respect, wrote nothing but what at that time was the common sense of mankind; nothing, indeed, but what the sense of the royal psalmist, in military matters, authorized him to write: for ⁷ 'let them be turned back,' says he, 'and brought to confusion, that imagine mischief against me; let them be as the dust before the wind, and the angel of the Lord scattering them.'

CHAP. III.—Of the Jewish Sanhedrim.

BEFORE we proceed to examine into this great national council among the Jews, which we suppose might have its rise much about this period of time, it may not be improper to take a short view of the sordid forms of civil administration that were previous to it.

The government of the Jewish republic was originally divine: for, ⁸ if we call a state where the people govern a democracy, and that where the nobles govern an aristocracy, there is the same reason why this should be styled a theocracy; because God was not only the deity they were bound to worship and adore, but the sovereign, likewise, to whom they were to pay all the honours and rights that were due to supreme majesty. Their republic, however, was not completely settled until God had given them the law from Mount Sinai, when the noise and thunderings in which it was delivered were so very terrible, that ¹ the people requested of him not to speak any more to them himself, but to make use of the ministry of Moses as his interpreter.

Thus Moses, by the people's own election, was appointed to the administration of all public affairs; and, in this important office, as the author of the Hebrews ² testifies of him, acquitted himself with much faithfulness: but, in a short time, he found, that he had undertaken a work of too much labour and fatigue for any single person to sustain; and therefore, in pursuance of his father-in-law's advice, he made choice of some of the most prudent and understanding men in every tribe, divided them into several classes, and gave them names according to the authority wherewith he invested them, or the number of the persons over whom they were to preside; ³ 'he made them captains over thousands, and captains over hundreds, and captains over fifties, and captains over tens, and officers among the tribes.'

But this establishment lasted not long, or at least received some change or addition to it. For, as soon as the Israelites were arrived at Kibroth-Hattavah, or the 'graves of lust,' as the place is called, but three days' journey from Mount Sinai, ⁴ God appointed a body of seventy elders, to whom he communicated his Spirit, to assist Moses in bearing the burden of the people; and from hence it is that the defenders of the antiquity of the sanhedrim date the first institution of that great council. But, however this be, it is certain, that this council continued among them all the while that they sojourned in the wilderness; and was, indeed, ⁵ an institution proper enough for a people in their circumstances, who, being all of one community, could assemble together with ease, and, having no great matters in possession, could have but few processes, and, consequently, might dispense with a lesser number of judges.

Moses, however, foreseeing that this institution would not be sufficient, when once the people were settled in the land of promise, ⁶ left it as an injunction behind him, that, whoever had the government of the nation should appoint judges and magistrates in every city, to determine the controversies that came before them; but that, when any thing of great moment, or of difficult discussion, should happen, the contending parties should carry their cause ⁷ 'to the place which the Lord had chosen,' propose it to 'the priests, and to the judge, that should be in their days;' and, upon pain of death, acquiesce in their decision.

Moses was succeeded by Joshua; but his time was spent in making a conquest of the land of Canaan, and, till he had done that, he could not put the order which his predecessor had left him in execution. However, at his first accession to the government, we find that ⁸ all the people promised the same obedience to him that they had paid to Moses; and that, when himself grew old, ⁹ 'he called for the elders of Israel, and for their heads, and for their judges, and for their officers,' that is, all the judges and magistrates which Moses had enjoined him to establish in the country, for the security of the state and administration of justice.

On this footing Joshua left the civil administration; and thus it stood, till the people revolted from the service of God, and then all things ran to confusion. In what manner the state was governed, and justice dispensed during the long succession of judges, it is difficult to determine: but, towards the conclusion of that form of government, we find Samuel ¹⁰ 'going, from year to year, in a circuit round the country, to judge Israel,' and when himself grew impotent and unable to travel, ¹¹ making his sons judges in his stead; but their mal-administration occasioned an alteration in the government.

The institution of regal power dissolved that polity which Moses had settled: but though he both foreknew and foretold this change in the constitution, yet we nowhere find him giving any particular directions how kings were to conduct themselves in the administration of the state, and the dispensation of justice; ¹² whether it was that God did not vouchsafe to communicate any fresh discovery to him upon that subject, or whether he might think that the rules which he had already prescribed were not incompatible with the authority and government of kings.

Saul seems to have concerned himself with nothing but military affairs, leaving the priests and judges the same jurisdiction that they had before; but David, when he came into a peaceable possession of the kingdom, ¹³ did himself, in causes of great consequence at least, administer justice to the people. The famous decision between the two mothers, ¹⁴ who both laid their claim to the living child, is a plain proof, that, in perplexed and intricate cases, Solomon himself did sometimes the office of a judge; and when we read of this prince, that he came to ¹⁵ Gibeon, 'with the captains of thousands and of hundreds, with the judges, and the chief of the fathers,' we may learn from hence, that magistrates of the same kind that Moses had ordained were at this time existing in the kingdom of Israel.

By the revolt of the ten tribes from the house of David to that of Jeroboam, the civil constitution of the Jews suffered very much; because the avowed purpose of that prince was, to change the religion, and reverse the orders which Moses had instituted: and, therefore, from henceforward, we must look only into the kingdom of Judah for the succession of the true discipline and form of ancient government of the Jews.

When Jehoshaphat formed the design of introducing a reformation both in church and state, he pursued the rule which Moses had given him; for ¹⁶ 'he set judges in the land, through all the fenced cities,' and in Jerusalem the capital, erected two tribunals; ¹⁷ one composed of priests and Levites, to hear appeals from lesser courts relating to religious matters; and the other, composed of the 'chief of the fathers of Israel,' to hear such as related to civil. Nor is their conjecture much amiss, who suppose, that the seventy men, whom ¹⁸ Ezekiel saw in a vision, 'burning incense to idols,' and the 'five and twenty,' who, ¹⁹ 'between the porch and the altar, were worshipping the sun in the east,' are the rather mentioned, because they were men of eminence, and very probably the judges of civil and ecclesiastical matters.

What kind of judicature prevailed in the time of the captivity, it is difficult to say. From the story of Susannah we may learn, that in these circumstances the Jews were allowed their own courts and judges, even in Babylon itself; but of what number, order, or authority these judges were, none can tell. It is plain, however, that upon the restoration Ezra returned with full power from Artaxerxes, ¹ 'to set magistrates and judges in all the land,' who might punish criminals according to their demerit, either with death, or banishment, imprisonment, or confiscation of goods: and in this condition the Jewish state continued, namely, in the form of an aristocracy, with the high priest at the head of it, sometimes under the king of Egypt, and sometimes under the king of Syria, for a considerable time after the return from the captivity.

The persecution which Antiochus Epiphanes raised among the Jews, ruined all the economy of their government: but Matthias, and his sons, endeavoured to restore ² 'the decayed state of the people', as it is called, as far as those troublesome times would permit them. Judas Maccabeus, in a general assembly held at Maspha, revived the ancient order, and appointed rulers ³ 'over the people, even captains over thousands, over hundreds, over fifties, and over tens:' and when Jonathan, his brother and successor, took upon him both the sovereign and sacerdotal authority, he, nevertheless, governed by the advice of a senate, not excluding the people from some share in their deliberations, as appears by the letters ⁴ which the Jews, at this time, sent to the Lacedemonians.

Aristobulus, who was the first of the Asmonean race that took upon him the diadem and title of a king, continued the senate in great authority, but excluded the common people from having any part in the administration; as the kings who succeeded him, endeavoured to confirm their own power, by curtailing that of the senate, till Pompey came, and quite overturned the Jewish state, by subjecting it to the empire, and making Judea a Roman province.

From this short review of the Jewish republic, we may perceive, that its form of government, at different times, has been various; that Moses (with the concurrence of seventy chief magistrates) as God's vicegerent, governed the people in an absolute manner; that under the judges the state had been sometimes without any ruler at all, independent sometimes, and, at other times, under the jurisdiction of its enemies; that the ancient kings of Judah vouchsafed to administer justice to their subjects, but that towards the decline of the kingdom, its princes affected state, and a despotic power; that from the captivity to the time of the Asmoneans, the government, under the high priest, was partly aristocratical, and partly popular; and that the Asmonean kings made it monarchical, till the Romans destroyed it: and so we proceed to consider, in which of these periods the famous council of the Jews, which is usually called their sanhedrim, might have its rise, with some other particulars relating to its authority and proceedings.

When Moses, in conducting the children of Israel through the wilderness, was teased and wearied out, as we say, with the perpetual complaints and murmurings of that people, in the impatience of his soul, he addressed himself to God in these words: ⁵ 'wherefore hast thou afflicted thy servant, that thou layest the burden of all this people upon me?—I am not able to bear all this people alone, because it is too heavy for me,' &c. Whereupon the Lord said unto him, 'Gather unto me seventy men of the elders of Israel, whom thou knowest to be the elders of the people, and officers over them, and bring them unto the tabernacle of the congregation, that they may stand there with thee; and I will come down and talk with thee there; and I will take of the spirit, which is upon thee, and will put it upon them, and they shall bear the burden with thee, that thou bear it not thyself alone.' This command Moses took care to put in execution: the elders accordingly met at the 'tabernacle of the congregation, and when the Spirit of the Lord rested upon them, they prophesied, and did not cease.' These words, as we said before, are held by the generality of the rabbins, as well as by some Christian writers, to be the true origin of that great sanhedrim, 'which, from its first institution here under Moses, subsisted all along in the Jewish nation, even to the time of their utter dispersion under Vespasian, and had the cognizance of all matters of the greatest moment, both civil and ecclesiastical.'

But for the better understanding of the sense and design of them, we may observe, 1st, that Moses does not here speak of the difficulty or multiplicity of business that was laid upon him, but of the perverse temper of the people, always addicted to mutiny and sedition, which he himself alone was not able to withstand. To ease himself of the labour of judging the people in all civil and capital causes, he had, by the advice of his father-in-law, ⁶ appointed a certain number of judges, and it seems not unlikely, that some of these seventy were of the number of these judges, because they are called by God himself, 'the elders and officers of the people.' Moses wanted no assistance therefore in the administration of affairs of this nature; but what he wanted, was a sufficient number of persons of such power and authority among the people, as might restrain them from seditious practices, and awe them into obedience; and for this reason it was, that God, when he made choice of them, gave them the Spirit of prophecy, as an evident sign of his having appointed them coadjutors to Moses, in the exercise of his supreme authority, and as a means to procure them the greater reverence and esteem among the people.

2dly, We may observe farther, that it does not appear from the foregoing passage, that this assembly of seventy persons was to be perpetuated in the Jewish state, and when any died, others submitted in their room: on the contrary it rather seems to have been an occasional institution, or present expedient for the relief of Moses, that by the addition of other rulers, (all endued with gifts extraordinary as well as he,) the murmurs and complaints of the people might not fall all upon him, but be diverted, some of them at least, upon others; and that by the joint influence of so many persons, all possessed with the same spirit of government, they might either hinder or appease them. And as this was an institution only for that purpose, there is no reason to believe that it continued any longer than Moses lived; because, if we take a view of the history of succeeding ages, we shall find no footsteps of it.

After the death of Moses, we find Joshua ruling the people with an absolute authority; settling the portions of the several tribes in the land of Canaan; dismissing those who had assisted their brethren in the conquest of it; receiving all appeals, redressing all grievances, and acting, in short, as the only governor of the nation, without one word mentioned of any supreme council to control him. After the death of Joshua, God raised up judges, men of courage and wisdom extraordinary, to deliver his people from the oppressions of their enemies, and to attend to the administration of justice among them; and yet we read of no act or decree of this pretended sanhedrim all this while,¹ which could no more have been omitted in the account of these times, had it been then existing, than the mention of the Roman senate is in any of their historians.

² 'In those days,' as the sacred history informs us, 'there was no king in Israel, but every man did what was right in his own eyes;' and³ where then was this venerable assembly, whose authority, according to the rabbins, was superior to that of princes, to interpose in this time of need? The Jews certainly could never have degenerated into such a state of licentiousness, had there been a court of seventy or seventy-two elders, chosen out of every tribe, and invested with a supreme authority to punish criminals, and reform abuses; nor can we see what reason the Levite had to cut in pieces the body of his concubine, abused by the Gibeonites, and to send it to the several tribes, in demand of justice, if there had been such a constant tribunal, as this is represented, to resort to.

The kings who succeeded the judges, acted in such a manner, as to make us believe, that there was no such thing as a sanhedrim then in being.⁴ They displaced high priests without opposition; they waged war without advising with any; they made and deposed judges, as they pleased; and in short did every thing that other princes are wont to do, without the sanhedrim's ever interposing its authority, that we read of, to stop the course of their extravagancies, or curb their exorbitant power. Some of these kings, we know, were for extinguishing the true worship of God, and establishing idolatry in its stead: here then was a proper opportunity for this venerable body to step in, by condemning idolatry in some public act of theirs, and opposing the innovations of the court. But of this we hear not one word; neither do we find, that⁵ the prophets, who so severely inveighed against the wickedness of the people, ever referred them to the sanhedrim, or complained, that that court was too remiss or negligent in the punishment of crimes.

If ever mention were to be made of this great council, it would be, one would think, in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, which were written after the Babylonish captivity, when there was no king in the land, and consequently a fit opportunity for the sanhedrim to appear; and yet, even here, we find several matters of great moment transacted, such as the reformation of the people's manners, the dissolution of illegal marriages, a stop put to the profanation of the sabbath, and a covenant of obedience to God, made and signed by the deputies of the priests, Levites and common people; but not one word of the great sanhedrim all this while.

In short, not only the sacred writers, but even Josephus, Philo, Origen, Eusebius, and St Jerome, who were all well versed in the ancient government of the Jews, make no manner of mention of any such body of men in the times that we are now upon; and therefore we cannot but think, that this universal silence, in writers of all kinds, is a very good argument, that this supreme national council did not then subsist. Its name is confessedly of Greek derivation; to which purpose Livy⁶ observes, that those senators whom the Macedonians intrusted with the administration of their government, were called synedri; and therefore it seems somewhat incongruous to look into the first centuries of the Jewish church for the original of a council, whose very name is of later extract.

Before the times of the gospel, wherein frequent mention is made of this council, we find it in so great authority, as even to call Herod,⁷ though then governor of Galilee, upon his trial for some misdemeanour: and therefore it is no improbable conjecture, that in the time of the Maccabees, either Judas or Jonathan was the first institutor of it; and the reason they might have for this institution, might be the change which they had made in the nature of the government, for which they wanted the consent of the people, or at least of a body that represented them, that thereby they might act with more authority; and though, as yet, they did not assume the title of kings, yet they thought it a matter of prudence to have their resolutions ratified by a council.

The Maccabees, who, in all probability, were the first institutors of this council, would hardly exclude themselves from it; and therefore we may presume, that the high priest was the settled president, who, for that reason was called nasi, or prince of the sanhedrim, and in his absence had a deputy called ab-beth-din, or father of the house of judgment, and a sub-deputy called chacam, that is, thes wie; but all the rest had the common name of elders or senators.

These senators, which are usually taken from other inferior courts, were to be some priests, and some laymen, but all persons of untainted birth, good learning, and profound knowledge in the law, both written and traditional. All eunuchs, usurers, gamblers, those that brought up pigeons to decoy others to their dove-houses, or made any gain of their fruits in the sabbatical year, all old men, deformed persons, and such as had no children, because they were suspected of being cruel and hard-hearted, were excluded from this council; and those only who were of mature age, competent fortunes, and comely personages, were admitted to it.

The room in which this council met, was a rotunda, half of which was built without the temple, and half within. The nasi, or prince of the council, sat upon a throne elevated above the rest, at the upper end of the room, having his deputy on his right hand, and his sub-deputy on his left. The senators were ranged in order on each side; and the secretaries who were to record the matters that came before them, were three; whereof one wrote the sentences of those that were absolved, the other had the condemnations under his care, and the third entered into their books the several pleadings of all contending parties.

The vanity and ridiculous pride of the rabbins appear in nothing more, than in the excessive power which they give to this high-court of judicature. For, according to them, it not only decided such cases as were brought before it by way of appeal from other inferior courts, but had under its jurisdiction likewise “the king, the high priest, and prophets.”¹ The king, for instance, if he offended against the law, if he married above eighteen wives, if he kept too many horses, if he boarded up too much gold or silver, the sanhedrim had him stripped and whipped in their presence. But whipping, it seems, among the Jews² was not so ignominious a thing, but that the king bore it by way of penance, with great patience, and himself made choice of the person that was to exercise this discipline upon him. However this be, it is certain, that all private controversies of difficult discussion, all matters relating to religion, and all important affairs of state, were submitted to the determination of this august assembly, from whose sentence no appeal could be made, because a demurring to the jurisdiction of their court was punished by death, that is, while the power of life and death was in their hands; but how long this lasted, after that Judea became a Roman province, has been a matter of some dispute among the learned.

Josephus³ tells us expressly, that the senate and emperors of Rome took no ancient rights from the nations whom they conquered: and by the words of Pilate concerning our Saviour Christ, “Take ye him and judge him according to your law,” it seems, as though they still retained their power, though perhaps it might be under some limitations.

Upon St Peter’s⁴ speech before the great council, we find them so exasperated against the apostles, that they began to think of putting them all to death, and might, very probably, have proceeded in their design, had they not been dissuaded from it by the wise advice of Gamaliel. The stoning of St Stephen was not the effect of any hasty judgment of some zealots, but of the regular proceedings of this court. He⁵ “was brought before the council,” we read; false witnesses accusing him of blasphemy were produced against him; in his own defence, he made a long discourse; but his own defence was not admitted, nor his innocence acknowledged; and therefore they sentenced him to be stoned⁷ according to the law.

St Paul himself declares before this very court, that before his conversion to Christianity,⁸ he ‘persecuted those of that way’ unto death, and ‘received letters from the estates of the elders,’ or the sanhedrim, to bring ‘Christians from Damascus to Jerusalem in bonds, in order to be punished.’ Tertullus, who, in the trial of this apostle, was council for the sanhedrim,⁹ tells Felix, the governor of Judea, that having apprehended the criminal at the bar, they thought to have proceeded against him ‘according to their law; but that the chief captain, Lysias, came upon them, and took him out of their hands.’

The true reason why Lysias exerted his power upon this occasion, and took him out of their hands, was, because they had accused him, not only of blasphemy, and profanation of their temple, but of sedition likewise, which was a crime falling more properly under the cognizance of the civil government, and for which Paul was therefore brought before Felix, Festus, and Agrippa.¹⁰ So that from an examination of these particulars, wherein the power of the sanhedrim was concerned, we may conclude, that even after the subjection of the Jewish state to the Roman empire, this sanhedrim had the power of life and death in crimes committed against their own law; but that in matters of sedition, and crimes committed against the civil administration, the Roman governors interposed their authority, and in cases of this nature took the dispensation of justice out of their hands.

¹¹ What formality was observed in bringing a lawsuit before the sanhedrim, Maimonides has in this manner described:—“The business,” says he, “was first to be examined in the inferior courts; but if it could not be decided there, the judges sent to Jerusalem to consult the judgment-chamber, that sat upon the mount of the temple. From this first tribunal they proceeded to that which sat at the temple gate; and if the matter was not determined there, they came at last to the great council chamber, which was held in one of the apartments belonging to the temple; and this last council determined with so much justice and authority, that there were no divisions seen, during all the time that the second temple lasted.” And what caution was taken, in passing the sentence of death upon criminals, by the same tribunal, the Jewish doctors (if we will believe them) have thus informed us.—“After the witnesses were heard, and the matter in question decided, the judge put off the sentence till next morning. Hereupon the sanhedrim went home, eat but little, drank no wine, and then met again, two by two, in order to weigh all the particulars of the trial. The next morning, he that had given his opinion for condemning of the criminal, had power to revoke it; but he who had once given it for absolving him, could not alter his mind. As soon as the judge had pronounced sentence, the malefactor was conducted to the place of execution, while an herald, on horseback, proclaimed, as he went along, ‘such an one is condemned for such a crime; but if any body can allege any thing in his behalf, let him speak.’ If it happened that any one came to the gate of the court, the door-keeper made a sign to the herald to bring back the malefactor, while two judges were appointed to receive what his friend had to say in his favour, and to consider whether there was any thing material in it.

^a This is directly the opinion of Maimonides, (in Sanhed. per. 2, 3), but that learned rabbi was strangely prejudiced in favour of this great council; and though Josephus is of the same opinion, yet to allow such an extent of jurisdiction to this court, so as to inflict corporal punishment upon the persons of their kings, is contrary to the general notions of sovereignty, and the laws of all kingdoms and nations: besides that the Holy Scriptures are absolutely silent in this particular, and nothing can be inferred from them, to countenance such a coercive power.—Lewis’s Hebrew Antiq. vol. i. c. 6.

These formalities are indeed related in the Mishneh; but it is much to be questioned, whether they were not invented since, on purpose to recommend the justice and equity of the ancient Jewish tribunals. For, besides that no other nation did ever yet observe such favourable proceedings, in relation to those that were found guilty, there is not the least mention of any thing of this kind in the sacred history; and in the Talmud itself we meet with maxims and matter of fact quite contrary to it. For¹ therein we are told, that though a prisoner declare upon oath, at the place of execution, that he was innocent, and in confirmation of this the false witnesses recanted; yet the judges took no notice of their retraction, but only said, "Let the false witnesses perish; but a judge cannot recall his sentence, when once it is pronounced."

Upon the whole therefore we may observe, that what the Jewish doctors tell us of the origin and succession, the authority and proceedings of their sanhedrim, is in a great measure fabulous; that the council of seventy men, which God instituted in the wilderness, was designed only to serve a particular purpose, and was therefore of short continuance in the Jewish state; that from the time of Joshua till after the return from the Babylonish captivity, there are no footsteps to be found, either in sacred or profane history, of such an assembly, as the rabbins represent their sanhedrim to have been; but that in the times of the Maccabees we read of the senate of the nation, which, under the Asmonean princes, grew into great power, and in the days of our Saviour's ministry, had matters of the highest consequence committed to their determination; till in the final destruction of Jerusalem, and the dispersion of the Jewish nation, the very name and authority of that senate was entirely lost.

SECT. IV.

CHAP. I.—From the Death of Antiochus Epiphanes, to that of John Hyrcanus.

THE HISTORY.

AFTER the death of Antiochus Epiphanes,² his son Antiochus Eupator, a minor, nine years old, succeeded in the throne of Syria. His father, upon his death-bed, had constituted Philip, one of his chief favourites, regent of the kingdom, during the minority of his son, and had delivered to him his crown, his signet, and other ensigns of royalty, giving him strict charge to educate him in such a manner as would qualify him to reign well; but Philip, when he came to Antioch, found his office usurped by another. For Lysias, who in the king's absence was left governor in chief, hearing of the death of Epiphanes, took Antiochus his son, who was then under his care, and, having placed him on the throne, assumed to himself the tuition of his person, and the government of his kingdom, without any manner of regard to the will and appointment of the late king: and Philip, finding himself too weak at present to contest it with him, fled into Egypt, in hopes of procuring some assistance there, which would enable him at one time or other to make good his claim.

³ Not long after the death of Epiphanes, Judas Maccabæus, hearing of the confederacy which the neighbouring nations were engaged in, namely, to destroy and extirpate the whole race of Israel, and that they had already begun to cut off as many as were within their power,⁴ marched first against the Idumæans, who were the forwardest in the conspiracy, and having fallen into that part of their country which was called Acrabatene,^a he there slew twenty thousand of them. He next fell upon⁵ the children of Bean,^b another tribe of these Idumæans, and having vanquished them in the field, pursued them to their fortresses, which he besieged, took, and therein slew twenty thousand more. He then passed over the Jordan into the land of the Ammonites, wherein he defeated them in several engagements; slew great numbers of them; took Jahazah,^c and its appendant villages; and after his return to Judea, when Timotheus, the governor in those parts, pretended to follow him with a numerous army, he fell upon him, and overthrew him with a great slaughter, so that himself was forced to fly to Gazara, a city in the tribe of Ephraim, where his brother Chereas was governor: but Judas, pursuing him thither, beset the place, took it in five days, and there slew Chereas, Timotheus, and Apollophanes, another great captain of the Syrian forces.

In the mean time, the heathen nations about Galaad⁶ had fallen upon the Jews that dwelt in the land of Tob, which lay on the east of Gilead; had slain to the number of a thousand men; taken their goods for a spoil; and carried away their wives and children into captivity: whereupon most of the other Jews inhabiting those parts betook themselves to a strong fortress in Gilead, called Dathema, with a resolution to defend themselves. This when the heathens understood they drew together, in a great body, under the command of Timotheus, the successor, and (very probably) the son, of the late Timotheus, who was slain at Gazara, in order to besiege them, while the inhabitants of Tyre, Sidon, Ptolemais, and other parts thereabout, were laying their schemes to cut off all the Jews that were in Galilee; so that Judas was sent to, both from Gilead and Galilee, to come to the succour and assistance of his poor distressed countrymen.

a It is a canton of Judea, upon the frontiers of Idumæa, towards the southern extremity of the Dead Sea.

b Who these children of Bean were, it is difficult to say. Some think, that this Bean was the name of an ancient king, whose descendants lived in hostility with the children of Israel; but others (with more probability) account it the name of a place; and if in the confines of the Dead Sea there was, as some affirm, a city of this name, without all controversy this was it.—Cabnet's Commentary on 1 Mac. v. 4.

c This city, which lay beyond the Jordan, was first of all given to the tribe of Gad, and afterwards to the Levites, Josh. xxi. 36. It was situated at the foot of the mountains of Gilead, near the brook Jazah, which forms a rivulet or torrent, that falls into the Jordan.

Jonathan his brother, marched for the relief of the Gileadites: with the second, consisting of three thousand, Simon, another of his brothers, was sent into Galilee; and the rest were left at Jerusalem, under the command of Joseph, for the defence of the place, and the country adjacent, but with a strict charge from Judas, not to enterprize any thing against the enemy, but to stand wholly upon the defensive, until he and Simon should return again.

While Judas and his brother Jonathan were thus successful in Gilead, the other brother Simon was not idle in Galilee. For he defeated the enemy ² in several encounters, drove them out of the country, and pursued them, with a great slaughter, to the very gates of Ptolemais: and, being now ready to return, he took along with him all the Jews, men, women, and children, that he could find in those parts, because he thought them too far distant from Jerusalem to be under the eye and protection of their brethren; and, having brought them safe into Judea, with them he repopled these places which had been desolated by the enemy, during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes.

Enraged at these successes, Lysias, ⁴ who was commander-in-chief of the Syrian forces, having raised an army of eighty thousand men, marched against Judas, with all the horse of the kingdom, and eighty elephants; and coming to Bethzura, thought it necessary to take that place in his way: but while he was besieging it, Judas came upon him, and having slain eleven thousand foot, and sixteen hundred horse, put the rest of his army to flight: so that Lysias, who with much ado escaped to Antioch, growing weary of so unprosperous a war, and not knowing where to raise fresh recruits, made a peace with Judas and his people, whereby the decree of Antiochus Epiphanes, obliging them to conform to the religion of the Greeks, was rescinded, and a liberty granted them to live according to their own laws.

This peace was ratified by Antiochus Eupator, but it did not last long, ⁵ because the governors of the several neighbouring places did not like it. The people of Joppa were the first that broke it, by drowning in the sea two hundred of the Jews, who lived among them in that city; but Judas severely revenged their cruelty: for, falling upon them by night, he burned their shipping, put all to the sword that had escaped the fire, and then hearing that the people of Jamma had but badly treated the Jews, he set fire to that haven likewise, and burned all the ships in it.

Timotheus was one of the governors that was dissatisfied with the peace; and therefore, when Judas understood that he had drawn all his forces together, ⁶ to the number of an hundred and twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; and that he was going to give the Jews in Gilead fresh vexations, he marched against him; and, having defeated a strong party of wandering Arabs ^a in his way, and made peace with them, he first took the city of Caspis, ⁶ slew the inhabitants, and destroyed the place; then attacked Caraca, which was garrisoned with ten thousand men, whom he put to the sword; and, at last, coming up with Timotheus, near a place called Raphon, on the river Jabhoc, he there gave him battle, slew of his army thirty thousand men, and ⁷ took him prisoner; but, upon condition that he should release all the Jews that were captives in any places under his command, he gave him both his life and his liberty. Understanding, however, that a great part of the vanquished army had fled to Carnion, a city in Arabia, he pursued them thither, and having taken the place, slew twenty-five thousand more of Timotheus's forces, that had there taken refuge.

In his return to Jerusalem, he took along with him all the Jews that were in the land of Gilead, for the same reason that Simon had carried them out of the land of Galilee the year before, namely, to inhabit and fortify the cities of Judea, which were not sufficiently peopled: ⁸ but being in his way to pass through Ephron, c

^a These people lived in tents, and stayed in a place no longer than it afforded them provision for themselves and their cattle. They were the descendants of Ishmael, and according to the angel's prediction of them (Gen. xvi. 12.) 'their hand was against every man, and every man's hand against them;' for they lived chiefly upon plunder; but as they were a stout and warlike people, and well acquainted with the course of those countries, it was no bad policy in the Jewish general, after he had forced them to sue for peace, and had obliged them to furnish him with a certain quantity of cattle and provisions, to secure their friendship and future services.—² Mac. xii. 11; Universal History, b. 2. c. 11.

^b This is the same as Heshon, in the tribe of Reuben.

^c The Scripture makes mention of this city of Ephron, as standing upon the Jordan, only in this place; and therefore it is hard to define its particular situation.

a strong city, and well garrisoned by Lysias, the people refused to open their gates; whereupon he assaulted the place, and, having taken it by storm, put all the males, to the number of twenty-five thousand persons, to the sword, took their spoils, and razed the city to the ground. After this, re-passing Jordan, and returning to Jerusalem, ¹ he and his company went up to the temple, to give God thanks for the great success wherewith he had been pleased to prosper this expedition, and for his singular and wonderful protection of them, in that, notwithstanding all the hazardous enterprises they had been engaged in, they had not so much as lost one man.

This continued series of success gave Judas ² encouragement to carry the war into the southern parts of Idumæa, where he took and dismantled Hebron, the metropolis thereof: and thence passing into the land of the Philistines, took Azotus, formerly called Ashdod; pulled down their heathen altars, burned their carved images, and spoiled the place; and having done the like to all the other cities of that country, where he prevailed, he led his victorious army, laden with the spoils of their enemies, back again to Judea.

But, notwithstanding all these successes, the Jews could not call themselves entirely masters of Jerusalem. The fortress of Acra still held out for the king of Syria, and the garrison, consisting of Macedonians and renegade Jews, was very troublesome to such as resorted to the temple. Judas therefore thought it highly necessary to attempt the reduction of the place; and having got engines ^a and machines for that purpose, he soon straitened the garrison. The besieged, however, found means to acquaint king Antiochus with their distress, who promised to relieve them, and, for that end, gathered an army of an hundred and ten thousand foot, twenty thousand horse, thirty-two elephants, with castles on their backs full of archers, and three hundred armed chariots of war. With all this force, Antiochus, marching to the relief of the fortress of Jerusalem, passed through Idumæa, where, in his way, he laid siege to Bethzura, which made a brave defence; for the inhabitants, by bold sallies, so burned and disordered his engines, that he spent much time about it to no purpose. Judas all this while pressed the fortress of Acra with all his might; but fearing lest the Bethzurians should be forced to submit to the superior strength of the enemy, he left the siege of it, and went to the relief of them.

the rest, ^b armed with royal harness, and supposing thereby that the king was upon it, at once, both to deliver his country, and gain himself immortal honour, he made at it with all his might; and having slain every one that stood in his way, got under its belly, and thrust his spear into it, so that the creature fell down dead, but unhappily crushed him to death by its weight in the fall.

At length, after having slain about six hundred of the king's forces, perceiving that they must be overpowered by so great a number, ⁵ they withdrew from the fight, and made a safe retreat to Jerusalem. Antiochus followed after with one part of his army, but left the other to carry on the siege of Bethzura, which the inhabitants, seeing no prospect of relief from their friends, were forced to surrender. From Bethzura the king's forces ⁷ marched to Jerusalem, where Judas had shut himself up, and his friends, in the temple. They defended the place with great resolution, but must inevitably have been compelled to surrender, had they not been relieved by this lucky and unexpected accident.

In the absence of the king, and the regent Lysias, that Philip, whom, as we said before, Antiochus Epiphanes, at his death, constituted guardian of his son, had made himself master of Antioch, and taken upon him the government of the Syrian empire. ⁸ Upon the receipt of this news, Lysias found it necessary to make peace with the Jews, that he might be at liberty to return, and expel the intruder. Accordingly a peace was granted them upon honourable and advantageous terms, and ratified by oath; but when Antiochus came to see the strength of the fortifications belonging to the temple, he caused them, contrary to the articles he had sworn, to be all pulled down and demolished, and then returned towards Syria, where he found that Philip had seized on the imperial city; but by one easy battle, wherein Philip was worsted and slain, he soon recovered the possession of it.

⁹ In this expedition against Judea, Menelaus, the high priest, accompanied Antiochus, and was as busy in offering him his service against his own people as any: but falling by some means under the displeasure of Lysias, he was accused, and condemned, as the author and fomenter of this Jewish war, and accordingly was carried to Berbea, ^c a town in Syria, and there cast headlong

^b Though elephants have an hide impenetrable almost in every part, except their belly, yet for their greater safety, those that are appointed for the wars, are usually armed and covered all over, as it were with a coat of mail. The kings of India, according to Q. Curtius, (b. 2.) when they took the field, were drawn by elephants all covered over with gold; and Florus described the elephants made use of in battles, as brilliant with gold, silver, purple, and their own ivory, (b. 2. c. 8.) harnessed, and set out, much after the fashion of the war-horse in Virgil: "he pricked on his foaming steed, covered over with a skin of brazen scales, clasped together with gold."—Æn. 11.

^c This was one of the punishments of the Persians, whereby great criminals among them were put to death. The manner of it is described in the 15th chapter of the second book of the Maccabees, to be thus: "An high tower was filled a great way up with ashes; the criminal, being from the top thrown down headlong into them, there had the ashes by a wheel continually stirred up, and raised about him, till he was suffocated and died. into a tower of ashes; but after his death, ¹ Antiochus conferred the office of high priest upon one Alcimus, a man altogether as wicked as the other.

All this while Antiochus Eupater held the crown of Syria, by an unjust title; for Demetrius, the son of Seleucus Philopater, elder brother to Antiochus Epiplanes, was the legal heir thereof. He, in exchange for his uncle Antiochus, had been sent an hostage to Rome, the very year that his father died; and Antiochus returning at the very nick of time, was unanimously declared king, in the absence and minority of the rightful heir. But Demetrius, being now in the twenty-third year of his age, when his uncle died, and his son Eupater, who was appointed king in his room, ^a thought it high time to put in his claim; and accordingly moved the senate of Rome for their assistance in the recovery of his father's kingdom; and as an inducement thereunto, he alleged, that having been bred up in that city from his childhood, "he should always look on Rome as his country, the senators as his fathers, and their sons as his brothers." But the senate having more regard to their own interest, than the right of Demetrius, and judging it more to their advantage to have a boy reign in Syria, as Eupater then was, than a man of mature understanding, as they knew Demetrius to be, instead of asserting his right, to whom it belonged, they confirmed Eupater in the kingdom.

Demetrius being excluded from all hopes of any favour or assistance from the senate, had nothing left to do, but to endeavour to make his escape from Rome, and to risk his fortune in his own country: this he did; ² and landing at Tripolis in Syria, made it believed, that he was sent by the Roman senate, which would support his pretensions, to take possession of the kingdom. Hereupon Eupater's cause, being in the general opinion given up for lost, every one deserted from him to Demetrius; nay, the very soldiers seized on him, and the regent Lysias, with an intent to deliver them up to this new comer, as soon as he arrived at Antioch; but he refusing to see them, ordered them both to be put to death, vidential judgment upon him is very light and trifling: 'forasmuch as he had committed many sins about the altar, whose fire and ashes were holy, he received his death in ashes,' v. 7, 8.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 424.

^a What excited him the rather to do it at this time, was the murder of Cn. Octavius: for the Roman senate having sent three ambassadors into Syria, whereof Octavius was chief, to administer the affairs of the nation, during the minority of the king, these ambassadors, finding that there were more ships in the navy, and more elephants in the army, than the treaty made with Antiochus the Great, after the battle of Mount Siphilus, allowed of, caused the ships to be burned, and the elephants to be slain, that exceeded the number stipulated. This occasioned great murmurings and discontent among the people, and provoked one Lepthes to such a degree of indignation, that he fell upon Octavius, as he was anointing himself in the gymnasium at Laodicea, and there slew him. Eupater and Lysias did all they could to clear themselves from having any hand in this vile act, and to this purpose sent ambassadors to Rome to inform the senate of their innocence; but the senate, after having heard what the ambassadors had to say, gave them no answer, expressing their resentment by their angry silence; and therefore Demetrius thought this no improper time to move the senate, when he perceived them thus out of humour with Eupater, the usurper of his kingdom.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 162.

He had not been long so settled, before Alcimus, who, on the death of Menelaus, had by Antiochus Eupater been constituted high priest of the Jews, but was never acknowledged as such, because in the time of persecution he had apostatised, came, and implored his protection against Judas Maccabæus and his party; accusing them of being enemies to the kings of Syria, fomentors of sedition, and murderers and persecutors of his most faithful subjects. By this representation Demetrius was so exasperated that ³ he immediately ordered Bacchides, the governor of Mesopotamia, to march with an army into Judea; and having confirmed Alcimus in the office of high priest, joined him in the same commission for carrying on the war in Judea.

No sooner were they arrived in Judea, with a considerable body of troops, but the scribes ^b and doctors of the law met together, and consulted what they were to do upon this occasion. Very desirous they were to have an high priest again settled among them, and not at all suspicious that any of the sons of Aaron would do them any wrong; and therefore upon promise of safe conduct, they waited upon them, in order to bring matters to a peaceable accommodation: but the perfidious Alcimus, having got them in his power, caused sixty of them to be seized, and all put to death on one day, which made the people more cautious of him for the future.

Bacchides, however, returning to Antioch, put Alcimus in possession of the country, and left him some forces to support him in it. With these the wicked high priest did much mischief, and committed many murders upon those that were not for him: but as soon as Judas, ⁴ with his men, appeared in the field again, he left the country for fear, and returned to the king with fresh accusations against him and his brothers, who, as long as they were permitted to live, as he told him, would never suffer the king's authority to take place, nor any lasting peace to be established in the country. So that, upon this representation, Demetrius sent another army against the Jews, under the command of Nicanor, with strict orders to destroy Judas, disperse his followers, and thoroughly establish Alcimus in the high priest's office.

Nicanor was not insensible of the courage and conduct of Judas: and therefore, loath to come to an engagement with him, he endeavoured to compose matters by a treaty, and accordingly entered into articles of peace with him: but the high priest, ⁶ not liking the peace, because his interest, as he imagined, was not sufficiently secured in it, went, the third time to the king, and so possessed him against it, that he refused to ratify what was agreed, and sent his positive commands to Nicanor, to go on with the war, and not cease prosecuting it, until he had either slain Judas, or taken him prisoner, and sent him bound to Antioch. Upon these these instructions, Nicanor being obliged, though much against his will, to alter his conduct, marched his army up to Jerusalem, and designing, by craft and treachery, to get Judas into his power, ¹ invited him to a conference, which the other, upon the presumption of the depending peace, readily complied with, and came to the place appointed: but when he found that an ambush was laid for his apprehension, he fled from his presence, and so began the war afresh. This war was carried on with various successes for some time, and with some particular cruelties on Nicanor's side, ^a but at length, coming to a decisive battle near a village called Bethoron, Nicanor was slain in the first onset, which the rest of the army perceiving, cast away their arms, and fled; so that, what with Judas's pursuing them, and the country rising upon them as they endeavoured to escape, not one of the whole army, which consisted of five and thirty thousand men, was left to carry home the tidings of their overthrow.

After the pursuit was ended, the victorious army returning to the field of battle, took the spoils of the slain; and having found Nicanor's body among the dead, they cut off his head, and this right hand which he stretched out so proudly in his threatenings against the temple, and hanged them up upon one of the towers of Jerusalem. A general joy overspread the whole city upon this occasion, and in commemoration of so great a deliverance, it was ordained, that the thirteenth day of their month Adar, (which answers in part to our February,) the day whereon this victory was obtained, should be ever after observed as an anniversary day of solemn thanksgiving; and so it is kept even to this present time, under the name of the day of Nicanor.

² Judas, having now some respite after this victory, was thinking of making a league with the Romans. He had heard much talk of their power, prowess, and policy; and was therefore desirous of making an alliance ^b with them, in hopes of receiving thereby some protection and relief against the oppressions of the Syrians. To this purpose he sent Jason and Eupolenus, men of sufficiency for such an embassy, to Rome, who were kindly received by the senate, and from them obtained a decree, acknowledging the Jews for friends and allies to the Romans, a league of mutual defence between them, and a letter to Demetrius, requiring him, upon the peril of having war denounced against him, to desist from giving the Jews any farther molestation; but before the return of these ambassadors Judas was dead.

³ For Demetrius, having received an account of the defeat and death of Nicanor, sent Bacchides, with Alcimus, the second time into Judea, at the head of a very numerous army, made up of the prime forces and flower of his militia. Judas, at their coming, had no more than three thousand men to oppose them; and these were so terrified with the strength and number of the enemy, that they deserted their general, all to eight hundred men. However, with these few, he resolved to try his fortune; and when his soldiers advised him to retreat, and wait for a supply; "God forbid," says he, "that the sun should ever see me turn my back to my enemies. If providence has ordained that we should die, let us die manfully, fighting for our brethren; and let us never stain the honour of our former valorous deeds by an ignominious flight:" and so animating them by his own example, he charged and broke the right wing, where Bacchides commanded in person, and pursued them as far as the mountains of Azotus; but having not forces enough to keep the left wing in play, he was followed and encompassed. The action was very hot and obstinate: the Jews sold their lives at a dear rate: their general did every valiant thing that man could do; till, being overpowered by numbers, he was slain, and his men, thus deprived of their heroic leader, were forced to fly.

Thus fell the great Judas Maccabeus, the restorer and preserver of the true worship of God, and the reliever and protector of his distressed countrymen, while he lived. His two brothers, Simon and Jonathan, took up his dead body, and conveying it to the city of Modin, they there buried it, in the sepulchre of his ancestors, with all the funeral honour that was due to the memory of so brave a man, and so excellent a commander.

After the death of Judas, Bacchides made himself master of the country, and used all the friends and adherents to the Maccabees, wherever he found them, with the utmost barbarity; ⁴ so that Jonathan was in a manner necessitated to take upon him the command in the room of his brother Judas, and to become the captain of all those who had preserved their integrity. To this purpose, taking with him his brother Simon, and those that had resorted to him, he retired into the wilderness of Tekoa, and there encamped, with a morass on one side, and the river Jordan on the other, so that they could not easily be come at. But Bacchides ⁵ marching after them, and having made himself master of the pass that led to their encampment, assaulted them in it on the sabbath day, expecting to meet with no resistance. Jonathan, however, reminding his men of the determination that was made in this case in the time of his father Mattathias, encouraged them to dispute it bravely; which accordingly they did, even till they had slain about a thousand of the assailants: but then, finding that they should be overpowered with numbers, they cast themselves into the river, and, by swimming over to the other side, made their escape.

Bacchides thought it not proper to pursue them any farther, but rather to go back to Jerusalem; where, hav-

^a One instance of this kind was practised upon Razis, an eminent and honourable senator of the Jewish sanhedrim, who had not only persevered in his religion through the worst of times, but upon all occasions been very manifest to the people. Him Nicanor was resolved to cut off, the rather, because he thought it would be an act of high displeasure to the Jews; and therefore sent a party to seize him. Razis was, at this time, at a castle of his which he had in the country, where he defended himself against them for some time with great valour; but at length finding that he could hold out no longer, he fell upon his sword. The wound however was not mortal, and therefore he threw himself headlong over the battlements of the tower whereon he fought; but finding himself still alive, he thrust his hand into his wound, and pulling out his bowels, cast them upon the assailants, and so died, 2 Mac. xiv. 46.

^b Josephus takes notice, that this was the very first treaty that ever the Jews made with the Romans, which is very probable from the manner in which the author of the first book of Maccabees prefaces his account of it; for there it appears that the Jews, till this time, had very little knowledge of the Roman state.—*Jos. ing fortified Mount Acra, and the neighbouring towns, and put garrisons in them, he took hostages for the fidelity of the inhabitants, and so returned to Syria: ^a but, before he departed, Alcimus, the great troubler of Israel, and whom he had, not long before, settled in the high-priesthood, was smitten with a palsy, whereof he suddenly died; so that the land had rest for two years, and Jonathan an opportunity of bringing his affairs to some better settlement in Judea.

Bacchides, as soon as he arrived in Judea, went after Jonathan; but, upon his approach, Jonathan left Simon his brother with one part of the forces to defend the place, whilst himself, with the other part, took the field to harass the enemy abroad: in which capacities they both acted so well, Jonathan, by cutting off several of their parties, and now and then falling upon the outskirts of their army employed in the siege; and Simon, by making frequent sallies upon them, and burning the engines they had brought against the place; that Bacchides, ² growing weary of this undertaking, and not a little enraged at those who were the occasion of his return and disgrace, put several of them to death. This opportunity Jonathan laid hold on, and therefore sent messengers to him, to desire an accommodation, which Bacchides readily came into, so that a peace was concluded. The prisoners whom he had in his custody were all restored, and himself took an oath, never to molest the Jews any more: which accordingly he fulfilled; for as soon as the peace was ratified on both sides he went away, and never more returned into the country.

When the wars were thus happily ended, Jonathan retired to Michmash, a town about nine miles' distance to the north of Jerusalem, where he governed the people according to law; cut off all those that had apostatised from him; and, as far as in him lay, reformed all abuses, both in church and state; repairing the city of Jerusalem; fortifying it on every side, and causing the wall round the mount of the temple, which had been pulled down, to be rebuilt.

At this time Alexander, (for that was the name which he assumed,) pretending to be the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, ^b laid claim to the Syrian monarchy; and being well supported by foreign powers, seized Ptolemais, a city of Palestine, and was making preparations to drive Demetrius out of the throne. On this occasion the two rival princes did both make their court to Jonathan, as thinking him a good ally: Demetrius ³ sent him letters, constituting him his general in Judea, with full authority to raise forces, and to provide them with arms to come to his assistance, and commanding, at the same time, that the hostages, which were in the fortress of Jerusalem, should be delivered to him; which accordingly was done. ⁴ Alexander, on the other hand, ^c having sent him a purple robe and a crown of gold, as ensigns of great dignity, made him a grant of the high-priesthood, and of the honour to be called the king's friend. Demetrius hearing of this, ⁵ and being resolved to outbid Alexander, made him still more advantageous offers: but the Jews, remembering what a bitter enemy he had been to all those that had adhered to the true interest of their country, and suspecting that these offers proceeded only from the necessity of his affairs, which would certainly be revoked as soon as the storm was blown over, resolved rather to enter into league with Alexander: and therefore Jonathan, ^d accepting of his grant of the high priest's Timareus, another favourite of the king's, was governor of it; but on the coming of Demetrius to the crown, they were both found guilty of great misdemeanours, for which Timareus was put to death; but Heraclides made his escape out of the kingdom, and took up his residence at Rhodes. While he was there, Demetrius, having given himself up entirely to luxury and sloth, so neglected the affairs of government, that his subjects justly took a disgust against him, and were ready to enter into any conspiracy to depose him; which Heraclides understanding, in hopes of making a revolution in favour of himself, he contrived this plot.—In the isle of Rhodes there was a youth of a very mean and obscure condition, called Balas, but, in other respects, every way fit for his purpose. Him he prevailed with to pass for the son of Antiochus Epiphanes; and having thoroughly instructed him how to act his part, he carried him to Rome, where, by his craft and earnest solicitations, he not only prevailed with the senate to own him, but procured a decree from them likewise, permitting him to recover the kingdom of Syria out of the hands of Demetrius, and promising their assistance in doing it. By virtue of this decree he raised forces, and with them sailing to Ptolemais in Palestine, seized that city; and there, by the name of Alexander, son of Antiochus Epiphanes, took upon him to be king of Syria. Great numbers, out of disaffection to Demetrius, flocked to him; so that, at length, Demetrius being defeated and slain, Alexander obtained the full possession of the Syrian empire.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 152.

^c The letter which he sent him, together with these, is to this effect:—'King Alexander, to his brother Jonathan, &c. Being informed of your power and valour, and that you are worthy of friendship, we constitute you high priest of your nation; and it is our pleasure that you should be enrolled in the number of the king's friends. To this end we have sent you a purple robe, and a golden crown, not doubting of a suitable return from you, for our affection and friendship.'—Joseph. Antiq. b. 13. c. 5.

^d From the time of the return from the Babylonish captivity, the office of high priest had been in the family of Jozadack, and, in a lineal descent, was transmitted down to Onias, the third of that name. He was supplanted by Jason his brother, as Jason was by his brother Menelaus, and after the death of Menelaus, Alcimus, who was of a different family, was put into the office by the command of the king of Syria. Whether the Amosæans were of the race of Jozadack, or not, it is no where said; but it is certain that they were of the course of Jearib, (1 Mac. ii. 1.), which was the first class of the sons Aaron; and therefore, upon the failure of the former pontifical family, they had the best right

^a It is most likely, that Demetrius had, by this time, received the letters which were sent to him by the Romans in behalf of the Jews, and thereupon gave Bacchides orders to surcease his vexations of that people; and that, in obedience to these orders, Bacchides took occasion, on the death of Alcimus, to leave the country.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 160.

office, did, on the feast of tabernacles, which soon ensued, put on the pontifical robe, and officiate as high priest, after that the place, from the death of Alcimus, had been vacant seven years.

In the mean time, the two contending kings having drawn together all their forces, committed the determination of their cause to a decisive battle, in which Demetrius ^a being defeated and slain, and Alexander, by this victory, made master of the whole Syrian empire, ¹ he sent to Ptolemy king of Egypt, demanding his daughter Cleopatra in marriage. To this marriage (which was performed at Ptolemais) Jonathan the high priest was invited, and was received by both the kings (for Ptolemy was likewise at the nuptials) with great favour, especially by Ptolemy, who, to do him a particular honour, caused him to be clothed in purple, and to take place near himself, among the first princes of his kingdom; and, besides making him general of all his forces in Judea, gave him an office ^b of great credit and renown in his palace.

But Alexander himself did not long enjoy this prosperous state. Demetrius, ² the son of the late Demetrius, resolving to revenge his father's death, and recover his kingdom, came from Crete, (where he and his brother Antiochus had been concealed in the late troubles,) and with an army of mercenaries, landed in Cilicia. It was not long before he gained over to his interest Apollonius ^c to succeed. With this right it was, that Jonathan took the office: and in his family it became settled, and continued for several descents, until the time of Herod, who, from an office of inheritance, changed it into that of arbitrary will and pleasure. Whoever had the power after him, put the high priests in or out, as they thought fit, till at length the office was extinguished by the destruction of the temple by the Romans.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 253.

^a In the first onset, Demetrius's left wing put the opposite wing of the enemy to flight; but as he pursued them too far, (a fault in war which has lost many victories,) by the time that they came back, the right wing, in which Demetrius fought in person, was overborne, and he slain in the rout: for his horse having plunged him into a bog, they who pursued him shot at him there with their arrows, till he died.—*Joseph. ^b The word meridarches, which we translate a duke, Grocius, in his commentary on 1 Mac. x. 65, makes to be the chief sewer, which, even in the German empire, is an office that one of the electors bears: but, in his commentary on Matth. xix. 28., he makes it denote the governor of a province: and if, in this place, it were so taken, it would better become Jonathan, one would think, to be made governor of some part of the Syrian empire, than to be the regulator of the dishes at the royal table.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 150.

^c Apollonius was a common name among the Syro-Macedonians and Greeks; and in the history of the Maccabees we find so many mentioned of that name, that, for the prevention of mistakes, it may not be improper to give some account of the several persons who bore it. The first that we meet with of that name, is Apollonius, the son of Thraseas, (2 Mac. iii. 5.) who was governor of Cælo-Syria and Phœnicia, under Seleucus Philopater, when Heliodorus came to Jerusalem, to rob the temple. He was chief minister of state to Seleucus; but, on the accession of his brother Antiochus Epiphanes to the crown, he left Syria, and retired to Miletus. He had a son of his own name, that was bred up at Rome, and resided with Demetrius, the son of Seleucus Philopater, who was then an hostage in that place. When Demetrius recovered the crown of Syria, this Apollonius became his prime favourite, and was made governor of Cælo-Syria and Phœnicia, the same government which his father held the governor of Cælo-Syria, who, to oblige Jonathan to quit Alexander's party, and join with Demetrius, ³ marched an army as far as Jamma, and from thence sent a challenge to Jonathan to leave his fastnesses on the mountains, and come and fight him on the plains.

Provoked at this message, Jonathan marched out with ten thousand men. He first took Joppa, in the sight of Apollonius and his army, and then joining battle, not only vanquished him in the open field, but pursued his broken forces to Azotus. Here was a famous temple of the god Dagon, unto which the Syrians fled for shelter; but Jonathan entering the town, burnt it to the ground, and set the temple on fire; so that the number of those who were slain in battle, and perished by the flames, amounted to no less than eight thousand men. After this, having treated the neighbouring towns, that belonged to the enemy, in the like manner, he led his victorious army back to Jerusalem, loaded with spoils; whither he had not been long come, before Alexander, hearing of his renowned actions in favour of his cause, ⁴ sent him a ^d buckle of gold, such as none but the royal family were allowed to wear, and, at the same time, made him a present of the city of Ekron, and all the territories thereunto belonging.

⁵ When Apollonius, governor of Cælo-Syria, had declared for Demetrius, Alexander called in his father-in-law, Ptolemy Philometer, to his assistance. He marched into Palestine with a great army; and as he passed, in all the cities (which, by Alexander's orders, opened their gates to him) he left a good number of his own soldiers to strengthen the garrisons. But, whether or not this might give some umbrage to Alexander, so it was, that Ptolemy discovered a design, which Ammonius, Alexander's great favourite, had formed, to have him cut off at his coming to Ptolemais; and upon his demanding justice to be done to the traitor, by Alexander's refusing to give him up, he plainly perceived that the king was a party to the treason, and thence began to harbour an implacable hatred against him.

He therefore marched his army to Antioch; and, hav-under Seleucus Philopater; and this I take to be the same Apollonius, who, being continued in the same government by Alexander, now revolted from him, to embrace the interest of Demetrius, the son of his old master, and to engage Jonathan to do the like, marched his forces against him. Another Apollonius is spoken of, (2 Mac. iv. 21,) as the chief minister of Antiochus Epiphanes, who from him was sent as ambassador, first to Rome and afterwards to Ptolemy Philometer, king of Egypt; and him I take to be the same, that, with a detachment of two and twenty thousand men, was sent to destroy Jerusalem, and build a fortress on Mount Aera. There are, besides these, two other persons, in the history of the Maccabees, mentioned under the name of Apollonius. The former of these, being governor of Samaria in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, (1 Mac. iii. 10,) was slain in battle by Judas Maccabæus; and the latter (who is called the son of Gonneus,) (2 Mac. xii. 2,) being governor of some toparchy in Palestine, under Antiochus Epiphanes, did then signalize himself by being a great enemy to the Jews.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 148.

^d The golden buckle, which was worn upon the shoulder, was a very singular mark of distinction both among the Greeks and the Persians, from whom the Macedonians took it, and was generally made the reward of great and gallant actions in war.—Calmel's Commentary on 1 Mac. x. 89.

ing taken his daughter from Alexander, gave her to his rival Demetrius, and with her assurance to restore him to his father's throne. ¹The Antiochians, taking the opportunity of Ptolemy's approach to execute their resentments upon Ammonius, rose in a tumult, and slew him; and then opening their gates to Ptolemy, were all disposed to make him their king; but he modestly declining that offer, recommended to them the restoration of Demetrius, the true heir: whereupon Demetrius was received into the city, and placed on the throne of his ancestors.

Alexander, who was then in Cilicia, hearing of this, came with all his forces towards Antioch, wasting the country with fire and sword: but when Ptolemy with his new son-in-law, met him, and gave him battle, his army was routed, and himself was forced to fly to Arabia, where Zabdiel, king of the country, cut off his head, and sent it as a present to Ptolemy, who was not a little pleased with the sight of it. His joys however did not last long: for in five days' time he died of the wounds he had received in battle, leaving Demetrius in quiet possession of his father's kingdom, which he having recovered by virtue of this victory, did thenceforward take upon him the name of Nicanor, that is, conqueror.

During these transactions, Jonathan ² laid siege to the fortress at Jerusalem; but some of the garrison, escaping by night, came and acquainted Demetrius with it, who thereupon marched from Antioch with an army to relieve it. But coming to Ptolemais, he stopped there and sent for Jonathan to appear before him, and answer to such accusations as were preferred against him. Jonathan went thither, though he ordered the siege still to go on; and, when he came to Demetrius, by his rich presents and wise management, he so mollified the king, and insinuated himself into his good graces, that he not only confirmed him in the possession of what he had, but honoured him likewise with many new favours, and upon the payment of 300 talents, agreed to exempt from all tolls, taxes and tributes, all the places that were under his government.

Jonathan, upon his return to Jerusalem, pressed the siege of the fortress very closely; but finding little or no success therein, he sent an embassy, ³ to Demetrius, desiring him to withdraw the garrison, which he could not expel. This and much more Demetrius promised to do for him, if he would but send him some forces to reduce the inhabitants of Antioch, who, incensed by his cruelty and oppression, had taken up arms against him. Jonathan immediately dispatched 3000 choice men to his aid, who coming to Antioch, when the people had beset the place with an intent to murder the tyrant, as they called him, fell on with fire and sword, and having burned a great part of the city, and slain of the inhabitants about 100,000 persons, obliged the rest to have recourse to the king's clemency, and pray for peace. But all this service availed nothing. Demetrius, ⁴ seeing this storm overpast, forgot the bargains which he had made with Jonathan at Ptolemais; and, though he had received the 300 talents in lieu of them, threatened him with military execution, unless he sent the taxes and tribute which were usually paid by his predecessors; and would certainly have done all that he had threatened, had not Tryphon found out another employment for his arms.

This Tryphon had formerly served Alexander, as governor of Antioch, but, in the present king's reign, was laid aside. Observing, however, that the cruelty and tyranny, which were every where practised, the disbanding the Syrian soldiers, and retaining only foreigners in pay, together with many more grievances, which the people laboured under, had quite alienated their hearts, and made them ready for a general defection, he thought this no unfit opportunity to put in practice his long concerted scheme of advancing himself to the crown of Syria.

To this purpose he goes into Arabia; ⁵ gets Antiochus, son of the late Alexander, into his hands; brings him into Syria, claims the kingdom for him; and, to support this claim, all the soldiers whom Demetrius had disbanded, and several others, whom his ill conduct had made his enemies, flock in great numbers to the pretender. With these Tryphon marches against Demetrius, vanquishes him in battle, forces him into Seleucia, and having taken possession of Antioch, places Antiochus upon the throne, and gives him the name of Theos, or the Divine.

The ill return which Demetrius made Jonathan, was, doubtless, the chief reason for his declaring for this new king; ⁶ who, by the advice of those that were about him, took care, not only to confirm him in the office of high priest, and in all his other places and dignities, but to make likewise his brother Simon commander of all his forces, from Tyre to the frontiers of Egypt. Upon this defection from him, Demetrius sent all the troops that were left in Cælo-Syria and Phœnicia, to chastise him for it: but he not only repulsed them twice, but took Gaza likewise, and all the country as far as Damascus; while Simon, ⁷ whom he left in Judea, penetrating into the land of the Philistines, took Joppa, and placed a strong garrison in it. Tryphon, who had no other aim in getting young Antiochus into his hands, than to serve his wicked purposes, knew very well, that, as long as Jonathan continued in his interest, it would be in vain for him to attempt the crown; and ⁸ therefore, having prevailed with him to dismiss his army, and to accompany him to Ptolemais, under pretence of putting that place into his hands, with no more than a thousand men, they were no sooner entered, but the garrison, having shut the gates upon them, seized Jonathan, and put his men to the sword.

Having thus circumvented Jonathan, he took him along with him, and marched his army into Judea; but the Jews by this time had chosen Simon his brother for their commander, and were ready to give him a warm reception. Not finding himself therefore able to engage them, he sent Simon this deceitful message,—⁹ “That he had seized Jonathan only because he owed 100 talents to the king; but that in case he would send the money, and Jonathan's two sons to be hostages for their father's fidelity, he would set him again at liberty.” Simon soon

I saw through this deceit; but he complied with the traitor's demand, for fear it should be said that he had not done all that lay in his power to save his brother's life; and accordingly sent the money, and two young men. But when the villain had got them in his power, he put both them and their father to death; and thinking that he had now nothing to obstruct his main design, he caused Antiochus to be murdered privately; and then assuming the crown, declared himself king of Syria in his stead.

When Simon heard of his brother's death, and that he was buried at Bascama in the land of Gilead, ¹ he sent and fetched his dead body from thence; and, having buried it with great funeral solemnity in his father's sepulchre at Modin, he erected over it a stately monument, ² all built of white marble, and curiously wrought and polished.

² Simon, as soon as he was admitted to the government of the land, sent to Demetrius, who was then at Naodicea, a crown of gold, and ambassadors to treat with him about terms of peace and alliance. The king granted to Simon a confirmation of the high priesthood and principality, and to the people a release of all taxes, tolls, and tributes, with an oblivion of all past acts of hostility, on condition that they would join with him against the usurper: in virtue of which treaty, Simon, being made sovereign prince of the land, and the land freed from all foreign yoke, the Jews from this time, instead of dating their instruments and contracts by the years of the Syrian kings, as hitherto they had done, dated them by the years of Simon and his successors.

Having thus obtained the independent sovereignty of the land, ³ he took a progress through it, to inspect what was wanting for its security; repairing the fortifications that were decayed, making new ones where they were wanted, and besieging and taking the places that stood out against him. He had no occasion however to besiege the fortress of Jerusalem, because the wall which his brother Jonathan had built against it had so cut off all communication with the city, that the garrison being sore distressed for want of provisions, and all other necessaries, was forced to surrender the place; and Simon, wisely considering how much the city of Jerusalem had been infested by that citadel, pulled it down to the ground, that it might no longer be a retreat to sedition and faction; and, to prevent its being built at any time, levelled the hill on which it was situated; so that now no eminence was left but the mount of the temple only.

Demetrius ^b at this time was prisoner in Parthia, and

^a This edifice, being erected on an eminence, was seen far off at sea; and, on that coast, was taken notice of as a good sea-mark. Near to the monument Simon placed seven pyramids, two for his father and mother, four for his four brothers, and the seventh for himself, and then encompassed the whole with a stately portico, supported by marble pillars, each of one entire piece, and whereon were engraved ships and arms, and other military ensigns. Josephus tells us, that this whole fabric was standing entire in his days, and looked upon as a very curious and excellent piece of architecture; (Antiq. b. 13. c. 11.) and Eusebius mentions it as still in being in his time, which was two hundred years after the time of Josephus.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 144.

^b The reason of Demetrius's being in this condition in this place, by profane historians, is said to be this:—As the Par-

Cleopatra his queen had shut up herself and her children in Seleucia; ^c but, fearing to fall into the hands of the traitor Tryphon, and being provoked at her husband's marrying the daughter of Mithridates, king of Parthia, ^d she sent to his brother Antiochus, who still continued in Crete, offering him the crown, and herself in marriage, if he would come and join his interest with hers against Tryphon. This offer he readily accepted of; and, in the beginning of the next year, landed in Syria, with an army of mercenaries, which was soon augmented by a large accession of the usurper's forces, which every day deserted from him: so that, not being able to keep the field, he fled from place to place, till at length, coming to Apamea, ^d his own native city, he was there taken and put to death. This end being put to his usurpation, Antiochus became fully possessed of his father's throne; and, being a man much addicted to hunting, he had for that reason the name of Sidetes, which, in the Syrian language, signifies the hunter.

Before Antiochus landed in Syria, to gain Simon over to his interest, he wrote him a letter, ^e wherein he made him many grants, and promised him more; but, as soon as he was settled in the kingdom, he forgot his promises, thians had at this time overrun in a manner all the East, and had made themselves masters of every country from the river Indus to the Euphrates, those who were of the Macedonian race in those parts, not bearing their usurpation and insolence, invited Demetrius, by repeated embassies, to come to their relief, promising him a general revolt from the Parthians, and such assistance of forces against them as would enable him to suppress these usurpers, and recover to his dominions all the provinces of the East. Upon confidence of these promises, he undertook the expedition; and found as soon as he appeared, that the Elymaeans, the Persians, and the Bactrians, declared for him. By the assistance of these nations he overthrew the Parthians in several conflicts; but at last, under the show of a treaty of peace, being drawn into a snare, he was made prisoner, and all his army cut to pieces. The king that reigned in Parthia at this time was Mithridates, the son of Priapatites, who, having thus got Demetrius into his power, carried him round the revolted provinces, that, by seeing the prince whom they confided in reduced to this ignominious condition, they might more easily be brought to submit to their former yoke; but, when he had done this, he allowed him a maintenance suitable to the state of a king, and gave him one of his daughters, whose name was Rhodaguna, in marriage.—Justin, b. 41. c. 5, and 6; Joseph. Antiq. b. 13. c. 9 and 12; and Orosius, b. 5. c. 4.

^c Seleucia was a city of Syria, situate upon the Mediterranean, near the place where the Orontes discharges itself into that sea. It was generally called Pieria, to distinguish it from other cities of the same name; and from it the country adjoining received the name of Seleucia. To the natural strength of the place, were added so many fortifications, that, in the opinion of Strabo, the city was rendered impregnable. Pompey, the Roman general, conferred on it the privilege of a free city, a privilege which was confirmed by several emperors, as appears from many ancient medals. The chief deity of the inhabitants, previous to the reception of Christianity, was Jupiter, whose worship was splendidly celebrated on Casius, a neighbouring mountain. It was from the port of this city that Paul and Barnabas embarked for Cyprus, Acts xiii. 4; and, like the neighbouring city of Antioch, where the disciples of Jesus were first called Christians. The city of Seleucia also very early received the gospel, probably about A. D. 43. At a subsequent period it became an eminent Christian city; but nothing remains of Seleucia at the present time, except ruins, among which are these of some of its ancient churches and convents.—Ed.

^d It is a city of Syria, lying upon the Orontes, and was built, as is believed, either by Seleucus the first king of Syria, or by his son Antiochus Soter, in honour of Queen Apamea the wife of Seleucus, the mother of Antiochus.—Calmel's Dictionary, under the word.

and sent an ambassador, demanding him to deliver up Joppa and Gazara, and other places, or else to pay him a thousand talents of silver for them. ¹ These conditions were thought too unreasonable to be complied with; and therefore, when Antiochus sent an army under the command of Cendebeus, to enforce them, Simon, though very far advanced in years, with a juvenile courage, prepared to give him a warm reception; and, with his two sons, Judas and John, who was afterwards called Hyrcanus, put his army to flight almost at the first onset, and, in the pursuit, cut off a great number of them: but, to be revenged of him for this defeat, Antiochus concerted the most abominable measures.

Simon had a son-in-law named Ptolemy, whom he had appointed governor of the plains of Jericho. ² This man, who was rich and ambitious, had laid a design, which he communicated to Antiochus, for the usurpation of the government to himself; but this could not well be done without the destruction of Simon and his family. As Simon, therefore, and two of his sons, Judas and Mattathias, were making a progress through the cities of Judah, when they came to Jericho, Ptolemy invited them to an entertainment which he had prepared for them in a castle of his own building; but, while they were drinking and making merry, he caused them, and all that attended them, to be assassinated; and, thinking thereupon to make himself master of the whole land, he sent a party to Gazara, where John Hyrcanus, ^a Simon's third son, resided, with a design to slay him likewise. But Hyrcanus having had intelligence of what passed at Jericho, was prepared to receive his intended murderers, and having dispatched them, hastened to Jerusalem to secure the city, and the mount of the temple, against those whom the traitor had sent to take possession of both. After this Hyrcanus was declared high priest and prince of the Jews, in place of his father Simon, who was greatly ^b lamented; but what finally became of this execrable villain, ^c we have no manner of account in history.

³ Antiochus having received from Ptolemy an account of the death of Simon and his sons, thought that he had now a fair opportunity to reduce Judea again under the Syrian empire; and therefore he immediately marched a large army thither; and having overrun the country, and driven Hyrcanus out of the field, he shut him up and all his forces within the walls of Jerusalem, and there besieged him. The siege was carried on vigorously; and the defence of the place was executed as gallantly: but Hyrcanus being distressed for want of provisions for so vast a number of people as was in the city, was forced to sue for peace, which was granted him upon these terms, that the besieged should deliver up their arms; that Jerusalem should be dismantled; that tribute should be paid to the king for Joppa, and the other towns which were held by the Jews out of Judea; and that, to buy off the fortress of Jerusalem, from being rebuilt, which Antiochus much insisted on, they should pay him five hundred talents; ^d three hundred down in hand, and the off, no grief and lamentation, too great for a man of his uncommon merit.—Universal History, b. ii. c. 11.

^c Josephus has something peculiar in his account of this vile miscreant, namely, that after he had killed his father-in-law Simon, he seized on his wife, and two of her children, and with them betook himself to a certain castle not far from Jerusalem, called Dagon; that when Hyrcanus came to besiege it, the villain's custom was, to bring out his mother and brothers, and to whip and torment them in the sight of all the people, with menaces to cast them headlong from the battlements, unless Hyrcanus withdrew the siege; that when Hyrcanus, out of tenderness to his mother and brothers, was thinking of raising the siege, and suffering the traitor to escape, his mother called aloud to him from the walls, not to regard her, or her children's sufferings, but to proceed in the siege with vigour, that so he might do himself and his family right, in taking a just vengeance upon that execrable monster; that, notwithstanding this magnanimous exhortation, he could not bear to see his relations tortured, and therefore delayed the siege, until the sabbatical year came on, wherein the Jews were obliged to rest; so that Ptolemy, by this means, being delivered from the war, and the siege, after he had slain the mother and brothers of Hyrcanus, withdrew to Zeno, surnamed Catyla, a tyrant who at that time had usurped to himself the government of Philadelphia: (Antiq. b. xiii. c. 15.) But our learned Usher is of opinion, that this whole account of Josephus is fabulous.

^d Josephus tells us that Hyrcanus, to find some money for this, and other occasions of the government, broke up the sepulchre of David, and took from thence three thousand talents, and that Herod the Great did afterwards the like, Antiq. b. xvii. c. 16, and b. xvi. c. 11. But both these stories are highly improbable. David had now been dead nearly nine hundred years, and what is told of this treasure, supposes it to have been buried with him all this time. It supposes, that as oft as the city of Jerusalem, the palace, and the temple, during the reigns of the kings of Judah, had been plundered of all their wealth and treasure by prevailing enemies, this dead stock still remained safe from all rifle or violation. It supposes, that as oft as these kings were forced to take all the treasure that was found in the house of the Lord, as well as in their own, to relieve the exigencies of the state, they never meddled with this, that was uselessly buried with David in his grave. It supposes, that when one of the worst of their kings (2 Kings xv. 8, &c. and 2 Chron. xxviii. 21, &c.) plundered the temple of its sacred vessels, and cut them in pieces, to melt them down into money for his common occasions; and that when one of the best of them (2 Kings xviii. 15, 16.) was forced to cut off the gold wherewith the gates and pillars of the temple were overlaid, to bribe a destroying enemy, this useless treasure still continued untouched. Nay, it supposes, that when Nebuchadnezzar destroyed both the city and the temple of Jerusalem; so that, for many years they both lay in rubbish, this

^a Why this captain was called Hyrcanus, some impute to the victory which he obtained over Hyrcanus, whom the books of the Maccabees, and Josephus, call Cendebeus, though others say, that he had this name from a gallant action against the Hyrcanians, perhaps in the expedition wherein he accompanied Alexander Sidetes beyond the Euphrates.—Cabnet's Dictionary, under the word.

^b The commendation which the author of the first book of the Maccabees, (chap. xiv. 4,) &c. bestows upon Simon, is worth our observation; for he therein tells us, that he 'sought the good of the nation,' in every thing, 'so that his authority always pleased them well;' that during his administration, whilst Syria, and other neighbouring kingdoms were almost destroyed by wars, the Jews lived quietly, 'every man under his own vine and fig tree,' enjoying, without fear, the fruits of their labours, and behaving with pleasure the flourishing state of their country; their trade increased by the reduction of Joppa, and other maritime places; their territories enlarged; their armies well disciplined; their towns and fortresses well garrisoned; their religion and liberties secured; their land freed from heathen enemies, and Jewish apostates; and their friendship courted by all the nations about them, even by the Romans and the Lacedemonians. He observes further, that this Simon was no less zealous for the service of God, in exterminating apostasy, superstition, idolatry, and every thing else that was contrary to his laws; that he was a great protector of the true Israelites, and a friend to the poor; that he restored the service of the temple to its ancient splendour, and repaired the number of its sacred vessels; so that we need not wonder, if the Jewish sanhedrim thought no dignity or honour, while he lived, and when he was so basely and barbarously cut other two in a reasonable time, for which they were to give hostages.

The treaty being thus concluded, Hyrcanus invited the king and his army into the city, where he gave them a splendid and most magnificent reception, and afterwards, with some of his forces, attended him to the Parthian war: for Antiochus, under pretence of rescuing his brother Demetrius Nicanor from the hands of Phraortes king of Parthia, who had long detained him as prisoner, marched against him with a powerful army. In three pitched battles he gained the victory, and recovered Babylonia, Medea, and some other provinces that formerly belonged to the Syrian monarchy; and as Hyrcanus had his share in all these actions, he returned with the glory of them at the end of the year; but Antiochus¹ and his army, who chose to winter in the east, were all, in one night,^a destroyed by the inhabitants of the country.

In the mean time, Demetrius,² whom Phraortes^b had set at liberty, was returned to Syria, and, upon his brother's death, had recovered his kingdom; but still persisting in his vicious courses, and tyrannical way of government, he had not been long reinstated, before his subjects rebelled against him, and one Alexander Zabina, pretending to be the son of Alexander Balas, laid claim to his crown; and by the assistance of Ptolemy Physcon, king of Egypt,³ defeated him in a pitched battle. Demetrius fled for refuge to Ptolemais, where his wife Cleopatra^c then resided; but she ordered the gates to be shut against him, so that he was forced to betake himself for refuge to Tyre, where he fell into the hands of his enemies, who first made him prisoner, and then put him to death. Zabina, by this means, ascended the throne of Syria, but he did not sit long there; for Physcon, expecting that he should hold it in homage from him, which the other was not inclinable to do, resolved to pull him down as fast as he had set him up; and therefore, having married his daughter Tryphæna to Antiochus Gryphus, the son of the late Demetrius, he assisted him with an army, which vanquished Zabina, and compelled him to shut himself up in Antioch: but the Antiochians, being informed that he intended to rob their temple of Jupiter of a golden statue, which was very massy, to enable him to carry on the war, thrust him out from thence, so that wandering from place to place, he fell at last into the hands of those who carried him to Antiochus, by whose direction he was put to death.

During these divisions and disturbances, Hyrcanus laid hold on the opportunity, not only to enlarge his own territories, but to shake off the Syrian yoke likewise, and make himself wholly independent. He built the stately tower, or rather castle of Baris,^d upon a steep rock, that was fifty cubits high, and on all sides inaccessible, except towards the temple. He took several cities, which the great draughts of men the kings of Syria had made for their foreign expeditions, had left unprovided with garrisons; he subdued Shechem, the chief seat of the sect of the Samaritans, and destroyed their temple which Samballat had built them on Mount Gerazim: ⁴ he conquered the Idumeans, and prevailed with them all to become proselytes^e to the Jewish reli-treasure in David's sepulchre lay, all the while, safe and secure under it; and that when Antiochus Epiphanes, in like manner, destroyed the city, and robbed the temple of all that he could find, this treasure still escaped his rapacious hands, nor was ever molested, till Hyrcanus, at this time, was forced to make hold with it: all which suppositions seem highly improbable, and beyond belief. There is this, however, to be said in the matter, that as there certainly was a bank or treasury in the temple where money was laid up for the support of the poor, for the relief of widows and fatherless children, and for the maintenance of divine service; and where the great men, and rich men of the nation, were used to deposit their wealth, for its better security: it is not improbable, that upon the account of the frequent invasions and depredations they were liable to, this treasure might be kept in some secret and subterraneous place, unknown to all, but such as were at the head of affairs; that Hyrcanus, being now under great difficulty to raise money, might borrow it out of this bank, till better times enabled him to repay it; and that Herod, when he plundered it quite, might trump up this plausible story, that it neither belonged to church, nor poor, nor any private person, but had been deposited there by David and his successors, as a proper supply for the state in times of need.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 155; and Universal History, b. ii. c. 11.

^a The army, which, together with its attendants, amounted to the number of nearly four hundred thousand persons, being forced to disperse all over the country, were quartered at too great a distance from each other to be able in any time to gather together in a body; and as they had grievously oppressed all places wherever they lay, the inhabitants took the advantage of this their dispersion, and conspired with the Parthians, in one and the same day, to fall upon them in their several quarters, and cut their throats; which accordingly they did, and when Antiochus, with the forces which he had about him, hastened to the assistance of the quarters that were near him, he was overpowered, and slain; so that of this numerous army, there scarce returned a man into Syria, to carry the doleful news of this terrible overthrow. Phraortes, however, (who was then king of Parthia,) caused the body of Antiochus to be taken up from among the dead, and having put it into a silver coffin, sent it honourably into Syria, to be there buried among his ancestors.—Justin, b. xxxviii. c. 12; *Joseph. ^c This Cleopatra was the daughter of Ptolemy Philometer, king of Egypt, and Cleopatra his wife. She was at first married to Alexander Balas, and afterwards to this Demetrius, in her father's lifetime. While Demetrius was detained a prisoner in Parthia, she became the wife of his brother Antiochus Sidetes; but, upon the death of Sidetes, the restoration of Demetrius, and recovery of his kingdom, she returned to his bed again, but never had any great esteem for him, because in his captivity he had married the daughter of the king of Parthia.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 127.

^d The word baris, which is originally Chaldee, signifies properly a house, or castle, inclosed on every side, as this was encompassed with the wall which Simon built to stop the communication between the temple and the fortress of Acre. Here it was that Hyrcanus built an apartment, for the safe keeping of his pontifical robes and ornaments, whenever he undressed himself; and here the Asmonean princes took up their abode, and made it their royal palace, until Herod ascended the throne, and having rebuilt, enlarged, and beautified it, gave it the name of Antonic, in honour of his friend M. Antony.—Universal History, b. ii. c. 11.

^e Among the Jews there were two sorts of proselytes, namely, the proselytes of the gate, and the proselytes of justice. 1. The proselytes of the gate, were so called, because they were permitted to dwell with the Jews in the same cities, and the occasion of their name seems to have been taken from that expression in the fourth commandment, 'the strangers which are within thy gates'; where the word ger, which we render strangers, does every gion, so that thenceforward they were incorporated into the same church and nation, and in time lost the name of Idumeans or Edomites, and were all called Jews. He renewed the alliance with the Romans, and, by a decree^a from them, obtained greater privileges and advantages than the Jews ever had before; and now, being much increased in riches and power, he sent his two sons, Aristobulus and Antigonus, to besiege Samaria, who on this occasion gave good proofs of their valour and conduct. The place held out for a whole year; but, being forced to surrender at last, by the direction of Hyrcanus, it was utterly demolished: for he caused not only the houses and walls to be pulled down, and razed, but trenches to be dug every way across the ground whereon it stood, and to be filled with water, that it might never again be built.

After the taking of Samaria, the remainder of his life Hyrcanus enjoyed in full quiet from all foreign wars; but, towards the conclusion of it, met with some trouble from the Pharisees, a prevailing sect among the Jews. They, by their pretences to extraordinary strictness in religion, had gained to themselves a great reputation and interest among the common people; and, for this reason, Hyrcanus endeavoured to gain their esteem by all manner of favours. Having therefore, one day, invited several of their leading men to a splendid entertainment, when the banquet was over, he desired them to tell him, 'if, in the conduct of his life, he had done any thing contrary to justice and religion, according to the maxims received and taught amongst them.'⁷ As soon as he had ended his discourse, all began to praise his whit as properly signify proselytes. Now, this kind of proselytes was obliged only to renounce idolatry, and to worship God according to the law of nature, which the doctors of the Talmud reduced to seven articles, called by them the 'seven precepts of the sons of Noah.' Whoever performed these were looked upon as in a state of acceptance with God; and allowed, not only to live quietly in their cities, but to resort likewise to their temple, there to offer up their prayers; but then they were permitted to enter no farther than into the outer court, which was called the 'court of the Gentiles.' 2. The 'proselytes of justice' were so called, because they took upon them to observe the whole law, both moral and ceremonial, in the latter of which some of the Jews, and especially the Pharisees, made justification to consist. The former sort of proselytes had no form of initiation, but these were admitted by baptism, sacrifice, and circumcision; and when they were thus admitted, they were received into the Jewish church, and to all the rights and privileges of church-membership, in the same manner as if they had been natural Jews.—Præface Générale sur le Nov. Test. par de Beausobre, and L'enfant; and Prideaux's Connection, anno 129.

^a The ambassadors whom Hyrcanus sent to Rome to renew the league, which his father Simon had made with the senate, made their complaint—That Antiochus Sidetes had made war upon the Jews, contrary to what the Romans had in their behalf decreed in that league: that they had taken from them several cities, and made them become tributary to them for others, and forced them to a dishonourable peace, by besieging Jerusalem; whereupon the senate decreed, that whatever of this kind had been done against them, since the time of the late treaty with Simon, should be all null and void; that all the places which had either been taken from them, or made tributary by the Syrians, should be restored, and made free from all homage, tribute, and other services; that, for the future, the Syrian kings should have no right to march their armies through the Jewish territories; that for all the damages which the Syrians had done the Jews, reparation should be made them; and that ambassadors should be sent from Rome to see this decree put in execution.—Jewish Antiq. b. xiii. c. 17.

When the rest had done their encomiums, Eleazar, who had hitherto said nothing, rose up, and, directing his discourse to Hyrcanus, "Since you desire," said he, "to have the truth freely told you, if you would show yourself a just man, resign the high priesthood, and content yourself with the civil government of the nation." Hyrcanus then asking him for what reason he gave him that advice? "Because," replied he, "we are assured, by the testimony of the ancients among us, that your mother was a captive taken in the wars, and being therefore the son of a strange woman, you are incapable of that high office and dignity."

This was an allegation false in fact, and therefore all the company resented it with a just indignation; but Hyrcanus was so exasperated at it, that he resolved to be revenged in a very signal manner. This disposition one Jonathan, an intimate friend of his, but a zealous Sadducee, observing, took the opportunity to endeavour to set him against the whole sect of the Pharisees, (among whom Hyrcanus had been bred up,) and to draw him over to that of the Sadducees. To this purpose he suggested to him,—"That this was not the single act of Eleazar, but, most certainly a thing concerted by the whole party; that Eleazar, in speaking it out, was no more than the mouth of the rest; and that, to satisfy himself in these particulars, he needed only refer it to them in what manner the calumniator deserved to be punished." Hyrcanus followed his advice: and therefore, consulting the chief leaders of the Pharisees with relation to the penalty which he might deserve, who had thus slandered the prince, and high priest of his nation, he received for answer,—"That as calumny was no capital crime, all the punishment that it merited could be only whipping^b or imprisonment;"² which fully convinced Hyrcanus, that what Jonathan had suggested was true, and, from that very moment, he became a mortal enemy to the whole sect of the Pharisees. Their traditional constitutions he forthwith abrogated; he enjoined a penalty on all that should observe them; and he himself for ever renouncing their party, went over to that of the Sadducees. But, notwithstanding this, he was an excellent governor; and, from the time of his father's death, having had the administration of all affairs, both in church and state, for the space of nine and twenty years, at his death he left the high priesthood and sovereignty to Judas Aristobulus, who was the first that, in a formal manner, took upon him the title of a king, by putting a diadem on his head.

cause; and, not only to them, but also to all others, who suffered in the like cause under any of the Grecian kings, whether of Syria or Egypt, though some of them lived long before them. Thus those who suffered under Ptolemy Philopater, at Alexandria, fifty years before the time of Judas, were afterwards called Maccabees, as were likewise Eleazar, and the mother, and her seven sons, though they suffered likewise before Judas erected the standard which gave occasion to the name.

² According to the order of time, indeed, and the subject matter which they treat of, these books are wrong placed; for the third should be set first, the second placed before the first, and the fourth immediately after it; so that, to reduce them to right order, the first should be put in the place of the third, and the third in the place of the first. Grotius, indeed, is of opinion, that the third book, though it treats of matters antecedent to what is the subject of the first and second, was nevertheless written after them, even after the book of Ecclesiasticus, and upon that account had the name of the third book given it; but the true reason of its being postponed is:—that, being of less repute and authority than the two former, it has always been reckoned after them, according to the order of dignity, though it be before them in the order of time.

The first of these books ³ was originally written in the Chaldee ^a language of the Jerusalem dialect, which was the only language spoken in Judea after the return from the Babylonish captivity, and is a very accurate and excellent history, coming nearest to the style and manner of the sacred historical writings of any extant. The second is a compilation of several pieces; of two epistles from the Jews at Jerusalem to those of Alexandria, ⁴ which seem to be spurious; ^b of a preface preceding

Rather than do this therefore, the usual way was, to give one too few; and therefore St Paul tells us, 2 Cor. xi. 24, that when he was whipped by the Jews, he received forty stripes, save one. Prideaux's Connection, in the notes, anno 168.

^a It was extant in this language in the time of St Jerome; for he tells us, that he had seen it, and that the title which it then bore, was Sherlit sar bene El, that is, the sceptre of the prince of the sons of God, a title which well suited Judas, who was so valiant a commander of God's people then under persecution. From the Chaldee it was translated into Greek by Theodotion, as some think, though others account that version elder; and, from the Greek, both the Latin translation and our English did proceed.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 166.

^b The former of these epistles calls the feast of the dedication, Συνουχισμός ἐν Κουριεύς, that is, the feast of making tabernacles or booths in Cisten. Now, as the month Cisten fell in the middle of winter, it can hardly be presumed, that the people could either lie abroad in these booths, or find green boughs enough at this time of the year wherewith to make them. This is an incongruity enough to explode the former epistle. And then, as to the history; and of the history itself, which is an abridgement of a larger work, composed by one Jason, an Hellenist Jew of Cyrene; but the whole is by no means equal to the excellence and accuracy of the first. The third, ^c which seems to have been written by an Alexandrian Jew, ^d in the Greek language, is set off with enlargements and embellishments of the author's own invention; but, as to the main ground-work of it, or the reality of such a persecution raised against the Jews at Alexandria, it is undoubtedly true; and, though its style be a little too theatrical, its sentiments in many places are both beautiful and sublime. The fourth, ^e which is generally allowed to be the same with what is ascribed to Josephus, the Jewish historian, under the title of "The governing power of reason," is designed to enlarge and adorn the history of old Eleazar, and of the seven brothers, who, with their mother, suffered martyrdom under Antiochus, as it is related more succinctly in the second book of ⁵ Maccabees.

The author of the epistle to the Hebrews ^f has stamped some authority upon these books, by alluding to their history, and the punishment which the Maccabees were made to undergo; but we must not therefore receive them as canonical, because, according to the report of St Jerome, neither the Jewish nor the Christian church ever looked upon them in that capacity: the church indeed read the books of Maccabees but did not receive them among the canonical writings. They read them as books which contained lessons of wholesome instruction, and excellent examples of worthy patriots, and glorious martyrs suffering manfully in the defence of their religion and liberty, and ^g not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection.²

the second, it is not only written in the name of Judas Maccabeus, who was slain six and thirty years before, the date which it bears, but also contains such fabulous and absurd stuff, as could never have been written by the great council of the Jews, assembled at Jerusalem for the whole nation, as this pretends to be.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 166.

^c This book, though it is in most of the ancient manuscript copies of the Greek Septuagint, and quoted by several fathers as an holy and divine book, yet was it never inserted in the vulgar Latin translation of the bible; and, as our first English translations were made from that, none of them have it among the apocryphal books; nor has it ever since been added, though it certainly deserves a place therein much better than several other pieces that are there.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 214. This is a mistake. It was added to the other books in Becke's bible, (1551) and, lastly, in a new version, in Bishop Wilson's bible.—Bp. Gleig.

^d To this day it is extant in most of the ancient manuscript copies of the Greek Septuagint: as, particularly in the Alexandrian manuscript in our king's library, and in the Vatican manuscript at Rome. But, as it was never inserted in the vulgar Latin version of the bible, and as that version was the only one in use through the whole western church, until the reformation, it thence came to pass, that, in the first translations which we have of the bible in the English, the third book of Maccabees has never yet been inserted among other apocryphal tracts, though it certainly deserves a place there much better than some parts of the second book of the Maccabees.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 216.

^e This book, in like manner, though it be found in most of the ancient Greek manuscripts, is not to be met with in any of our Latin bibles; and has therefore no place among our apocryphal books.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 216.

the commanders we read of were carried away with their ambition, vanity or vain glory; and while they valued themselves upon the subduktion of others, had no rule or command over their own passions. But in this Jewish leader we find all the characters of a great hero: courage and intrepidity, guided by counsel and wisdom, and without any alloy either of rashness or pride. And what a profound knowledge he had of the laws of God, and the principles of true morality, every speech that he makes to his men, when he is animating them to the combat, and inspiring them with a contempt of the greatest dangers, is a sufficient indication.

He died indeed a little unfortunately, and, when his army had forsaken him, encountered his enemies with an incompetent strength; but, as he had all along fought under the protection of God's good providence, he had no more reason to be diffident at this time than he had been formerly. In his first engagement with the Syrians, when he was to encounter ¹ ' forty thousand horse, and seven thousand foot,' he made proclamation in the camp, that all such ² ' as had betrothed wives, or were building houses, or planting vineyards, or were any ways afraid,' might return home, which could not but reduce his army considerably; and yet we find him, with this handful of men, routing three generals that were sent against him at once, forcing and burning their camp, defeating their troops, and returning loaded with their spoils. His notion was, that God could save with a few as well as with a multitude; and therefore he might look on the desertion of his forces as a providential thing, to make the victory more conspicuous, and to magnify the divine interposition in his deliverance.

have here," says he, a "warlike bravery, in which there is no silly appearance of honour and decency, because he preferred death to slavery and disgrace."

The message which Moses sent to the king of Edom was delivered in these words,—' Let us pass, I pray thee, through thy country. We will not pass through the fields, or through the vineyards, neither will we drink of the water of thy wells. We will go by the king's highway; we will not turn to the right hand or to the left, until we have passed thy borders: and Edom said unto him, Thou shalt not pass by me, lest I come out against thee with the sword.' But hereupon a question has arisen, whether the Edomites might lawfully, and according to the rules of strict right, deny the Israelites a passage through their country.

However the sentiments of these two great men may be, it is certain, that Gideon's severity against the inhabitants of Succoth, for denying his army some necessary refreshments when they were pursuing the enemy, is justified upon the presumption, that such a refusal was a kind of rebellion against the state, that those who exposed their lives for the public safety had a right to be maintained at the public expense, and that no man might call any thing his own when a demand of this nature came upon him. And if Gideon, ⁷ who was sent immediately by an angel to deliver his brethren, and, in all his achievements, was supported by the Spirit of God, thought it no injustice to put the people of Succoth ⁸ to exquisite tortures for denying his army what they wanted; why might not Judas give the people of Ephron up to military execution, for being so cruel and inhuman as to deny him a passage through their city, when there was no possibility of taking his route any other way?

What the particular situation of this Ephron was, we can no where learn; but the author of the book of Maccabees seems to imply, that the country all about it was impassable, that is, was very probably so full of water and morasses, that the ⁹ company which Judas had along with him must have been lost, had they been obliged to turn either to the right hand or to the left. In their own defence, therefore, they were necessitated to make their way through the town; and if, in the siege and sackage of it, great numbers of people were put to the sword, this was properly the effect of their own folly and obstinacy, in refusing not so much to do a favour as an act of common right, even when it was humbly requested by a general, at the head of a victorious army.

The strength of the behemoth (which by most interpreters, is supposed to be the elephant ^a) is thus expressed in the book of Job : ' His bones are as strong pieces of brass, and his small bones like bars of iron ;' and therefore it is no wonder, that creatures of this prodigious strength (when the method of fighting was chiefly by force) should be made use of in all military expeditions. ² Some of these creatures have been known to carry two cannons, fastened together by a cable rope of three thousand pounds' weight each, for five hundred paces together, with their teeth ; and what reason have we to doubt, but that they are able to carry a much greater weight upon their backs ?

The largest and strongest species of these animals is said to be bred in India, (for those that come out of Africa are not near so big ;) and therefore, if we suppose that the elephants which Antiochus carried to the wars with him were of this Indian breed, (as ³ the circumstances of the whole story make it highly probable that they were) there cannot be so much difficulty as is imagined in one of these creatures carrying upon its back two and thirty men light armed, (as archers are known to be,) with towers, or other such vehicles as might be thought proper to give them an ascendancy in the fight, and so secure them from the darts and other weapons of the enemy. For, upon supposition that each of these men, one with another, weighed an hundred and fifty pounds, the amount of the weight of thirty-two will be no more than four thousand eight hundred pounds ; and yet it is a common thing to meet with elephants of a moderate size, that will carry you five or six thousand pounds' weight ; so that, upon the lowest computation, we have full two thousand pounds' weight allowed for the wooden machine wherein the slingers and archers were seated and secured.

The danger indeed of approaching this animal, with such a number of armed men upon its back, is very visible ; but most of the Jewish doctors and fathers of the Christian church look upon Eleazar's action in killing the royal elephant, (as he took it to be,) though at the expense of his own life, as a singular instance of courage and magnanimity. Fool-hardiness it would have been, had he been certainly persuaded, that the creature would have fallen upon him so directly and so suddenly as it did ; but why might he not rather think, that it might possibly tumble down on one side, so as to miss him, or live for some moments after it had received the wound, so as to give him an opportunity to escape ?

upon a proper occasion, the hazarding our lives : our reputation, too, is a natural good, which we are not only bound to preserve, but, by all lawful means, allowed to improve and increase ; and therefore charity ⁵ will not suffer us, without very good reasons, to believe, that these motives, which in themselves were laudable, lost all their merit, and were adulterated by any sinister ends that Eleazar might propose to himself. We cannot, I say, without rashness, blame him, or deny him that justice which we owe to all actions that are apparently commendable, that is, to believe them really good, so long as we have no proofs to the contrary : and, as it is no uncommon thing in such heroic acts as these, to find persons (under the Jewish economy more especially) instigated by a divine impulse, it will best become us to suspend our judgments concerning this action of Eleazar's, until we can find arguments to prove that he had no motive extraordinary to attempt it.

But there is not the like reason, I think, to suspend our judgment concerning the action of Razis, which, upon due consideration, was no better than self-murder. ⁶ To consider it, indeed, according to the notion which some heathens had of courage and magnanimity, contempt of death, and love of liberty, it comes nearer to what they called true heroism, than all the great actions that history has recorded of the Greeks and Romans. Nay, the Jews themselves are willing to place this man in the number of their most illustrious martyrs, and from his example (as well as some others) pretend, that upon certain occasions, self-murder is not only allowable, but highly commendable ; never considering, ⁷ that, in the sixth commandment, it is as much prohibited as the murder of any one else, and that, if I must not shed the blood of another man for this very reason, because ⁸ ' he is made in the image of God,' I must not shed the blood of myself, because I also am a man, and made in the image of God as well as he.

Upon the whole, therefore, we may conclude, that as this was not the practice of these worthies of old, who ¹¹ ' obtained a good report by faith,' it was not true courage, but the want of it, that put Razis upon committing this barbarous cruelty to himself ; that it was pride, not patience, which is the proper virtue of a martyr, that made him fly to death, merely for refuge against these outrages which he had not strength of mind to withstand ; and therefore St Austin's short reflection upon the whole is, ¹²

“The deed hath been told, but not applauded, it is rather to be considered than imitated.”

This reflection indeed will hold good in several other matters related in the history of the Maccabees, namely, that the author of it neither commends nor discommends, but only relates them. Demetrius Soter, for instance, was the rightful heir to the crown of Syria, and Alexander Balas no more than a vile impostor; and yet Jonathan thought proper to adjoin himself to him, because ¹ he remembered what a bitter enemy Demetrius had all along been to the Jewish interest; how oft he had sent his generals with positive orders to take his brother Judas dead or alive; and what ruin and oppression his frequent invasions had brought upon the whole nation. And therefore no wonder, that we find him taking a contrary part to the man, whom he looked upon as an enemy to his country. Demetrius Nicanor, in like manner, was the true heir to the same crown, and Alexander Zabina no more than a broker's son of Alexandria; and yet we find John Hyrcanus entering into a league and alliance with the latter, because indeed Demetrius had behaved so ungratefully to the Jews, (who had rescued him from the rebellion of his subjects,) as to load them with heavy taxes, even though he had promised them an immunity from them to engage their assistance.

The truth is, the kingdom of Syria was always in hostility with Judea. Its kings were tyrants, and great persecutors of the Jewish religion; and therefore what reason had any Jewish prince to trouble himself with the right of succession in an enemy's country? All that he seemed to be concerned in was, ² to make what advantages he could of their divisions, and by adjoining himself to the party, from whence he might expect the best treatment and support, to secure and establish his own, and his country's interest.

It is a mistake, however, to think, that Hyrcanus destroyed Samaria, out of the hatred which the Jews bore to the sect of the Samaritans, because, upon examination, we shall find, that none of that sect did, at that time, live in that place. ³ The ancient Samaritans, who were of the sect that worshipped God on mount Gerizzim, had slain in a tumult, (as we related before,) one Andromachus, a favourite of Alexander the Great, whom he had constituted governor of Syria; and in revenge for this base act Alexander had expelled them all from Samaria, and in their stead, new planted the city with a colony of Macedonians, Greeks, and Syrians mixed together, and they were the descendants of those who inhabited Samaria, when Hyrcanus made war against it; for the expelled Samaritans retired to Shechem, where they settled their abode, and made it the head seat of their sect ever since.

In like manner, it is a mistake to think, that, because Hyrcanus is said to have left the Pharisees, and adjoined himself to the Sadducees, therefore he espoused their doctrine against the resurrection and a future state. ⁴ On the contrary, it seems highly probable, that at this time the Sadducees had gone no further in the doctrine of this sect, than their rejecting all the unwritten traditions which the Pharisees held in so much veneration. Josephus mentions no other difference, in his time, between them; “nor does he say, that Hyrcanus went over to the Sadducees in any other particular, than in the abolishing the traditional constitutions of the Pharisees; and therefore we can hardly think, that so good and righteous a man, as he is represented to have been, would, upon any provocation whatever, have been induced to renounce the great and fundamental articles of his religion; but it can be no diminution to his character, we hope, that he made it his business to oppose those false interpretations of the law, which our blessed Saviour, in the course of his ministry, so severely condemned.

CHAP. III.—Of the Original and Tenets of the Jewish Sects.

It seems very probable, indeed, that during the times of the prophets, who, by their commerce with God, were immediately instructed in his will, no disputes about matters of religion could possibly arise, because their authority was sufficient for the decision of every controversy; but that when this race of prophets disappeared, and their authority ceased, men soon began to wrangle and dispute, and to form themselves into different sects and parties, upon the first occasion that offered.

After the return of the people from Babylon, Joshua the high priest, and Zerubbabel the governor, together with the chief elders, their contemporaries and others that afterwards succeeded them, collected together all the ancient and approved usages of the Jewish church, which had been in practice before the captivity. These, and whatever else pretended to be of the like nature, Ezra brought under a review, and, after due examination, having settled them by his approbation and authority, he thereby gave birth to what the Jews call their Oral Law. For ⁵ they pretend, that when God gave unto Moses the law on Mount Sinai, he gave him, at the same time, the interpretation of it, with a strict injunction to commit the former to writing, but to deliver the other down to posterity only by word of mouth; that, pursuant to this injunction, Moses wrote several copies of the law, which he left behind him among the several tribes, but, in the interpretation of it, he took care more especially to instruct his successor Joshua; that, after his death, Joshua delivered this interpretation, or oral law, to the elders who succeeded him, and that they delivered it to the prophets, who transmitted it down to each other, until it came to Jeremiah; that Jeremiah delivered it to Baruch; Baruch to Ezra; Ezra to the men of the great synagogue, until it came to Simon the Just; and that Simon delivered it to others, who handed it down in a continued succession, until it came to Rabbah Judah Hakkadosh, who wrote it into the book which they call the Mishnah.

^a There is good ground for supposing that the Sadducees held the impious tenets ascribed to them in the New Testament, long before the time of Josephus, and that even Sador, the founder of the sect, denied that there was any future state of rewards and punishments. invention of the Talmudists, and the little truth that there seems to be in it, is only this,—that after the death of Simon the Just, there arose a sort of men, (whom the Jews call Tannaim, or Mishnical doctors,) that made it their business to study and descant upon these traditions, which had been received, and allowed by Ezra and the men of the great synagogue, to draw such consequences and inferences from them, as they thought proper; to ingraft these into the body of the ancient traditions, and to expect from others that they should receive them, as if they had been as authentic as the other. But this imposition was too gross and palpable not to be attended with remonstrances from several: so that, in a short time, the Jewish church came to be divided into two grand parties, namely, those who adhered to the written law only, among whom the Sadducees were the chief; and those who, over and above this, received the traditions and constitutions of the elders, among whom the Pharisees made the greatest figure.

tence of the spirits or souls of men departed. Their notion was, that there was no spiritual being, but God only; that, as to man, this world was his all; that, at his death, his soul and body die together, never to live any more; and that therefore there is no future reward or punishment. They acknowledged indeed, that God made this world by his power, and governs it by his providence, and for the carrying on of this government, hath ordained rewards and punishments; but then they suppose, that these rewards and punishments are in this world only; and for this reason alone it was, that they worshipped him, and paid obedience to his laws. All unwritten traditions, as well as all written books, ^b except the five books of Moses, they absolutely rejected; and the probable reason why they did so, is, that they could not so well maintain these opinions, which are not so flatly contradicted in the Pentateuch, as in the other sacred books, if once they admitted these books to be canonical. All supernatural helps to their duty they utterly denied: for their doctrine was, that God had made man perfect master of all his actions, with a full freedom to do either good or evil as he thinks fit, without any assistance to him for the one, or restraint upon him as to the other; and for this reason, because they looked upon all men to have an inherent power to make their condition better or worse, according as they took right or wrong measures, whenever they sat in judgment upon criminals, they were always remarked to pass the severest sentences; as indeed their general character was, that they were a very ill-natured sort of men, churlish and morose in their behaviour even to each other, but cruel and savage to every one besides. Their principles, one might suppose, would have naturally led them into all manner of riot and excess; but it was not always so. Some of them were men of rigid virtue and strict probity; for ² though they had cast off the belief of a future state, yet as they admitted of a providence to punish vice, and reward virtue, in this life, their desire

² Basnage's History of the Jews, b. ii. c. 6.

^b Mr Basnage, in his History of the Jews, (b. ii. c. 6.) though he allows the question to be difficult, seems to be of a contrary opinion. 1st, because the Sadducees taught and prayed in the temple, where the prophets, and other holy writers, were read, as appears from the example of Christ, who explained a passage out of Isaiah. 2dly, because Josephus, who ought to have been well acquainted with the principles of this sect, relates of them, (b. vi. c. 9.) that they received what was written. And, 3dly, because the Pharisees, in their disputes with them about the doctrine of the resurrection, quote, not only the writings of Moses, but those of the prophets likewise, and other hagiographers, whose authority the others do not deny, but only endeavour to elude the force of the passages that are there produced against them. Upon the whole, therefore, Scaliger (Elench. Triher. c. 16.) is of opinion, that these Sadducees did not absolutely reject all the sacred writings; but rather looked upon them as books composed by holy men, whose memoirs they revered, though they could not believe them of the like authority with the law of Moses, which to them was the only rule of faith. But notwithstanding this, "the account which is given us in the gospel," says the learned Prideaux, "of the disputation which Christ had with the Sadducees, plainly proves the contrary. For seeing there are so many texts in the prophets and hagiographa, which plainly and directly prove a future state, and the resurrection of the dead, no other reason can be given why Christ waved all these proofs, and drew his argument, only by consequence, from what is said in the law, but that he knew, that the Sadducees, had rejected the prophets and the hagiographa, and therefore would admit of no arguments, but from the law only."—Anno 107.

^a In what sense the Sadducees denied the existence of angels, it is difficult to determine, since they certainly acknowledged the authority of the Pentateuch. Some pretend, that they accounted the invention of angels but a novel thing, and that their very name was never heard of, until the return from the captivity, and therefore they rejected them; whilst others suppose, that they looked upon them as the inseparable powers of God, which, like the rays of the sun, without being parted from that planet, shine and shed their influence here below. But now, considering that the Sadducees received the five books of Moses, they could hardly entertain any such notions as these. As therein they read of frequent apparitions of angels, they could not fancy them a new invention of the Rabbins that returned from the captivity. As they saw in these books, that they properly came down from heaven upon earth, they could not imagine that they were beings inseparable from the Deity; and therefore we may suppose, that they rather looked upon them only as so many phantasms; and that, as the bodies, which these angels put on, had perhaps only the appearance of human bodies, the same notion they might have of the spirits which animated them; because every thing, except God, in their opinion, was material.—Basnage's History of the Jews, b. ii. c. 6. [Mr Taylor, in his supplements to Calmet, remarks, that it is more likely when the Sadducees are charged with denying the existence of angels, we misapply the term; intending by it celestial angels, whereas they meant it of disembodied human spirits. If this were the case, it easily accounts for the reception of the Pentateuch.]—ED.

of present and temporal happiness put a restraint upon their appetites, and kept them within the bounds of their duty. And for the same reason, they were not without their expectations of a Messias to come. Nay, upon this subject they argued with more consistency than the other Jews did. For confining all their hopes to the present state of things, and looking upon him as a temporal king and deliverer only, they had a more than ordinary interest and concern in his appearance in their lifetime, that thereby they might reap the fruits of his conquests, and enjoy the happiness which the prophets had promised during his reign. Their number was the best of all the sects of the Jews; but they were men of the best quality and greatest estates: and as all those who were of the greatest power and riches, were cut off in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, it is generally supposed that this whole sect then perished with them. ^a mystical way of interpretation, made a considerable figure: but at length the school of Hillel, by the determination of a voice from heaven, as was pretended, carried it against the school of Shammai, so that the Karraites were quite absorbed, till they appeared again about the sixth century after Christ.

At this time the Talmud, a vast voluminous book, which contained all the traditions of the Jewish church was published, and a great deal of deference and veneration was required to be paid to it: but when men of learning and judgment came to look into it, and found it, as it is, stuffed with trifling and incredible stories, they rejected its authority, as not deserving their belief, and betook themselves wholly to such as were of undoubted credibility, 'the writings of the law and the prophets.' In consequence of which there arose two parties, one standing up for the Talmud and its traditions, and the other disavowing both, as containing, in their opinion, the inventions of men, and not the doctrines and commands of God. Those who stood up for the Talmud and its traditions were chiefly the rabbins and their followers, from whence their party had the name of rabbinists, and the others, who were for the scripture only, were again called Karraites; under which two names the controversy was at that time carried on between them, and so continues even to this day.

Among all the Jewish doctors, these Karraites are justly accounted the most learned set of men; but their number, in these western parts especially, is but small, ⁴ About the middle of the last century there was a particular account taken of them, wherein it appeared that in Poland there were 2000; at Caffa in Crim-Tartary, 1200; at Cairo, 300; at Damascus, 200; at Jerusalem, thirty; in Babylon, 100; and in Persia, 600, which, in all, amount to no more than 4430; a small number in comparison of the bulk of the nation, which is of the party of the rabbinists.

The Pharisees were so called from the Hebrew word Pharas, which signifies to separate; because the prevailing passion, or rather ambition, of this sect was, to distinguish and separate itself from the rest of the people, by a greater degree of holiness and piety, but accompanied with very much affectation and abundance of vain observances. ⁵ At what time this sect began first to appear, is no easy matter to determine. Josephus makes mention of them in the government of Jonathan, an hundred and forty years before Christ, as a very powerful body of men at that time; nor is it improbable, that their origin was somewhat earlier, and that, as soon as the Sadducees discovered their principles to the world, these men of different sentiments might not long after rise up in opposition to them: for it is evident from the character which the Jewish historian gives of them, that, in the main articles of their belief, they were entirely repugnant to the Sadducees. ⁶ The Pharisees believe in a fate, says he, and attribute all things to it, but nevertheless they acknowledge the freedom of man; but how they made these two apparent incompatibles consist together, is no where sufficiently explained. They teach, that God will one day judge the world, and punish or reward men according to their merits. They maintain, that souls are immortal, and that, in the other world, some will be shut up in an eternal prison and others sent back again; but with this difference, that those of good men shall enter into the bodies of men, those of wicked men into the bodies of beasts: which exactly agrees with the famous transmigration of Pythagoras. Their adherence to the law was so exact, that, for fear of violating the least precept of it, they scrupulously observed every thing that had the least relation to it, even though the law had neither commanded nor forbidden them. Their zeal for the traditions of the elders was such, that they derived them from the same fountain with the written word itself, pretending that Moses received both of them from God on Mount Sinai, and therefore ascribing an equal authority to both. They had a notion, that good works were meritorious; and therefore they invented a great number of supererogatory ones, upon which they valued themselves more than upon a due observance of the law itself. Their frequent washings and ablutions, ¹ their long prayers in public places, their ² nice avoidance of reputed sinners, their fasting and great abstinence, their penance and mortification, ³ their minute payment of tithes, their ⁴ strict observance of the sabbath, and ⁵ ostentatious enlargement of ^a phylacteries, were all works of this kind; which nevertheless gained them such esteem and veneration, that while the common people loved, the greater ones dreaded them, so that their power and authority in the state was considerable, though generally attended with pernicious consequences, because their hearts were evil: for notwithstanding their show of mighty zeal and great austerity, they were in reality, no better than what our Saviour calls them, vain and ostentatious, spiteful and malicious, gripping and voracious, lovers of themselves only, and despisers of others; in so much, that it was hard to say which was most predominant in them, their insatiable avarice, their insupportable pride, or abominable hypocrisy.

^a This is not true. The sect of the Sadducees was not extinguished; it was much reduced by the destruction of Jerusalem, and by the dispersion of the Jews; but it revived afterwards. At the beginning of the third century it was so formidable in Egypt, that Ammonius, Origen's master, thought himself obliged to write against them; or rather against the Jews, who tolerated the Sadducees, though they denied the fundamental points of their religion. The emperor Justinian mentions the Sadducees in one of his edicts, banishes them out of his dominions, and condemns them to the severest punishments, as a people that maintained atheistical and impious tenets. Amas or Ananus, a disciple of Juda, son of Nachman, a famous rabbin, about A. D. 755, declared himself, it is said, in favour of the Sadducees, and strenuously protected them against their adversaries. They had also a celebrated defender in the twelfth century in the person of Alpharagus, a Spanish rabbi. Gazor Tornich, David, p. 125. There are still Sadducees in Africa, and other places, who deny the immortality of the soul, and the resurrection of the body; but few declare themselves for these opinions. Some have confounded the Sadducees with such as hold the metempsychosis, and with the defenders of the two principles, that is, the Manichees; but it is certain these sects are different from the Sadducees. — Taylor's Cicero, 1. 10. — Ed.

In conjunction with the Pharisees, the Scribes are often mentioned in the Scriptures of the New Testament. They were not however any particular sect, but a profession of men of divers kinds, following literature. For generally all that were any way learned among the

^a The word phylactery, in the Greek, signifies a place to keep any thing in; in the Hebrew, it is called tephillin, which signifies prayers, because the Jews wear their phylacteries chiefly when they go to their devotion. It is a common opinion, that these phylacteries were long pieces of parchment, whereon were written certain passages out of Exodus and Deuteronomy, which they tied to their foreheads and left arm, in memory of the law; but a late explainer of the Jewish customs assures us, that they were parchment cases, formed with very great nicety, into their proper shapes: that the case for their head had four cavities, into each of which they put a piece of parchment rolled up, wherein were written some sections of the law; but that which was for the arm, had but one cavity, and into it they put one piece of parchment, wherein four passages of Scripture were written. (Lami's Introduction, b. i. c. 16.) The whole of this custom is founded on Exod. xiii. 9, and Deut. vi. 8; but the words are only metaphorically to be understood, as a command to have God's laws perpetually before our eyes, and his deliverance always in remembrance. It cannot be denied, however, that these phylacteries were generally worn by the Jews in our Saviour's time, and were not disused so late as St Jerome's.—

Lami's Introduction.

Jews were, in the time of our Saviour and his apostles, called scribes, but especially those, who by their skill in the law and divinity of the Jews, were advanced to sit in Moses' seat, either as judges in their sanhedrim, or teachers in their schools or synagogues. Both their name and profession began immediately after the Babylonish captivity, about five hundred years before the birth of Christ; for Ezra himself was one of the first. They were a body of the most learned men of the nation, and chiefly of the sect of the Pharisees, though some of them might possibly be Karraites, or Anti-traditionists, as it seems to appear from one of them asking our Saviour, ⁶ which was the first commandment of all, and being so highly pleased with his answer.

Those who were descended from the stock of Levi, were usually called scribes of the clergy; but such as were sprung from any other tribe, were named scribes of the people. The business of the latter was to take care to preserve the purity of the text in all the bibles which they copied out, and to see that no corruption was crept into the original. It was not held proper for every vulgar pen to transcribe the great mysteries of the law, and therefore this peculiar order of men was appointed to that purpose; but they did not so entirely apply themselves to it, as not to take in many other matters both of civil and religious concern, being public notaries in the sanhedrim and courts of justice, as well as registers in the synagogues. The office of the scribes of the clergy was to teach in public, and instruct the people, by expounding to them the law in their sermons and set discourses; by which practice they grew into such repute in the Jewish state, that it was hard to say, whether the Pharisees or they were held in the greater veneration: for what the Pharisees gained among the common people by their pretences to extraordinary sanctity, these more justly obtained by their zeal for the written word, in preserving it from the dangers of corruption, and expounding it in the ears of the people.

It is supposed, with a good deal of probability, that the sect of the Essenes began about 150 years before Christ, and during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, when great numbers of Jews were driven into the wilderness, where they intred themselves to a hard and laborious course of living. Why we find no mention made of them in all the New Testament, the probable reason may be, that the major part of them lived in Egypt at a considerable distance from Judea, which at this time was infested with such persecutions and intestine broils, as were abhorrent to their retired and hermitic course of life, which, as it secluded them from all places of great resort, might make them less curious to inquire after our Saviour's person and doctrine, thinking, very probably, that if he was really the Messiah, he would not fail to seek and find out them; but that if he was not, he had already enemies enough to oppose him, without their leaving the solitary and contemplative life they were accustomed to, merely to bear testimony against him. Philo, who gives a full account of these people, tells us that they were called Essenes, from the Greek word εσιος, which signifies holy, and that there were two sorts of them: some who, living in society and marrying, though with a great deal of wariness and circumspection, lived in villages, and applied themselves to husbandry and other innocent trades and occupations, and were therefore called practical; but others who, living a kind of monastic life, gave themselves wholly up to meditation, and were therefore called the contemplative Essenes: but however they differed in their manner of life, they were both of the same belief, and followed the same maxims.

They had not indeed the like traditions with the Pharisees, but as they were allegorists, they had several mystical books which served them for a rule in explaining the sacred writings, all of which, contrary to the Sadducees, they acknowledged and received. They believed that God governs the world, but by such an absolute predestination of every thing, as allowed mankind no liberty of choice in all their actions. They acknowledged a future state, thinking that the souls of good men went into the Fortunate Islands, while those of the wicked were shut up in subterraneous places; but as for the resurrection of the body, and the soul's returning to it again after they were once parted, of this they had no manner of notion. All practical religion they reduced to these three kinds. 1, The love of God; 2, the love of virtue; and, 3, the love of mankind. 1, Their love of God expressed itself in accounting him the author of all good, and, consequently, applying to him every morning and night for the blessings they wanted: in their abstaining from swearing, from lying, and all other sins that are abhorrent to his nature; and in their strict observance of the sabbath, and all other holy rites, except sacrificing; for though they sent their gifts to the altar, yet they themselves went not thither, presuming that the sanctity of their lives was the purest and most acceptable sacrifice to God that they could offer. 2, Their love of virtue was shown in the government of their passions, their refraining from pleasures, their contempt of riches, their abstinence in eating, their continence, their patience, the simplicity of their speech, and the modesty of their carriage. And, 3, their love of mankind appeared in their great benevolence and strict justice; their charity to the poor, and hospitality to strangers; and there needs no other proof of their love to one another, than the union in which they lived. For they had the same houses, the same provisions, the same habits, the same tables; their gains were put in the common stock; they divided the care of the sick among them; and honoured the elder men of their society with the same reverence, as if they had been their fathers.

This strictness and regularity of theirs gave them an eminent character, and made it a matter of no small consequence to be admitted into their society. For when, after a due course of probation, any one presented himself for that purpose, they bound him under the most solemn vows and protestations, "To love and worship God, and do justice to all men; to profess himself an enemy to the wicked, and a friend to the lovers of virtue; to keep his hands from theft, and all fraudulent dealings, and his soul unpolluted with the desire of unjust gain; not to usurp upon his inferiors, nor distinguish himself from them by any ornaments of dress or apparel; not to conceal any of the mysteries of religion from his brethren, nor to disclose any to the profane, though it were to save his life; but to preserve the doctrine he professed, the books that were written of it, and the names of those from whom he had it." This was the form of admission into their communion which whoever violated in any gross instance, was immediately excluded, and never received again without the deepest humiliation and repentance. And if such was the religion and manner of life of the Essenes, we have less reason to be surprised, at our finding some authors so much extolling their courage and magnanimity upon several occasions, as persons who, under distresses and persecutions, suffered death, and the most grievous torments, even with joy and cheerfulness, rather than say or do any thing contrary to the law of God. They are said, however, to have¹ greatly degenerated from their primitive purity of life and doctrine. In the time of Trajan and the reign of Justinian, though they were known under the pompous title of "angels or angelic persons," yet were they found to come infinitely short of the beings whose names they assumed, and, upon that account, falling into great disesteem, in a very short time^a they dwindled into nothing.

There was another sect among the Jews,² mentioned in the gospels, which, though of later original, may not improperly be considered in this place, and that is the Herodians,^b who, in their main principles, were not very different from the Sadducees. They sprang up, no doubt, in the time of Herod the Great, some twenty or thirty years before Christ, and had their denomination from him; but upon what account is not so well agreed. The common opinion is, that they looked upon Herod as the promised Messiah: but it is a very improbable thing, that any Jew should, in the time of our Saviour's ministry, above thirty years after the death of Herod, hold him to have been the Messiah, when they had found no one of those particulars which they expected from the Messiah performed by him, but rather every thing quite contrary.³ Others therefore suppose, that they were called Herodians, because they constituted a sodality, or club, as we call it, in honour of Herod at Jerusalem, as there were several in Rome in honour of their emperors.^c But, since the earliest of these sodalities in Rome were not instituted till after the death of Augustus, who outlived Herod sixteen years and upwards, this could be no pattern or foundation for the institution of the like in memory of Herod, who died so long before.

^a Some indeed are of opinion, that these Essenes did renounce Judaism, and were converts to Christianity; and that such among them as were called Therapeutæ became monks, and were formed into that order by St Mark, who was the first founder of the Christian church in Alexandria. But though it seems not unlikely, that some of this sect might be converted, yet, that the main body of them should embrace Christianity, and so be lost in the societies of Christian hermits, is far from being probable; especially since we find no traces of any such institution as monkism till after the beginning of the second century, when these ascetics, who had formerly fled from persecution, finding the sweets of their retirement and solitude, began to multiply, and so erected themselves into bodies.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 107; and Basnage's History of the Jews, b. ii. c. 13.

Herod, no doubt, came into the government with great opposition, and, as he was by birth a foreigner, and had made his entrance with much blood, his title was not acknowledged by the greater part of the Jews, especially as long as Antigonus was alive. Those, therefore, that would own his title and espouse his interest, might, for this reason, perhaps, go under the name of Herodians; but this seems not to be the whole of the matter. Our blessed Saviour cautions his disciples ¹ ‘against the leaven,’ that is, against the evil and erroneous tenets, of Herod; which seems to imply, that Herod himself was the author of some false notions, which constituted a particular sect differing from the other sects of the Jews; and that his followers, imbibing these principles from him, had the denomination of Herodians. ² Forasmuch, then, that Herod, ³ the better to secure his possession of the throne, had put himself under the Roman protection, ⁴ contrary to an express precept of the law; and, to ingratiate himself with the great men at Rome, built temples, and erected images in them for idolatrous worship, excusing himself to the Jews, that all this he did purely in compliance to the commands he was necessitated to obey, and might probably lay it down for a maxim in religion, that, in case of compulsion, it was lawful to submit to unjust injunctions; there is no wonder at all that some bold men should rise up to justify the king’s practice, and, by the royal permission, call themselves by his name, whose distinguishing tenet might probably be, “That although they professed the Jewish religion, and abominated idolatry in their hearts, yet, to humour the Romans, and make themselves easy with their governors, it was not unlawful to comply sometimes with their demands, and, at least outwardly, to become occasional conformists.” This is the leaven of the Herodians, which our Saviour cautions his disciples against; but it was not of long continuance in the Jewish church: for Herod Antipas ⁵ having lost his credit at Rome, and being deposed and banished out of Judea, the sect that was instituted by his father, and supported by his favour and countenance, could not support itself after his disgrace.

Another sect, mentioned by Josephus ⁶ as rising after this time, was that of Judas of Galilee: for when Archelus, son of Herod the Great, was sent into banishment, and Judea reduced to a Roman province, Judas, ^a a native of Galamala, took occasion from some new exactions, to exhort his countrymen to shake off the Roman yoke; pretending, that to pay tribute to any foreign power was a shameful badge of their slavery. An aversion to the Roman dominion, and an hatred of the publicans, who had the care of receiving the taxes and tributes, was natural enough to all the Jews; but they, whose zeal led them to join Judas, and form a particular sect, valued themselves upon their holiness and justice, because they would not acknowledge any other sovereign but God; and, rather than submit to the dominion of man, or give him the title of Lord, they chose to subject themselves to any torments, or even to death itself. Judas indeed perished, ⁶ and all, as many as obeyed him, were dispersed for a while; ⁷ but in the time of the Jewish wars they gathered again, and soon became a faction strong and considerable enough to put every thing in confusion. They affected the title of zealots, says ⁷ Josephus, as if their undertakings had been good and honourable, even while they outdid the very worst of men in wickedness. They looked upon themselves, indeed, as the true successors of Phinehas, ⁸ who, out of zeal for the honour of God, did immediate execution upon Zimri and Cosbi, for which he received the divine thanks and approbation. And, in imitation of him, these men took upon them to execute judgment upon such as they called notorious offenders, without staying for the ordinary formalities of law. And, therefore, they made no scruple of robbing, and plundering, and killing the principal of the nobility, under pretence of their holding correspondence with the Romans, and betraying the liberty of their country. At last, joining with the Idumæans, they committed all manner of outrage, seized on the temple, and profaned the sanctuary, and slew many of the high priests themselves. So that, when Jerusalem came to be besieged, they were perpetually raising tumults and distractions within, which ended at last in the destruction of their city and temple, and the total dissolution of their state.

These were the several sects, which, much about this period of time, sprang up in the Jewish church; and, if the like differences in opinion have since appeared in the Christian, it is no more than what the Spirit of God hath foretold: ⁹ ‘For there must be heresies among you, that they who are approved may be made manifest among you.’

SECT. V.

CHAP. I.—From the Death of John Hyrcanus, to the Birth of Jesus Christ

THE HISTORY

HYRCANUS, when he died, left five sons: Aristobulus, Antigonus, and Alexander, were the three first; who the fourth was, we no where read; but the name of the fifth was Absalom. Aristobulus, as eldest, succeeded his father, both in the pontificate and principality of the nation, and, as we said before, was the first in Judea, since the Babylonish captivity, who put on a diadem, and assumed the title of a king; but he was a man of a bloody and suspicious disposition. His own mother, because, in virtue of his father’s will, she claimed some share in the sovereignty, he first cast into prison, and there starved to death. All his brothers he put under the like confinement, except Antigonus, who was his great favourite, and, at first, shared in the government with him: but he soon cooled in his affections, and at last had him put to death; though in this piece of cruelty the instruments about him were more to blame than he.

As soon as he was settled in the throne, he engaged in a war with the Ituræans; ^a and having subdued the greatest part of them, he forced them to become proselytes to the Jewish religion, in the same manner as his father had done to the Idumæans: but returning sick from the war to Jerusalem, he left his brother behind him to finish it, which accordingly he did with success; and so, returning in triumph, at a time when the feast of tabernacles was celebrating, he went directly to the temple, as did the guards that attended him, with his armour on, to pay his devotions to God.

The queen, and the courtiers of her party, who envied the interest which Antigonus had with the king, were always buzzing in his ears such stories as they thought would excite his jealousy; and now they come and tell him, "That it was high time for him to look to himself; that his brother was gone into the temple in an equipage not becoming a private man; and that, in all probability, it would not be long before he could come with a troop of his armed soldiers, and execute his wicked design against him."

This representation made some impression upon Aristobulus, so that he sent to his brother to put off his armour, and immediately come to him, concluding that if, pursuant to his orders, he came unarmed, there was no mischief intended, but that if he did otherwise, there might be something in what the queen had suggested; and therefore placing his guards in a subterraneous passage, which led from the palace ^b to the temple, and through which his brother was to come to the king's apartment, he ordered them, that, if he came unarmed, they should let him pass, but if otherwise, they should instantly fall upon him, and dispatch him.

The queen, knowing this, prevailed with the messenger whom Aristobulus sent to bid his brother come unarmed, to tell him, on the contrary, that the king being informed of a very beautiful suit of armour which he had brought with him from the wars, was minded to see how it became him, and therefore desired him to come in it; which accordingly he did, suspecting no ill. When he came to the place where the guards were posted, they, seeing his armour on, executed their orders, and immediately slew him; but, no sooner was the fact committed, than Aristobulus severely repented it.

For the sense of the loss of a good brother brought to his remembrance the murder of his mother, and his conscience flew in his face for both at once. The anxiety of his mind increased the distemper of his body; so that, finding no ease for the one, and no cure for the other, in the utmost agonies of guilt, and with many bitter accusations of himself, he gave up the ghost, ^c and, after a reign of no more than one year, was succeeded by his brother Alexander Jannæus.

Ever since his father's death, he had been kept in prison by the late king; but, upon his decease, his widow Salome released him, and his other two brothers, from their confinement; so that, being now on the throne, and having discovered that the elder of these brothers had formed a design to supplant him, he caused him to be put to death; but the other, who was called Absalom, desiring to live quietly, and in a private condition, he took into his favour, and under his protection.

As soon as he had settled his matters at home, he led forth his forces to make war with the people of Ptolemais; and, having vanquished them in a pitched battle, shut them up in the city, and laid close siege to it. This place, and Gaza, together with the tower of Straton, and the fortress of Dura, which Zoilus possessed, were the only places on the coast, which were not under Alexander's dominion; and, therefore, dividing his forces, with one part he besieged Ptolemais, and employed the other in ravaging the territories of Zoilus, and those of Gaza. In the mean time, the besieged had sent to Ptolemy Lathyrus, ^d the expelled king of Egypt, who reigned then in Crete, to come to their relief; but afterwards, bethinking themselves better, they came to a resolution, which they communicated to Ptolemy, to trust to their own strength, rather than admit of any auxiliaries.

Ptolemy however was already set to sea, when he heard this news; and therefore proceeding in his voyage, and landing his army in Phenicia, he advanced towards Ptolemais; but the people in the town would neither receive his messengers, nor send him any answer, so that he was in no small perplexity what course to take, when ^a Ituræa, the country where these people dwell, was part of Cœlo-Syria, bordering upon the north-east part of the land of Israel, and lying between the inheritance of the half tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan, and the territories of Damascus. It is the same country that is sometimes called Auranitis, and had its name from Itur, one of the sons of Ishmael, (Gen. xxv. 15.) who, in our English version, is wrongfully called Jetur.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 107.

^b When Hyrcanus built the palace of Baris, he caused this passage, which led from thence to the temple, to be made, that upon all occasions he might have a ready communication with it; and as over this passage there was a turret, or tower of the palace, called Straton's tower, Josephus tells us a very remarkable story concerning it, namely, that one Judas, an Essene, having foretold that Antigonus should, that very day, be slain in Straton's tower, which he took to be a town so called, lying on the sea coast, and two days' journey from Jerusalem; and seeing Antigonus come into the temple, he fell into a great passion, and began to exclaim against truth itself, as supposing his prediction impossible now to be fulfilled; but, while he was in this agony, news being brought, that Antigonus was slain in that part of the subterraneous gallery which was directly under the turret called Straton's tower, the Essene rejoiced in the comfort and satisfaction of having his prophecy verified, at the same time that every one else was lamenting the murder of this young prince.—Jewish Antiq. b. 12. c. 19.

^c Aristobulus was a great favourer of the Greeks, for which reason he was called Philhellens, and the Greeks indeed had an equal favour for him: for, as Josephus tells us out of Strabo, one of their historians has left his character of him:—"That he was a prince of equity, and had in many things been very beneficial to the Jews, in that he had augmented their territories, and ingrafted into the Jewish state part of the nation of the Ituræans;" but the actions of his short reign show him to have been a man of a quite different disposition.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 106.

^d This Ptolemy Lathyrus, by his mother Cleopatra, was made king of Egypt; by his affecting to reign without her, he so far incurred her displeasure, that she procured his expulsion by this artifice. Some of her favourite eunuchs she caused to be wounded; and then bringing them out into the public assembly of the Alexandrians, she there pretended, that they had suffered this from Lathyrus, in defence of her person against him, and thereupon accused him of having made an attempt upon her life; and by this means she so far incensed the people, that they rose in a general uproar against him, and would have torn him in pieces, had he not fled for his life. Thereupon Cleopatra sent for Alexander, her younger son, who, for some time had reigned in Cyprus, and having made him king of Egypt, forced Lathyrus to be content with Cyprus, upon his brother's leaving it.—Justin, b. xxxix. c. 4.

Zoilus, and the Gazeans sent ambassadors, desiring his assistance against Alexander's forces, which they were not able to oppose.

Ptolemy, being very glad of any opportunity to make an honourable retreat from before Ptolemais, readily marched his army to their relief; but Alexander, not thinking it advisable to hazard an engagement with him, withdrew his army into their quarters, and there thought to gain by policy, what he could not attain by force.

To this purpose he entered into a treaty with Lathyrus, and engaged to pay him four hundred talents of silver, on condition that he would deliver Zoilus, and his territories, into his hands, which Lathyrus agreed to do, and accordingly had got Zoilus into his custody; but when he came to understand, that at the same time Alexander was clandestinely treating with Cleopatra, to bring her upon him with all her forces, he, detesting such double dealing, broke off all friendship with him, and resolved to do him what mischief he could.

The two armies therefore met the next year, and a very fierce battle ensued near Asophus, not far from the river Jordan, wherein Alexander being vanquished, lost thirty thousand of his men, besides those that were taken prisoners. After this victory, Ptolemy made every where great havoc, and spread the terror^a of his name throughout all the province; but his mother Cleopatra being fearful, lest so much success should make him powerful enough to invade Egypt, set out with a large fleet, and a numerous army, which she landed in Phœnicia, and thence proceeded to Ptolemais, expecting that the people would have opened their gates to her; but finding the contrary, she invested the place to take it by force; while Ptolemy, believing that it would be easy for him to recover Egypt in the absence of his mother and her army, left Syria, and went upon that expedition; but meeting with more opposition than he expected, he was obliged to return to Gaza, where he passed the winter, and from thence went back again to Cyprus.

As soon as Cleopatra had taken Ptolemais, Alexander went thither with considerable presents, and was kindly received as an unhappy prince, who was Ptolemy's enemy, and had no other refuge but the queen's protection; and therefore when some about her suggested, that now she had an opportunity to seize on him and his dominions, Ananias, one of her generals, who by birth was a Jew, and by descent a relation to Alexander, by representing to her the danger and injustice of such a procedure; how base and injurious to her own honour, which for no considerations whatever ought to be tarnished; how prejudicial to her interest, by provoking all the Jews in the world against her; and how contrary to the rules of faith and common honesty, which are observed among all mankind, it would be to treat a friend and ally in this manner; he prevailed with her to desist

^a There is a very cruel and barbarous act, which he is said to have done at this time, namely, that, coming with his army in the evening after the victory, to take up his quarters in the adjoining villages, and finding them full of women and children, he caused them to be all slaughtered, and their bodies to be cut in pieces, and put in caldrons over the fire to be boiled, as if they had been for supper: that so he might leave an opinion in that country, that his men fed upon human flesh, and thereby create the greater dread and terror of his army. This barbarous cruelty Strabo and Nicholaus, as Josephus tells us, make mention of.—Jewish Antiq. b. xiii. c. 21.

from all thoughts of it; so that, having concluded an amicable alliance with Alexander, she returned with her army to Egypt.

As soon as the country was clear of these foreigners, and Alexander had recruited his shattered forces, he marched into Coelo-Syria, where, after a siege of ten months, he took Gadara, and after that, the strong fortress of Anathus, where Theodorus, the son of Zeno, prince of Philadelphiæ, had laid up all his treasure; but Theodorus falling suddenly upon him, as he was returning from the conquest, not only recovered his treasure again, but slew ten thousand of his men, and took all his baggage from him.

All these misfortunes, however, did not discourage this prince. The next year he marched his forces again over the Jordan; and after having taken some neighbouring places, came, and sat down before Gaza, with a design, if he took it, to use the people with the utmost severity; but Apollodorus, who commanded the town, made a gallant defence, and in a sally with twenty thousand of his men, one night fell so furiously upon Alexander's camp, that he had like to have ruined him and his whole army; but as soon as the day appeared, the Jews, discovering who they were, (for they thought in the dark that Lathyrus was come again to the assistance of Gaza,) rallied again, and repulsed the Gazeans into the city, with the loss of a thousand of their men.

The city, however, still held out, till Lysimachus, envying the credit and esteem which his brother Apollodorus had gained in the defence of the place, treacherously slew him, and then as treacherously delivered up the city to Alexander; who, as soon as he had got possession of it, let loose his soldiers upon it, with a full license to kill, plunder, and destroy, which produced a sad scene of barbarity. The Gazeans, thus finding that they were to have no quarter, stood upon their defence, and sold their lives at so dear a rate, that in the carnage and sackage of the place, Alexander lost as many men of his own, as he killed of the enemy; but had the horrid pleasure, before he went away, to see this ancient and famous city reduced to utter ruin and desolation.

When he returned to Jerusalem, he was far from finding matters there in any peaceable posture. For, in the feast of tabernacles, while he was offering the usual sacrifices as high priest, the people who were assembled in the temple, had the insolence to pelt him with citrons, (for during the festival it was a custom among the Jews to carry ^b branches of palm-trees, and lemon-trees in their hands) and to give him very opprobrious language, telling him, that he was a slave,^c

^b The word in the original is Attrog, which the Jews imagine to have been the forbidden fruit, that our first parents ate in paradise. It very much resembles a citron or lemon, except that it has a very rough and uneven rind, which they fondly imagine, was originally occasioned by Eve's impressing her teeth on it, and that these marks it has still retained. The custom of carrying these in their hands is in testimony of their joy, but on the seventh day, which closes the festival, they break their branches, and throw them away; and therefore it is supposed, that it was on this day, when the mutinous multitude pelted the high priest with these attrogs, which, at this time, were very common in Palestine.—Universal History, b. ii. c. 11.

^c In this they alluded to what Eleazar, a leading Pharisee, had said to his father Hyrcanus, namely, "That his mother was and unworthy to go up to the holy altar to offer solemn sacrifices, which enraged him to such a degree, that he fell upon them with his soldiers, and slew six thousand of them. After this he surrounded the court of the priests, wherein the altar and the temple stood, with a wooden partition, to hinder the people from coming near him, while he was officiating, and to secure his person against all future attempts, he took guards into his pay from Pisidia and Cilicia, (for he durst not trust his own countrymen,) and of these he had six thousand always about him.

Having thus, in some measure, laid the storm at home, he marched his forces against the Moabites and Ammonites, and made them become tributary to him. He attacked again the fortress of Amathus; but Theodorus, not daring to stand his coming, had removed his treasure, and withdrawn the garrison, so that he took it without opposition: but in his war with Thedas, an Arabian king, he had not the like success; for falling into an ambuscade which that prince had laid for him near Gadara, he there lost most of his army, and not without some difficulty escaped himself.

This loss, added to the hatred which the Jews had conceived against him, made them fly out into an open rebellion, so that here a civil war commenced, which lasted for six years. In most encounters he had the advantage of his subjects; but so exasperated were they against him, that he could never bring them to submit: for having one day asked them what they would have him do to please them, they all with one voice replied, "That he should cut his own throat; for upon no other terms would they be at peace with him; and well it were," they said, "considering the great ^a mischiefs he had done them, if they could be reconciled to him, even after he was in his grave;" and thereupon they sent deputies to Demetrius Eucharus who was then king of Damascus, to desire succours from him against their sovereign.

Demetrius, at their request, came into Judea with an army of three thousand horse, and forty thousand foot, Syrians and Jews. Alexander marched against him with six thousand Greek mercenaries, and twenty thousand Jews, who continued faithful to him; but in the engagement he was quite vanquished. All his foreign troops were lost to a man; and the greatest part of his other forces was so miserably broken, that he was forced to flee for shelter to the mountains, with the poor remnant he could get together.

This misfortune, which, in all appearance, must have totally ruined his affairs, proved the very means of re-establishing them. Six thousand of those very Jews, who had so lately appeared in arms against him, when a captive taken in the wars, and he, consequently, disqualified to be their high priest." But assuredly the true reason of their exasperation against him was, that he followed his father's steps, and not only gave countenance to the contrary sect, but continued the penal laws against those who should observe the traditions and customs introduced by the Pharisees.—Universal History, b. 2, c. 11.

^a The fourth book of the Maccabees (chap. xxix.) tells us, that this war was chiefly between the Pharisees and Sadducees, and that Alexander, having declared himself against the former, had put fifty thousand of them to death within the space of six years, which so exasperated the rest, that they would hearken to no accommodation.—Universal History, b. 2, c. 11.

they saw him reduced to this distressed condition, were moved with compassion, and went over to him: and Demetrius, being content with the first advantage he had gained, or fearing, perhaps, that the rest of the Jews would do the same, retired into Syria, leaving the rebels to make war against their king with their own forces.

In most of the conflicts that happened between them Alexander defeated them, but still he could bring them to no terms of peace; till at last coming to a decisive battle, he cut off the major part of them, and the rest he shut up in a place called Bethome. This he besieged, and took; and having carried eight hundred of the rebels prisoners to Jerusalem, he there caused them to be crucified all on one day, and their wives and children to be slain before their faces, as they were hanging on the crosses, whilst he made an entertainment for his wives and concubines near the place where this scene of terror was acting, with an intent chiefly to feast himself and them with this horrid sight. This was a savage and unheard of cruelty: and, upon this occasion, the people of his own party called him Thracides, that is, as cruel as a Thracian, as no man indeed could be bad enough to express so inhuman a procedure.

After these civil wars were ended, Alexander led his army against the two kings of Damascus, Antiochus first, and afterwards Aretas, ^b who, at different times, had invaded his kingdom. He took several strong places in the neighbouring territories, and, after an expedition of three years' continuance, returned to Jerusalem, and was well received by his subjects. But that felicity he did not long enjoy: for having at a certain time drank to a great excess, he thereupon fell sick, and was afterwards seized with a quartan ague, which he was never able to shake off. This, however, did not interrupt his military undertakings, till, being quite exhausted, he was forced to submit to fate, while he was besieging the castle of Ragaba, in the country of the Gerasens. His queen Alexandra, who was with him at the siege, observing him to draw near his end, was exceedingly troubled at the ill state wherein she and her children should be left at his death. She knew how much he had exasperated the Pharisees, then a powerful sect among the Jews, and how great hatred the generality of the people, at their instigation, had contracted against them; and therefore she saw nothing else, but that she and her family would be given up to destruction, and made victims to the public rage; and thus she sat by his bedside, lamenting and bemoaning herself, while he lay a-dying.

To ease her mind from these dismal apprehensions, the advice which he gave her was this:—"That she should conceal his death till the castle was taken, and then, carrying his dead body with her, should lead back the army in triumph for this success; that, as soon as she was come to Jerusalem, she should send for some of the leading men of the sect of the Pharisees, lay his dead corpse before them, and tell them, that she resigned it wholly to their pleasure, either to treat it with indignity, as his treatment of them had deserved, or to dispose of it as they thought fit; and, withal, that she should not forget to assure them, that, as her husband had made her regent during her children's minority, she would do nothing in the administration without their advice and participation."

After the reduction of Ragaba, Alexandra returned to Jerusalem in the manner that was prescribed, and in every thing else observed her husband's directions most punctually; which succeeded so well, that the usual invectives against him were changed into encomiums. All deplored the loss of so valiant a prince, and honoured his funeral with a more than ordinary pomp and solemnity; all pitied the queen-dowager, and, in obedience to her husband's will, settled her in the supreme government of the nation.

Alexander, when he died, left behind him two sons, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus; but the regency he invested in the queen, who had indeed the name of the government, but the administration was entirely in the power of the Pharisees. The first thing therefore that they did, was to have the decree of John Hyrcanus against their traditionary constitutions abolished; next to release all the prisoners, and recall all the exiles that were concerned with them in the late civil wars; and then to demand justice against all those by whose instigation and advice the eight hundred rebels above mentioned had been crucified.

To this purpose they exhibited articles against one Diogenes, a noted confidant of the late king's; had him condemned and executed; and proceeded in like manner against several others; so that the late king's friends and adherents, seeing no end of these persecutions, went at length to the queen in a body, with Aristobulus, her younger son, at the head of them, to remonstrate against these proceedings. They had been old officers to the king, and had faithfully adhered to him in all his wars and difficulties; and therefore they requested, that if no regard were to be had to their services, they might at least be permitted to depart the land, and seek their safety elsewhere, or else, to be out of the reach of their enemies, might be sent into the several garrisons of the kingdom; and to this last demand of theirs the queen consented.

In the mean time news was brought to Jerusalem, that Tigranes, king of Armenia, with an army of five hundred thousand men, had invaded Syria, and would in a short time be in Judea. This put the queen, and all the Jews, into a terrible fright; and therefore they immediately dispatched away ambassadors, with presents of great value, to court his friendship, and divert the storm. The ambassadors found him laying close siege to Ptolemais, and when they were introduced, for he was a man^a of great pride and state, he commended their forwardness in applying to him, accepted their presents, and assured them of his good inclinations; but the true reason of all this civility was, that Lucullus, the Roman general, in pursuit of Mithridates, had entered Armenia, and was putting the country under military contribution, which obliged Tigranes to return home, and so delivered the Jews from the apprehensions of an invasion from that quarter.

Alexandra, when she was declared queen, made Hyrcanus high priest, and left Aristobulus to lead a private life; but a private life was not agreeable to his aspiring temper. As soon therefore as he perceived that the queen was sick and past all hopes of recovery, he privately in the night went out of Jerusalem, attended only with one servant; and having visited all the castles, in which, by his procurement, his father's friends had been placed in garrison, in fifteen days' time he secured to his interest twenty of these fortresses, and thereby in a manner made himself master of the rest of the strength of the kingdom; so that when his mother died, which was not long after his departure from Jerusalem, though she had declared his brother Hyrcanus her successor, he nevertheless met him in the plains of Jericho; but as the two armies were going to engage, most of the forces of Hyrcanus deserted, and went over to Aristobulus, which obliged Hyrcanus to come to a treaty with his brother; in which it was agreed, that he should make resignation of the crown and high priesthood to Aristobulus, and submit to live quietly upon his own private fortune; which accordingly was ratified by public sanction.

Hyrcanus was a quiet and peaceable man, a lover of retirement and ease, and therefore his resignation of the crown was not so great a grievance to him, as it was to some about him. Among these Antipater,^b the father of Herod, surnamed the Great, was the chief; who having persuaded Hyrcanus, that, while he continued in Judea, his life was in danger, and that he had no other choice left, but either to reign or die, advised him to make his escape to Aretas, king of Arabia, and with him he appeared before Pompey, he plucked his crown or royal tiara from off his head, and cast himself prostrate on the ground before him.—Plutarch in the Life of Lucullus and Pompey.

^b Eusebius and Julius Africanus tell us, that the father of this Antipater was a heathen, and an inhabitant of Ascalon; that a company of robbers having pillaged a temple near Ascalon, took this young Antipater, the father of Herod the Great, who, at that time, was the priest of the temple, away with them; and that his father being not able to redeem him, they carried him into Idumæa, where he settled, and made his fortune. But there is much more probability, that what Josephus, in the history of the Jewish wars, (b. i. c. 5.) tells us of this great man may be true, namely, that he was the son of another Antipater, who was made governor of Idumæa by Alexander Jannæus; and as to his religion, there is no question to be made, but that he was a Jew and circumcised; because the Idumæans had long before received circumcision and the religion of the Jews, even when Hyrcanus made a conquest of their country. This Antipater, having had his education in the court of Alexander Jannæus, and Alexandra his queen, who reigned after him, had wrought himself into the good graces of Hyrcanus, the eldest of their sons, in hopes to rise by his favour, when he should come to the crown after his mother; but when Hyrcanus was deposed, and Aristobulus made king in his place, all the measures which he had taken for his advancement were broken; and being too obnoxious to Aristobulus ever to have any prospect of favour from him, he thought himself obliged, both in his own interest and defence, to act the part we find he did.—Cabnet's Dictionary, under the word; and Prideaux's Connection, anno 65.

to stipulate for forces for the recovery of his kingdom. Hyrcanus did so; and upon condition that he would restore the towns which his father Alexander had taken from him, Aretas supplied him with fifty thousand men, who, being joined with the Jews that were of Hyrcanus's party, gave battle to Aristobulus, and having obtained a complete victory, pursued him to Jerusalem, and thence to the mount of the temple, where they besieged him, and committed some outrageous acts. "In the mean time, Scarus, one of Pompey's lieutenants, being come with a Roman army as far as Damascus, Aristobulus took care, with the promise of four hundred talents, to engage him on his side; so that he sent to Aretas to withdraw his forces from Jerusalem, and threatened him with the Roman arms in case of refusal. Hereupon Aretas was forced to raise the siege and march off; but in his retreat Aristobulus fell upon his rear, and destroyed about seven thousand of his men.

Not long after this Pompey himself came into Syria, and took up his residence at Damascus, where he was attended with ambassadors from several nations, and, among the rest, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus sent their deputies, desiring both his protection and determination of the controversy depending between them. But when Pompey had heard what they both had to say, he ordered that the two brothers should appear in person before him, that so he might be better able to inquire into the merits of the cause, and determine it in such a manner as justice should direct.

The two brothers accordingly waited upon Pompey to receive his decision; and, at the same time, several chief men of the Jews came to remonstrate against them both. The Jews pleaded, "That it had been formerly the usage of their nation to be governed by the high priest of the God whom they worshipped, who, without assuming any other title, administered justice to them, according to the laws and constitutions transmitted down to them from their forefathers. They owned, indeed, that the two contending brothers were of the sacerdotal race, but then they alleged, that they had changed the old, and introduced a new form of government, in order to enslave the people, and thereupon they prayed that they might not be governed by a king."

Hyrcanus on his part urged, "That, being the elder brother, he was unjustly deprived of his birthright by Aristobulus, who, leaving him only a small portion of land for his subsistence, had usurped all the rest, and, as a man born for mischief, practised piracy at sea, and rapine and depredation at land, upon his neighbours." And for the attestation of all this, there appeared above a One barbarous action of this kind is thus related by Josephus:—At this time there was at Jerusalem one Onias, a man of great reputation for the sanctity of his life, and who, by his prayers, had been thought to have once obtained rain from heaven in an extremity of drought. Upon a fond imagination, therefore, that his curses would be as prevalent as his prayers, the besiegers brought him into the camp, and there pressed him to curse Aristobulus, and all that were with him. He opposed their request as long as he could; but at length, finding no rest from their importunities, he lifted up his hands to heaven, and, as he was standing in the midst of them, said, "O Lord God, ruler of the universe, since both we, that stand here before thee, are thy people, and they that are besieged in the temple, are thy priests, I humbly beseech thee not to hear the prayers of either of them against the other." Whereupon they who brought him thither, were so enraged against the good man, that they fell upon him, and stoned him to death.—Jewish Antiq. b. xiv. c. 3.

a thousand of the principal Jews. What Aristobulus had to say, in answer to this, was, "That Hyrcanus was superseded in the government, by reason of his incapacity to rule, and not through any ambition of his; that his sloth and inactivity had brought upon him the contempt of the people, and that therefore he was forced to interpose, merely to preserve the government from falling into other hands." And, to witness the truth of this, he produced several young gentlemen of the nation, who by the gaudiness of their dress, and the levity of their carriage, did no great credit to the cause which they pretended to support.

Upon this hearing, Pompey could not but perceive the injury which Aristobulus had done his brother; but for the present he dismissed them with fair words, and referred the full determination of the matter, until himself should come to Jerusalem, which he would not fail to do, as soon as he had finished the Arabian war. Upon the whole, Aristobulus perceiving which way Pompey's discourse and inclinations tended, left Damascus without ever taking leave, and, returning to Judea, there armed the country in his defence. Pompey had soon done his business in Arabia, and thence coming to Judea, found that, upon his approach, Aristobulus had shut himself up in the castle of Alexandrion, which was a strong fortress, built by his father (and therefore called by this name) on a high mountain, that stood in the entrance of the country of Judea, towards the Samaritan side. Hither Pompey marched his army; and, having encamped before it, sent a messenger to Aristobulus to come down to him. Aristobulus, though with much reluctance, was forced to comply; and when Pompey demanded of him to deliver up his castles, and to sign orders to that purpose to all who commanded in them, he durst not refuse doing it, though he complained of the force that was thus put on him; and, as soon as he got out of Pompey's hands, fled to Jerusalem, and there prepared for war.

Pompey was not long before he marched after him; but when he drew near to Jerusalem, Aristobulus, repenting of what he had done, went out to him, and, endeavouring to reconcile matters with him, promised an entire submission for the future, and a considerable sum of money besides, if he would but withdraw his forces. Pompey accepted the proposal; and accordingly sent Gabinius, one of his lieutenants, with a body of men, to receive the money; but, when he came to Jerusalem, he found the gates shut against him, and was told from the walls, that those within would stand to no such agreement.

This was such treatment, that the Roman general, without any more to do, clapped Aristobulus, whom he had taken with him, in chains, and so marching forward with his whole army, was, by the prevalence of Hyrcanus's party, received into Jerusalem; but the other faction, retiring to the mount of the temple, broke down the b The fourth book of the Maccabees (chap. xxxvi.), says nothing of this submission of Aristobulus to the Roman general, but tells us, that Pompey marched directly against Jerusalem, where observing the situation of the place, the strength of its walls, towers, &c. he resolved to try to gain Aristobulus by fair means; that he invited him to come into his camp, and promised him all the safety that he could desire; that accordingly he came to him, and engaged to deliver up all the treasure of the temple, if he would but declare for him; but that the priests having refused to ratify the king's promise, this made the general lay siege to the temple.—Universal History, b. vi. c. 11.

bridges over the deep ditches and valleys that surrounded it, and so resolved to defend the place: but there was no withstanding a Roman army long. In three months' time Pompey ^a became master of the mount, which he carried sword in hand; and, having made a dreadful carnage upon this occasion, he caused afterwards all such prisoners ^b to be put to death, as were found to have been the principal incendiaries of this war.

Before he left Jerusalem, he, with several other chief officers accompanying him, went into the temple, and caused the most sacred parts of it, even the holy of holies, into which himself entered, to be opened. He visited the treasuries likewise, where he found two thousand talents of silver, besides vessels, and other things of great value; but ^c touching nothing of all this, he left it entire for the sacred uses to which it was appropriated. He thought it advisable, however, to destroy the walls of Jerusalem; and though he restored Hyrcanus to the high priesthood, and made him prince of the country, yet he deprived him of all the new conquests which his predecessors had made; would not permit him to wear a diadem; and obliged him to pay an annual tribute to the Romans; and having thus regulated all matters, he set forward on his journey home, carrying with him Aristobulus, his two sons, Alexander and Antigonus, and two of his daughters, as captives, to be led before him in his triumph.

Alexander, on the way, found means to make his escape; and, after three years, returning into Judea, gathered forces, and possessed himself of several places; but Gabinius, the Roman governor in Syria, defeated him in all his attempts, and then coming to Jerusalem, confirmed Hyrcanus in the priesthood: but the civil administration ^d he took from the sanhedrim, and

^a It is supposed by Josephus, that the mount of the temple would have hardly been taken so soon by the Romans, had it not been for the superstition of the Jews in their observation of the sabbath. For though they now held it lawful to defend themselves vigorously on that day, yet they would not stir a hand to amoy the enemy, or obstruct them in any of their works. This Pompey observing, ordered his men to employ the sabbath-day in nothing else but in making their approaches, wherein the besieged giving them no molestation, their engines of battery were brought forward, and without opposition placed just as they pleased; and so being fitted, and raised to advantage, soon made a breach in the wall large enough for an assault.—Josephus's Jewish Wars, b. i. c. 5.

^b Among these, it is supposed, that Absalom, a younger son of the famous John Hyrcanus, suffered; he had lived a private life, without meddling with public affairs, under the protection of his brother Alexander Jannæus; but having unhappily married his daughter to his nephew Aristobulus, he was, by that means, drawn into his son-in-law's party, and being taken prisoner, in all probability was put to death; because from that time we find no farther mention made of him.—Joseph. Antiq. b. xiv. c. 8; and Universal History.

^c But though Pompey was thus modest, yet Crassus soon after coming that way, not only extorted the two thousand talents, and a large bar of gold, by way of bribe, to restrain him from farther plunder, but, contrary to the promise which he had given upon oath, ransacked the temple all over, and robbed it of every thing that he thought worth taking away, insomuch, that the whole of his sacrilegious plunder amounted to the value of ten thousand talents, which is above two millions of our money.—Joseph. Antiq. b. xiv. c. 12, and Jewish Wars, b. i. c. 6.

^d Before this, the government had been managed under the prince by two sorts of councils, or courts of justice; one consisting of twenty-three persons, called the 'lesser sanhedrim;' and the other, of seventy-two, called the 'greater sanhedrim.' Of the first sort there was one in every city; only in Jerusalem, put into the hands of such magistrates as himself made choice of; and having divided the whole land into five provinces, appointed a court of justice, with power ultimately to determine every thing, over each of them. Aristobulus, late king of Judea, after he had been five years a prisoner at Rome, having with his son Antigonus made his escape, returned to Judea, with some few forces which he had got together, was endeavouring to raise fresh troubles. But Gabinius came upon him before he was prepared to make a sufficient resistance; and having taken him and his son prisoners, sent them both again to Rome, where his father was kept in durance; but his children, upon the intercession of Gabinius, were immediately sent back to Judea.

Not long after this, the difference between Cæsar and Pompey occasioned a distraction in the Roman affairs, and a general contention all the empire over. Pompey had left some forces in Syria; and Cæsar, to oppose against these, had set Aristobulus at liberty, and proposed to have sent him with two legions into Judea, in order to secure that province; but before he could get out of Rome, he was poisoned by some of Pompey's party, and his body remained a long time there, embalmed in honey, till M. Anthony procured it to be carried into Judea, where it was honourably interred in the royal sepulchre.

When Cæsar returned from the Alexandrian war, Antigonus, the second son of Aristobulus, (for Scipio, by Pompey's order had caused his elder brother's head to be struck off at Antioch,) met him in Syria, and having complained of the hard fate which his father and brother had met with, he charged Hyrcanus and Antipater with having possessed themselves of the government by force; but Antipater, who was then with Cæsar, defended his own and Hyrcanus's cause so very well, that Cæsar, instead of restoring Antigonus, as he desired, made it a ^e decree, that Hyrcanus should hold the office of high because of the greatness of the place, there were two, which sat apart from each other in two distinct rooms. Of the latter sort there was only one in the whole land. The lesser sanhedrim despatched all affairs of justice arising within the respective cities where they sat, and the precincts belonging to them. The great sanhedrim presided over the affairs of the whole nation, received appeals from the lesser sanhedrims, interpreted the laws, and, by new institutions from time to time, regulated the execution of them. All this Gabinius abolished; and, instead thereof, erected five courts, or sanhedrims, and invested them all with sovereign power, independent on each other. The first of them he placed at Jerusalem; the second at Jericho; the third at Gadra; the fourth at Amathus; and the fifth at Scaphorus; and having, under these five cities, divided the land into five provinces, he ordered the inhabitants of each to repair to the court which he had there erected, and from which there was no appeal, except it was to Rome. Besides the two sorts of sanhedrims above-mentioned, there was a third court among the Jews, which was not affected by any of these alterations, and that was the court of three, instituted for the deciding of all controversies about bargains, sales, contracts, and all other such matters of common right between man and man. In all which cases, one of the litigants chose one judge, the other another, and these two chose a third, which three constituted a court to hear, and ultimately determine the matter in contest.—Talmud on the Sanhedrim; Lightfoot's Prospect of the Temple, c. xx. and xxii; and Joseph. Antiq. b. xiv. c. 10.

^e This decree, which at once abolished the aristocracy which Gabinius had lately set up, and restored the Jewish state to its pristine sovereignty, according to Josephus, runs in this form:—“Julius Cæsar, emperor, the second time dictator, and Pontifex Maximus, &c. Forasmuch as Hyrcanus, the son of Alexan-priest at Jerusalem, and the principality of Judea with it, to him and those of his family in a perpetual succession; by which he restored the government to its ancient form, and abolished the aristocracy which Gabinius had instituted, and that Antipater should be the procurator of Judea under him.

This Antipater, who was a person of great wisdom, of powerful interest in several places, and in high favour with the Romans, had two sons, Phasael and Herod; to the former of which he gave the government of the country about Jerusalem, and to the other that of Galilee. Phasael behaved himself in his administration with great lenity; but Herod was a man of a different character, and his boisterous temper made him less acceptable to the Jews.

At this time there was a gang of thieves that infested Galilee, and the neighbouring parts of Cœlo-Syria, whom Herod fell upon, and having taken one Hezekiah their ringleader, with several of his associates, put them all to death. Those who envied the prosperity of Antipater, and the growth and greatness of his power, made this a handle to accuse Herod to Hyrcanus for executing men without a legal trial, and obtained a citation from him to summon Herod to answer for it before the sanhedrim. He came; but as he made his appearance in a purple robe, and surrounded with his guards, he so overawed that great council, that they all sat silent without saying a word against him, until Simeas, a man of great justice and integrity, rose up, and with a becoming presence of mind, complained, that he never saw a criminal appear in a court of justice so attended; that it looked as if he meant to make the administration thereof more dangerous to the judges, than the malefactor: "but this," says he, turning to the high priest, "is not so much to be imputed to his insolence, as to your connivance, which encourages it: yet know," continued he, "that his person whom you screen from the justice of the laws, will be a scourge to you all." Nor was he in this a false prophet.

For Herod having, by the persuasion of the high priest, for fear that the sentence of the sanhedrim should pass against him, made his escape from Jerusalem, and retired to Damascus, where Sextus Cæsar, the prefect of Syria, then resided, and put himself under his protection, he so far insinuated himself with him, that for a sum of money, with which he presented him, he obtained the government of Cœlo-Syria, where he soon raised an army, and marched it into Judea, with an intent to have deposed Hyrcanus, and cut off the whole sanhedrim for the indignity they had put upon him by their late process; but his father Antipater, and his brother Phasael, met him, and dissuaded him from it; so that, for the present, he dropped his resentment.

As long as Julius Cæsar lived, the Jews were held in great honour and esteem by the Romans, and had several decrees passed in their favour: but ^a after his untimely death, their country became a prey to every hungry general of Rome. Cassius, having made himself master of Syria, exacted of the Jews about seven hundred talents of silver, which Antipater prevailed with his two sons to pay him, and so preserved himself the longer in the government of Judea. He was, as we said, procurator of the province under Hyrcanus; and the next man to him in power and authority was Malicus: but not being contented to be the second man next the prince, he would fain have been the first; especially since he was a natural Jew, and Antipater but an Idumean. Antipater had all along been his fast friend, and upon more occasions than one saved his life: but he, like an ungrateful wretch, was continually laying plots against him; and, at length, taking the opportunity of his dining one day with Hyrcanus, he bribed the butler to give him poison in his wine, of which he died, and then, with an armed force, seized on the government of Jerusalem. Phasael and Herod had, for a long time, suspected this traitor's design against their father, and when they heard of his death, they concluded that he was the author of it. They thought proper, however, to conceal their resentment for the present; but as soon as Herod found a fit opportunity, ^b he had him taken off.

^a While Julius Cæsar was preparing for an expedition against the Parthians, in order to revenge the death of Crassus, and the Romans that were slain with him at the battle of Carræ, on the ides of March, that is, on the fifteenth day of that month, four days before he intended to set out upon that expedition, he was murdered in the senate-house, by a conspiracy of the senators. This was the most villainous act, and the more so, because the prime authors of it, namely, Marcus Brutus, Decimus Brutus, Cassius, Trebonius, and some others of them, were the very persons whom Cæsar, in the highest manner, had obliged; yet it was executed under the notion of a high heroic virtue, in thus freeing their country from one, whom they called a tyrant: and the manner in which it was executed, is this: as soon as he came into the senate-house, Attilius Cimber, who was one of the conspirators, presented himself, according as it was agreed among them, to demand his brother's pardon, who was banished; but upon Cæsar's refusal, under pretence of begging it with greater submission, laid hold of the bottom of his robe, and pulled it so hard, that he made him bend his back: then Casca drew his dagger, and stabbed him in the shoulder, but the wound proved but slight, so that Cæsar fell upon him: but as they were scuffling, another of the conspirators came behind and stabbed him in the side, Cassius at the same time wounded him in the face, and Brutus pierced his thigh. With much courage he still defended himself; but the blood he lost through so many wounds having much weakened him, he went to the foot of Pompey's statue, where he fell and expired, after having been stabbed in three and twenty places by the hands of those whom he thought he had disarmed by his good offices.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 44, and Vertot's Revolution of Rome, c. 13.

^b The matter was conducted thus:—Cassius being informed by Herod of the manner of his father's death, gave him leave to revenge himself on the murderer, and sent his orders to the forces, under his command at Tyre, to be assistant to him therein. On Cassius's taking Laodicea, all the princes and chief lords of Syria and Palestine hastened thither with their presents and congratulations. Hyrcanus, together with Malicus and Herod, put himself upon the road for the same purpose; and as they drew near to Tyre, where they were to lodge that night, Herod invited all the company to sup with him; and sending his servants before, under pretence of providing the

These services and good offices duly considered, I do hereby confirm and establish to him and his heirs, the perpetual government of the Jews, both as their prince and high priest, after the manner and method of their own laws; and from this day forward, enrol them among the number of my trusty and well beloved friends, and ratify an alliance with them as my associates. I ordain likewise that all the legal pontifical rights and privileges be devolved upon him, and his sons for ever; and that in case any controversy shall arise among the people concerning the Jewish discipline, himself and his family, in the course of succession, shall be the only judge of it."—*Joseph. No sooner was the death of Malicus, and the manner of it known at Jerusalem, but a party of his friends rose in arms to revenge it on the sons of Antipater; and having gained Hyrcanus, and Felix commander of the Roman forces on their side, put the whole city in an uproar. Herod was then with Fabius, the Roman governor of Damascus, and there laid up with sickness; so that the whole storm fell upon Phasael, which he weathered with full success: for he drove Felix and all that tumultuous party out of Jerusalem, and when his brother recovered and returned, they both together soon quelled the faction, and would doubtless have resented the high priest's behaviour upon this occasion with more severity, but that, at this time a match was set on foot between Herod and his grand-daughter Mariamme, ^a which reconciled all differences. But though the faction was, for the present, suppressed, it was not long before it revived.

After the defeat of Brutus ^b and Cassius, by M. Anthony and Cæsar Octavianus ^c at Philippi, Anthony, coming into Asia, was attended by the deputies of most princes and states in that part of the world, and, among others, with several principal persons of the Jewish nation, who were sent to accuse Phasael and Herod of usurping the government from Hyrcanus: but partly by money, and partly by interest, Herod had so far pre-supper by them, he communicated the orders of Cassius to the commanders of the Roman garrison in the city, who accordingly sent out a party of armed men, that fell upon Malicus as he drew near to the place, and slew him.—Joseph. Antiq. b. xiv. c. 10; and Jewish Wars, b. i. c. 9.

^a She was the daughter of Alexander, the son of king Aristobulus, by Alexandra the daughter of Hyrcanus the second, and therefore was grand-daughter to both these brothers. She was a lady of extraordinary beauty and great virtue, and in all other laudable qualifications, accomplished beyond most of her time; but the true motive for Herod's desiring to make her his wife was, because the Jews at this time had a very zealous affection for the Asmonean family; and therefore he thought that, by marrying this lady, he should the easier reconcile the hearts of the people to him.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 38.

^b Philippi is a town of Macedonia, to the inhabitants of which St Paul wrote his epistle; but what made this place the most remarkable, was the famous battle that was fought near it, between the army under Octavianus and Anthony, and that under Brutus and Cassius, consisting of near a hundred thousand men each. Brutus and Cassius both commanded in the action; but Octavianus being sick in his tent, the command of the other army fell wholly upon Anthony. The forces commanded by Cassius were soon repulsed, so that he retired to a hill, there to wait for an account of that part of the army which was commanded by Brutus; but in the confusion and dust, not being able to perceive what was doing, his mind misgave him that Brutus was overcome, and thereupon he commanded his servant Pindarus to cut off his head. Brutus, in the first day of action, was so successful, that he made the enemy retire, and took Octavianus's camp; but in a few days after, coming to a second engagement, he was entirely routed; and being loath to fall into the enemy's hands, prevailed with his friend Strabo to despatch him: and what is very remarkable in these two men's deaths, is, that they were both killed with the same swords wherewith they had murdered Cæsar.—Plut. on Brutus; Velleius Paternulus, b. ii. c. 70; Appian on the Civil Wars, b. iv.; and Dion Cassius, b. xlvii.

^c Octavianus was the son of Caius Octavius, by Atia the daughter of Julia, sister of Julius Cæsar; and therefore Julius adopted him, as being his nephew and next male relation, to be his son: upon his uncle's death he took upon him the name of Caius Julius Cæsar Octavianus, and by this name he was afterwards known, till that of Augustus, which was given after the victory at Actium swallowed up all the rest.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 42.

vailed with Anthony, that he would not so much as hear them. This, however, did not discourage the Jews that were his enemies; for when Anthony came to Daphne near Antioch, a hundred of the most considerable among them waited upon him with the like complaints. Here Anthony gave them a hearing; and when he put it to Hyrcanus, whether the two brothers or their accusers were in his opinion fittest to govern the state under him, he gave it for the two brothers; and Anthony, being minded to do them a farther favour, made them both tetrarchs, ^d and committed all the affairs of Judea to their administration. This he confirmed by letters to the Jews; and to oblige them to obey what he had done, he detained fifteen of the hundred as hostages, and would have put them to death, had not Herod saved them by his intercession.

This notwithstanding, they did not still give over their solicitation; but when Anthony came to Tyre, they sent a thousand of their principal men with the like accusations against the two brothers: but looking on this as a tumult, rather than embassy, he directed his soldiers to fall upon them, so that some of them were slain, and more wounded; and at the same time he sent a peremptory order to the magistrates to assist Herod in the recovery of his government. With this order Herod went to Jerusalem, and would have persuaded the people to receive him, by expostulating the danger of disobeying him, and provoking the Roman general; but instead of regarding his threats or advice, they fell upon him; and by killing some and wounding others of his attendants, so enraged Anthony against them, that he ordered their fifteen hostages to be put to death, and threatened a severe revenge against the rest.

In the mean time Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, having had long before attempted to possess himself of Judea, but being defeated, and expelled by Herod, fled to Parthia, and was there kindly received and protected. After he had been there some time, and established an interest among the most considerable persons of that nation, he promised them 1000 talents, and 500 of the finest ^e women in the country, if they would assist him in the recovery of his father's kingdom. The Parthians accepted of the proposal, and the king sent his general along with Antigonus, at the head of a powerful army, to invade Judea. As soon as they had entered the country, great numbers of the Jews joined them in their march; and when they came to Jerusalem, the faction that hated the two brothers declared for them: so that

^d This word, which sometimes occurs in scripture, and is pretty frequent among the descendants of Herod the Great, according to the force of the Greek, signifies a lord that has the fourth part of a state, province, or kingdom, without wearing a diadem, or bearing the title of a king; but it must not always be understood in a rigorous sense, because the name of tetrarch was given to him that possessed sometimes a half, and sometimes a third part, of any principality: nay, oftentimes the name of a king was given to him that was but a tetrarch, and that of a kingdom, to a tetrarchy.—Calmel's Dictionary, under the word.

^e The fourth book of Maccabees (chap. xlix.) says 800 women, the fairest and best bred in all the country: but Josephus adds, that Antigonus was not able to make good his contract, by reason that Herod had seized on most of the fine women, and sent them away with his wife and family to Massada, a place of safe retreat, whilst himself stayed behind with his guards, to cover their march, and prevent their being pursued.

Herod, not being able to defend the city, especially after he found that Hyrcanus, and his brother Phasaël were taken by the Parthians, and put in chains, made his escape by night; and taking his mother Cypros, and his sister Salome, Mariamme his bride, and Alexandra the mother of Mariamme with him, made the best of his way to Massada, a prodigious strong fortress, built on the top of a very high mountain, near the west side of the lake Asphaltites; and having furnished it with provisions for several months, he there left his mother, and the other women of quality, whom he had brought with him from Jerusalem, under the care and government of Joseph, another of his brothers, and so took his way to Petra in Arabia, hoping to procure some assistance from Malchus, who had succeeded Aretas, as king of that country: but before he reached Petra, he received a message from Malchus, desiring him to depart his dominions, because he was afraid he should offend the Parthians, who were his neighbours, if he should receive him.

The Parthians, when they found that Herod was gone from Jerusalem, after they had plundered the place, and the country round about, made Antigonus, as they had agreed, king of Judea, and delivered to him Hyrcanus and Phasaël in chains. Phasaël, knowing that his death was determined, put a voluntary end to his life and sufferings. For not having the liberty of his hands to dispatch himself, he beat out his brains against the wall of the prison, and Hyrcanus, to incapacitate him from being any longer high priest, had his ears cut off, and was then delivered back again to the Parthians, by them to be carried into the east, who, upon their return, left him at Seleucia.

Herod, having met with this unworthy treatment in Arabia, made what haste he could into Egypt, but when he came to Rhinocorura, he there was informed of his brother's death, and in what manner he had effected it; from thence he went to Pelusium, and so to Alexandria, where he took ship, and after a voyage of no small danger and difficulty, landed at Brundisium, from whence he proceeded to Rome; and having acquainted M. Anthony with the miserable state of his affairs in Judea, he most earnestly prayed his aid.

Anthony, remembering his friendship which he had with his father first, and afterwards with him, and being exasperated against Antigonus, whom he always looked upon as an enemy to the Roman people, and not a little affected with the promises which Herod had made, of giving him a large sum of money, if ever he should be reinstated; not only warmly espoused his cause himself, but engaged likewise Octavianus, who was afterwards called Augustus, so closely in his interest, that, by the help and influence of these two men, the senate unanimously decreed that Herod should be king of Judea, and Antigonus declared an enemy to the commonwealth. Having in the short space of seven days dispatched his affairs thus prosperously, he left Rome, and landing at Ptolemais, began to raise forces, with a design to march against Antigonus, who, ever since his departure, had besieged the fortress of Massada. With these, and such Roman auxiliaries as he received from Ventidius, Anthony's general, and Silo his lieutenant in Palestine, he made himself master of the greatest part of the country, took Joppa, relieved Massada, and, taking the castle of Bessa in his way, marched directly to Jerusalem, and there encamped on the west side of the city. Antigonus had provided the place with all warlike munitions, and a good garrison, which, with darts and stones from the walls, and flying parties frequently making excursions, very much infested Herod's army. Herod, in hopes of making easy work of it, sent a herald about the walls, to proclaim indemnity to all that would submit. Antigonus, on the contrary, directed his speech to Silo and the Romans, complained of the injustice they did him, in transferring the crown from him, who was of royal descent, to a plebeian, and half Jew, as Herod was: and from these, and such like reproaches on both sides, they came at length to acts of hostility, wherein Antigonus and his men behaved themselves so valiantly, that they soon drove the enemy from the walls.

Ventidius, indeed, had left Silo in Judea, to be assistant to Herod in the reduction of Jerusalem: but in his manner of managing the war, which was to get great sums from Herod to promote his interest, and greater from Antigonus to hinder it, he did him more harm than good: for he did not only take all methods to squeeze him, but encouraged his soldiers likewise to mutiny, on pretence of wanting forage and provisions, more commodious quarters, and better pay; which, when at any time Herod endeavoured to remedy, Antigonus, having notice of all that passed, with flying parties and ambuscades, frequently intercepted and cut off the convoys that were designed for the united army: though Herod, who was as active and diligent as the enemy, very often came up with them, and pursued his advantage so closely, that, having with some difficulty recovered all Galilee from Antigonus, he, after that, betook himself to rid it of those gangs^a of thieves and banditti, which at that time very much infested it.

All this while the siege of Jerusalem went on but slowly; and Herod, perceiving that the Roman generals were very cool to his interest, was resolved to go again to Anthony, who was then besieging Samosata, a city upon the Euphrates, to make a representation of their behaviour. During his absence, he left his brother Joseph to command in Judea, giving strict orders to put nothing to the hazard until his return; but Joseph forgetting this, ventured upon an expedition against Jericho, where, being circumvented by the enemy, he was slain himself, and most of his forces cut to pieces; which gave those that were disaffected to Herod, both in Galilee and Idumæa, an opportunity of revolting. Anthony, when he heard that Herod was coming, drew out his army to receive him, and, while he staid with him, showed him all the marks of friendship and esteem: but, designing himself to go into Egypt,^b he left the army with Socius, ordering him to assist Herod upon all occasions; and he accordingly gave him two legions for the guard of his person, and marched after himself with the rest of the forces.

^a These thieves had so sheltered themselves in the caves, and holes of the mountains, that it was no easy matter to come at them, because the steepness and cragginess of the mountains made it almost impossible, either to scale them from below, or from above to get down to them by any passage; and therefore, to ferret them out of their dens, Herod was forced to make certain large chests, and, filling them with soldiers, to let them down into the entrance of these caves by chains from engines which he had fixed above: by which means, he either destroyed all that lurked in them, or else reduced them to terms of submission.—Joseph. Antiq. b. xiv.

Upon his return from Anthony, Herod, while he was at Daphne, had an account of his brother's death and defeat, which made him hasten to mount Lebanon, where he raised eight hundred of the natives, and with these and the Roman forces came to Ptolemais, and thence marching by night, he passed through Galilee, subdued all that came in his way, and forced the rest into their strongholds. But while he was hastening towards Jericho, with an intent to avenge his brother Joseph's death, a party of six thousand of the enemy came resolutely down the hills, and put the Romans into great consternation, beating back the vanguard, and pursuing them home to their camp, where they so warmly engaged them, that Herod himself was wounded in the conflict: but, not long after, when Antigonus, flushed with this success, had sent Pappus his general, with the main strength of his forces against him, he gave them an entire defeat, slew Pappus in the rout, and, had it not been for the severity of the winter, which was now approaching, had gone immediately to Jerusalem, and so made an end of the war: but that he was forced to refer to the operations of the next campaign.

When Herod came before Jerusalem, his own army consisted of about thirty thousand, to which Socius^a brought eleven legions of foot, and six thousand horse, besides the auxiliary troops of Syria. However, the city held out several months with a great deal of resolution; but, at last, the besieged being beaten out of all their places of defence, and the enemy exasperated at the length and tediousness of the siege, all things were in the utmost confusion. Rapine and devastation was the general work; and death and slaughter raged every where, without distinction of age or sex. In vain did Herod endeavour to put a stop to this rage and cruelty. "The spoils of the city, he was told, were the soldiers' due, as a reward for their labour and valour in taking it." So that, with a large sum of money, he was forced to preserve and redeem it.

charms of her beauty and wit, had drawn him into those snares which held him enslaved to her as long as he lived, and, in the end, caused his ruin. She was a woman of great parts, and spoke several languages, as well as Latin and Greek, very fluently; but then she was a person of great vices, and, among others, of such insatiable avarice and ambition, that she made a conscience of nothing if she could but get by it. Her brother, a youth of about fifteen years of age, she caused to be dispatched, and prevailed with Anthony to have her sister Arsinoe cut off at Ephesus, even in the temple of Diana. Anthony indeed was a man of a sweet temper, and great generosity, an eloquent speaker, and a complete master in all military abilities: but then he was a great libertine in his way, and so eager in the pursuit of his unlawful pleasures, that he stuck at nothing to attain them; by which means he brought himself so absolutely under the command of this wicked and voluptuous woman, that, as Josephus expresses it, "she seems, not only to have captivated, but bewitched him."—Prideaux's Connection, anno 30, and Joseph. Antiq. b. xv. c. 4.

^a It is generally thought, that a legion was composed of ten cohorts; a cohort, of fifty maniples; a manipule, of fifty men, and consequently that a legion was a body of six thousand soldiers; but others are clearly of opinion, that it was an uncertain number, and contained sometimes four, sometimes five, and sometimes six thousand men.—Calmet's Dictionary, under the word, and Prideaux's Connection, anno 37, in the notes.

Antigonus, seeing all lost, surrendered himself to Socius, and, in a submissive and abject manner, fell at his feet, imploring mercy: but Socius, insulting his meanness of spirit and want of courage, had him put in chains; and so leaving Herod in full possession of the kingdom, took his prisoner along with him to Anthony. Anthony, at first, intended to have reserved Antigonus in order to grace his triumph; but Herod, not thinking himself safe in his kingdom, as long as this remainder of the royal family continued alive, never left soliciting him, till at length, by a good sum of money, he obtained that this poor prince should be put to death; and, with him ended the reign of the famous and illustrious house of the Asmoneans; illustrious in itself, for the long continuance of the regal and sacerdotal succession in it, and no less famous for the many signal services which they and their ancestors, from time to time, had done the public, after it had lasted, from the beginning of Judas Maccabeus to this time, one hundred and twenty-nine years.

As soon as Herod had got full possession of the kingdom of Judea, he began to revenge himself on all those whom he looked upon as his enemies; and, among these, put all the members of the great sanhedrim to death, except Pollio^b and Simeas, who, during the siege, were all along for delivering up the city to Herod, whereas all the rest opposed the motion, and did what they could to excite the people to that fierce and obstinate resistance which they made. All this while Hircanus was captive in Parthia; and, as the people wanted a high priest, Herod's business was to choose a man of obscurity to that office, who, having no credit or interest at Jerusalem, might not be capable, notwithstanding his high station and dignity in the church, to interfere with the regal authority; and accordingly he sent for one Ananel from Babylon, who was of the pontifical family indeed, but of no farther merit, than that he was an acquaintance of Herod's, and put him into the office.

^b They are so named by Josephus; but the Jewish writers generally call them Hillel and Shammai; and of Hillel, in particular, they give us this account, namely, that he was born in Babylonia, and there lived till he was forty years old; that when he came to Jerusalem, he betook himself to the study of the law, in which he grew so eminent, that, after forty years more, he became president of the sanhedrim, and that in this office he continued forty years after; so that, according to this account, he lived full a hundred and twenty years; but the Jewish writers, for the sake of a round number, are frequently negligent whether they are exact or not in their chronological computations. Of Shammai they likewise tell us, that he was for some time the scholar of Hillel, and upon the removal of Manahem into Herod's service, was made vice-president of the sanhedrim in his room; and that of all the Tannaim or Mishical doctors, he came nearest to his master in eminence of learning, though in many points he differed in opinion from him. What we are chiefly to observe in relation to these two men at present is,—that Herod should thus generously forgive them both, though Shammai, or Simeas, was the person who appeared so intrepid against him at his trial before the sanhedrim, and Hillel, or Pollio, had all along warmly espoused the party of Hircanus. It must be presumed, however, that these two great men, whom he not only spared above all the rest, but took into his especial favour and confidence, had, during the siege, taken care to make their peace with him, by exhorting the besieged to a surrender: for while the contrary faction was encouraging the people with crying out, 'The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord,' and making them expect some miraculous deliverance, these two wise politicians, foreseeing that the city could not hold out much longer against such a vigorous siege, and under the excessive want of all provisions, told them, in short, that all resistance was in vain, since God, for their sins, was now bringing them into subjection to this foreigner; and this piece of service, had Herod been of a more vindictive temper than he really was, could not well fail of reconciling them to his favour.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 37; and Joseph. Antiq. b. xv. c. 4.

Marianne, his best beloved wife, had then a brother, whose name was Aristobulus, to whom by right of birth the high priesthood did belong; and, as she was continually soliciting him in behalf of her brother, so her mother Alexandra, who was the daughter of Hyrcanus, and a woman of a high spirit, wrote to Cleopatra queen of Egypt, who had an absolute ascendant over Anthony, to incline him to bestow the pontifical honour upon her son: so that for fear of offending Anthony, more than for gratifying of the ladies, he deposed Ananel,^a and made Aristobulus, who was then but a youth of seventeen years old, high priest in his stead.

When Phraortes came to be king of Parthia, and was informed of Hyrcanus's character and quality, he treated him with great courtesy: for he ordered him to be released from his chains, and allowed him to reside at Babylon, which was then part of the Parthian empire, and where a great number of Jews dwelt, who paid him both the reverence due to a high priest, and the honour due to a king.

In this condition Hyrcanus might have lived and ended his days very happily; but, being desirous of returning to his native country, he began to entertain great hopes of Herod's friendship, as having been once the preserver of his life, when he was arraigned before the sanhedrim, and the founder indeed of all his fortunes. Herod, on the other hand, was as desirous to have Hyrcanus in his power as the other was to come: and therefore he not only invited him with great earnestness and greater promises, but sent an embassy to Phraortes to solicit his return. Thus having obtained the king's dismissal, the unfortunate old prince was carried back to Jerusalem, and, for some time, treated by Herod with all the outward tokens of kindness and respect.

His daughter Alexandra having, by her interest with Cleopatra, obtained the high priesthood for her son, thought that (as it was his right) she might by the same means procure him the crown, and therefore went on intriguing with Cleopatra, which when Herod came to understand, he confined her to the palace, and set spies upon her. This she resented with great indignation, as being made a prisoner, and therefore formed a design to make her escape, and to carry her son with her into Egypt to Cleopatra, who, upon this occasion, had invited them thither. But the design was discovered, and their journey stopped. Herod, however, for fear of Cleopatra, was forced to suspend his resentment, and making a virtue of necessity, pretended with great clemency to pardon in both what he could not well punish in either: but in a short time he had his revenge.

^a This is the third person that had been deposed from the pontifical dignity since the time of the return from the Babylonish captivity; and Herod was so sensible of the illegality of it, that when Anthony sent to him to desire him to put Aristobulus into Ananel's place, at first he excused himself, by alleging, that such depositions were contrary to the Mosaic law, which enjoined that the dignity should last as long as the life of the possessor, unless some defect happened to disqualify him. The first instance we meet with of this kind is that of Jason's supplanting his brother Onias, and by a larger sum of money, buying that office of Antiochus, in prejudice of the incumbent. The other was that of Hyrcanus, by his nephew Aristobulus, who wrested that dignity from him by main force. But these depositions became afterwards so frequent, that there was hardly any other way of coming into that office, but by the expulsion of the incumbent.—Universal History, b. ii. c. 11.

At the approach of the feast of tabernacles, Aristobulus was to officiate as high priest. He was a very beautiful person, tall and well shaped, and in the eighteenth year of his age. In the time of his officiating he discharged himself with so becoming a reverence, and the splendour of the pontifical robes added such a lustre to the gracefulness of his person, that by both these he captivated the affections of the people, and every man's mouth was full of his praises; which raised the tyrant's jealousy to such a degree, that as soon as the festival was over, he had him drowned at Jericho,^b though, to make his death pass for an unhappy accident, wherein he had no hand, he acted the part of chief mourner, and expended a large sum in a splendid funeral for him; but his hypoerisy was seen through, and detested by all.

Alexandra, in particular, was inconsolable for the loss of her son; nor could she have survived it, but for the hopes of having an opportunity of being revenged. To this purpose, having acquainted Cleopatra with the murder, she so represented Herod's villany, and her own distress, as moved the queen's compassion, and engaged her to do her utmost to revenge her cause: for she never left soliciting Anthony, till, at length, she prevailed with him to call Herod to an account for this wicked fact. But when Herod appeared before him, by fair words and large presents, he so effectually wrought upon Anthony, that instead of condemning, he seemed to vindicate him for what he had done: whereupon, returning with much joy, and in triumph as it were over his accusers, he grew more tyrannical than ever, and in a short time shut up Alexandra in close confinement.

When he went to appear before Anthony, he left his uncle Joseph in the administration of the government, and gave him particular charge, that in case Anthony should put him to death, he should not suffer Marianne, his best beloved wife, to survive the first news of it, that none, as he proceeded, might enjoy so rare a beauty but himself. In his absence, some words had passed between Marianne and his sister Salome, wherein the queen reproached her with the meanness of her original, in comparison of the royal stock of the Asmonæans, from whom she descended. This the other was resolved to revenge; and, therefore, as soon as Herod returned, she accused Mariamne of having too great a familiarity with Joseph, whom, though he was her own husband, as well as her uncle, she was content to sacrifice rather than not obtain her will upon the other. One thing that might contribute to the increase of Herod's jealousy, and the confirmation of what his sister had told him, was the fatal secret which Joseph had indiscreetly blabbed out, and Mariamne, in her passion, could not retain; for nothing less than an adulterous conversation, he thought, could have produced such a discovery; and, therefore, when she upbraided him with it, he was going to draw his dagger, and strike her to the heart; but though his love interposed to save her, he ordered his uncle immediately to be executed, without allowing him leave so much as to speak for himself; which when he came to know his innocence, and the queen's virtue, he could not but regret.

^b Herod had invited him to an entertainment at Jericho, and when after dinner several of his attendants bathed themselves in a fish pond, Aristobulus was prevailed upon to bear them company; but no sooner was he plunged into the water, but those that were in it before, according as they were directed by Herod, ducked and dipped him, by way of sport and play, as they pretended, so long under water, that at length he was actually drowned.—Jewish Antiq. b. xv. c. 3.

^c This he did, not so much that none else might have the enjoyment of the beautiful Marianne, as that none might be left alive of the Asmonæan family to claim the crown, in opposition to that disposal which he had made of it to his brother Pheroras. Alexandra, the mother of Marianne, he knew very well was a crafty and aspiring woman; and, therefore, being apprehensive that the scheme which he had laid for the succession, could not take place, if either she, or her daughter were left alive after him, he ordered that both of them should be put to death, in case he should miscarry in his application to Anthony.—Jos. Antiq. b. xv. c. 11.

A. M. 3978. A. C. 26; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 5374. A. C. 74. JOS. HIST. b. xii. c. 19—END OF B. XV.

While these things were thus going on in Judea, there happened a grievous breach ^a between Anthony and Octavianus, which terminated in a civil war, wherein Anthony at the battle of Actium was quite ruined and undone. During the whole course of this war, Herod had always followed Anthony's party, and had therefore reason to fear that the conqueror would deprive him of his kingdom for being so firm a friend to his enemy, and perhaps restore again Hyrcanus, who had once reigned under the protection of the Romans; and, therefore, to prevent this, upon pretence of his holding correspondence with Malchus king of Arabia, in order to accomplish some treasonable designs against him, he ^b caused him to be put to death, after he had passed the eightieth year of his age. His wife Mariamne, and her mother, he secured in the castle of Alexandrion, with a strong guard under the command of Sohemus, and with the same order that he had left with his uncle Joseph before; and having committed the government of the kingdom to the care of Pheroras, another of his brothers, he set forward on his journey to meet Octavianus.

Octavianus was then at Rhodes, where Herod, having obtained audience, as he entered into his presence, laid aside his diadem, and in his address to him freely owned all that he had done for Anthony, and what he was far-

^a Anthony had provoked Octavianus against him, by the wrong done to Octavia his sister, whom Anthony had married, and yet divorced her for the gratification of his adulterous love to Cleopatra, though Octavia was much the handsomer of the two. Anthony had likewise given out, that Cleopatra had been married to Julius Cesar, and that Cesarion, whom she had by him, was his lawful son, and consequently had the proper right to the inheritance, which Octavianus held only as his adopted son. These things were objected against Anthony; and Anthony, by his agents and letters, was not forgetful to recriminate. But these things were no more than pretences; the true reason of their disagreement was, that both these two great men, being not contented with half of the Roman empire, were each resolved to have all, and accordingly agreed to throw the dice of war for it.—Plutarch on Antonius; and Prideaux's Connection, anno 33.

^b The character which Josephus gives of this prince is to this effect:—He was a man of eminent candour, justice, and moderation; but a lover of his ease, and so conscious to himself of his own insufficiency for the offices of public administration, that, for the most part, he intrusted that charge in other hands. This facility of his was the making of Antipater and Herod's fortune, though, without any colour of law or equity, it cost him his life.—Jewish Antiq. b. xv. c. 9.

ther ready to have done, had he required it of him. "Thus," he said, "he thought himself obliged to, by the friendship that was between them; and would he be pleased to think the like friendship worthy of his acceptance, since Anthony was now quite lost, he would not fail to serve him with the same zeal and fidelity." This Herod delivered with such an intrepidity, that Octavianus, pleased with the spirit of the man, caused him to put on his diadem again, accepted of his friendship, and confirmed him in the kingdom of Judea.

Pleased with this good success, Herod went back to Judea with great joy; but on his arrival found all his felicity soured with the troubles of his own family. Mariamne, his most beloved wife, in whose conversation he took the greatest delight, having bribed the secret out of Sohemus, conceived thereupon such a strong hatred and aversion to him, that she received his embraces with scorn, and concealing the true cause of her resentment, was perpetually upbraiding him with the murder of her nearest relations; so that, by this provoking treatment, his patience was almost quite worn out. Hearing, however, of the death of Anthony and Cleopatra, and how Octavianus had thereupon made himself master of all Egypt, he thought himself obliged to wait on him there likewise.

He was received with great kindness, and having, in his return, accompanied him to Antioch, he so far ingratiated himself with him on the way, that he granted him several places in augmentation of his dominions, and, for ever after, of all the tributary princes in the Roman empire, gave him the first place in his favour. But how prosperous soever he was in his affairs abroad, when he returned, he found nothing but trouble and vexation at home. Mariamne still retained her resentment, for the cruel commission given to Sohemus; so that, when he offered her his caresses, she not only rejected them, as usual, with the utmost aversion, but added, over and above, such bitter reproaches for the death of her relations, as provoked and enraged him to so high a degree, that he could hardly forbear laying violent hands upon her. This fit of rage her implacable enemy Salome took the advantage of, and sent in his butler, whom she had before suborned for that purpose, to accuse the queen of having tempted him to give the king poison; whereupon he ordered her favourite eunuch, without whose privacy he knew she did nothing, to be put upon the rack; but all that he confessed was, that something which Sohemus had told Mariamne, was the cause of her being out of humour.

Upon the hearing of this, Herod fell into a rage of jealousy; and, supposing that nothing but a criminal intimacy could have induced Sohemus to betray this secret to her, he ordered him immediately to be put to death; and then, calling together a council of his friends, and accusing her of an intention to take away his life, he had her condemned, but not with a design to have her put to death; but the malice of his mother and sister was so bitter against her, they would not let him be quiet. They knew very well his temper; and, being apprehensive, that as long as she was alive, he might easily relapse into his former fondness, they urged the necessity of her speedy execution, and had that influence over him, that he commanded her immediately to be put to death. But he soon repented him of his rashness.

For, after that his rage was quenched by her blood, his love revived, and the consideration of what he had done filled his mind with the agonies of remorse, and the regret of her loss affected him so, that he fell dangerously ill; but, upon recovery, he nevertheless gave orders for the execution of Alexandra, for having too easily credited the news that was spread abroad of his death.

He had two sons by Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobulus, whom he had sent to Rome for the benefit of education; but, upon their return home, by the same instruments that had procured their mother's death, they fell under their father's displeasure. For having in the heat of their youth let fall many rash words, which expressed their resentment of their mother's hard usage, with threats of revenge upon those that had been the chief authors of it; all this was carried to their father, with such malicious glosses and comments upon it, as made him believe that they were hatching ill designs against his person. He was naturally of a jealous temper, and this was so improved by the artifices of Pheroras and Salome, his brother and sister, that, in a council which consisted of none but his own creatures, he procured their condemnation, ^a and so ordered them to be strangled: and it was upon the account of their fate, and the execution of Antipater, ^b another of his sons after this, (who was, in reality, for procuring his father's death,) that Octavianus, then called Augustus, was used to say, that it was better to be Herod's hog than his son.

^a Josephus has represented this whole proceeding in this light: When Herod had complained to Augustus of the undutiful behaviour of his sons, how they had plotted against his life, and designed to have made their escape out of his dominions, Augustus advised him to call together a council at Berytus in Phœnicia, and so to inquire into the nature of their offences. This Herod accordingly did; but when he came into the assembly, which consisted of a hundred and fifty persons, such as Augustus had directed him to, (except Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, who, being father-in-law to Alexander, was thought by Herod too much engaged by that relation, to be an impartial judge in this matter,) he began to accuse his sons with great vehemence and passion, and, after having spoken in terms very unbecoming a father, he said, "that not only Augustus made him master of his sons' destiny, but that the very laws of the Jews declared, that if a son was accused by his parents, and they put their hands upon his head, all who were present should stone him, and put him to death; and therefore, though he might treat his sons in this manner, after the crimes whereof they stood convicted, yet he chose rather to have their opinions upon the matter, not doubting but that they would join with him in giving an example to future ages, of that just severity which ought to be exercised upon unnatural children." Saturninus, a man of consular dignity, who was at the head of the council, was for punishing Alexander and Aristobulus, but not with death; and three sons, who were present with him, concurred in the same opinion: but Voluminus pronounced that they were worthy of death, which the majority of the assembly too readily coming into, carried the question. On this occasion every one pitied the two princes, but no one durst speak plainly, for fear of incurring the king's displeasure: but at last, an old soldier of the king's, who had a son about Alexander's age, and his particular friend, took the liberty to make some sharp remonstrances to the king, telling him withal, that not only the officers and soldiers, but the whole body of the people, was moved with compassion for the young princes, and pitied their sad fate. Whereupon the king, losing all patience, commanded the soldier and his son to be seized, and all besides whom he had named. When the old man was put upon the rack, he confessed that he had taken up a resolution to kill the king, and to expose himself, for the love of Alexander, to all sorts of punishment. This confession both enraged and intimidated Herod, so that he sent his sons immediately to Sebaste, (formerly called Samaria,) and there ordered them to be strangled. And thus ended the life of these two unfortunate brothers, who, by too much expressing their resentment for their mother's death, provoked those who had been the chief authors of it, by the like artifices, to procure theirs.—See Josephus's affection hereupon.—Joseph. Antiq. b. xvi. c. 17.

But whatever opinion Augustus might have of Herod, it is certain that Herod had no small veneration for him, or at least carried his compliments very far. For he not only built two stately cities, and called them both by his name, ^c but in the very city of Jerusalem built a theatre and an amphitheatre, and, in honour of Augustus, celebrated games, and exhibited shows, which gave great disgust to the Jews, as things inconsistent with the legal constitutions and religion of their country. Nay, to such a degree of complaisance proceeded he, as not only to set up the Roman ensign, ^d which was the figure

^b This Antipater was Herod's eldest son by Doris, a woman of no quality, whilst himself was a private man; for which reason he kept him and his mother, for some time, at a distance from court: but when he began to take offence at Alexander and Aristobulus, his two sons by Mariamne, he thereupon treated him with a great deal of distinction, and, in a full assembly of the people, declared him his immediate heir to the crown. After the death of Mariamne's sons, he had nothing that stood in his way, but only the life of his father Herod: and, to get rid of him, he formed a conspiracy with his uncle Pheroras, (who, at this time, was in some disgrace with his brother the king,) to have him poisoned: but, that there might be no suspicion of his being concerned in the thing, he procured some of his friends to send for him to Rome, where he had been before under Agrippa's protection, on pretence of waiting upon Augustus. Herod, however, having found out the whole plot, wrote to his son, without giving him the least hint of it, to hasten his journey home, lest something should happen in his absence to his great disadvantage; whereupon he returned into Palestine, without the least suspicion of what had passed. When he came to Jerusalem, his friends, who attended him, were not permitted to enter the palace; and when he went to embrace the king, the king thrust him from him, upbraiding him with the murder of his brothers Alexander and Aristobulus, and with the parricide which he intended to have committed on his person, and whereof he accused him the next day, before Quintilius Varus, the governor of Syria. The proof was so plain against him, that Antipater, having nothing to say in his justification, was loaded with irons and put in prison. But while he was there, a false report being spread, that Herod was dead, he begged of his keeper to set him at liberty, and made him large promises if he would do it, which being brought to his father's ear, as weak as he was, (for he died in a few days after,) he raised himself upon his elbow, and calling one of his guards, sent him that moment to dispatch his son.—Joseph. Antiq. b. xvii. c. 7. and 9; and Jewish Wars, b. i. c. 21.

^c The one was Sebaste, which signifies the same in Greek as Augustus does in Latin. It was situated on the same place where stood Samaria, which Hyrcanus had destroyed, and was in part rebuilt by Gabinius, when he was governor of Syria, and called after his name: but as he was soon turned out of his government, it advanced no farther than a good large village, until Herod, who, from his stately structures, was afterwards called the Great, undertook to finish it, and, in so doing, spared no cost to make it one of the richest and most beautiful cities in his kingdom. The other was Casarea, so called in honour of the emperor, though its former appellation was "the Tower of Straton." It stood by the sea side, on the coasts of Phœnicia, upon the pass into Egypt, and was very convenient for trade, but that it had a bad harbour. To remedy this, therefore, he ordered a mole to be made in the form of a half moon, and large enough for a royal navy to ride in. The buildings of the town were all of marble, private houses as well as palaces; but the master-piece of all was the port, whereof we meet with a description in Joseph. Antiq. b. xv. c. 13.

^d This gave great offence to the Jews, because the Romans were known to pay divine honours to their ensigns, which they used to set up in some eminent place in their camp; according to that known passage of Tertullian, "the religion of the Romans was wholly of a warlike nature; the standard they venerated, by of an eagle, over one of the gates of the temple, but even to raise a sumptuous temple, all of white marble, in memory of the favours which Augustus had conferred on him; though, by this act of idolatrous flattery, he alienated the hearts of the Jews, and raised some conspirators ^a against his life.

To recover therefore their good opinion, and to make some amends for these breaches upon their law, in the nineteenth year of his reign he formed a design for rebuilding the temple, ^b which, by length of time, having the standard they swore, the standard they preferred to all their gods.”

^a There is a remarkable one of this kind, which is related by Josephus to this effect:—Ten citizens, taking offence at Herod's bringing in the rites of heathenish superstition, entered into a conspiracy to cut him off by an assassination. One of these conspirators was blind, and though in no condition to act any thing for the public good, offered to bear his part in suffering for it, and by his generous offer settled them all in their determinations. They therefore provided themselves with daggers under their garments, and went to the theatre, where Herod was to come, with a full intent to slay him there. But, as he was entering the theatre, one of his spies, for he had great plenty of them, having got some notice of the matter, made a discovery of it to him; so that, returning to his palace, he sent for the conspirators, who were so far from denying their design, that they produced the very daggers that were to have done the execution, alleging for themselves, “that they were not engaged in any criminal combination, to gratify their passions or interests, but in a secret league, for the common good, and the defence of their laws, which all true patriots and professors were bound to maintain with their lives.” After this declaration they were hurried away to death, and made to undergo the most exquisite torments. But the infamous informer did not long survive them; for, having incurred the general odium of the people, he was met by some in a private place, and torn to pieces.—Jewish Antiq. b. xv. c. 11.

^b Whatever some Jewish Rabbins may tell us, it is certain that the temple of Herod was widely different from that of Solomon, and from that which was built by Zerubbabel after the captivity; for the description of it, according to Josephus, who himself had seen it, is much to this purpose:—The front of this magnificent building, which resembled that of a royal palace, was adorned with many rich spoils, which the kings of the Jews had dedicated to God as the monuments of their victories. The middle of it, which was much higher than the two extremes, afforded a very agreeable prospect to the extent of several furlongs to those that either lived in the country, or were travelling to the city. The gate of it was a very curious piece of workmanship. From the top of it hung a variety of rich tapestry, of several colours, embellished with purple flowers. On each side of it stood a stately pillar, with a golden vine creeping and twining about it, whose branches were laden with a cluster of grapes, that hung dangling down from the cornices. Round about the temple were large galleries, answerable to the rest of the work in magnificence, and in beauty much exceeding all that had been before. The temple was surrounded by three courts or inclosures. The first inclosure, which was a square of a furlong on every side, had a gate on the east, another on the south, and another on the north side; but it had four towards the west; one leading to the palace, another into the city, and two more into the fields. It was secured without by a strong wall, and within was adorned with stately porticoes or galleries, sustained by no less than 162 columns of Corinthian work, and all so very thick, that hardly three men could grasp one with their arms. They supported a roof of cedar very curiously wrought, and made three galleries; the two outermost of which were of the same dimensions, that is, thirty feet in breadth, fifty in height, and a furlong in length; but that in the middle was half as broad again as the other, and twice as high. The court or area before these galleries was paved with marble of several colours, and, at a little distance, was a second inclosure, formed by a handsome balustrade of stone, and pillars at equal distances, whereon were inscriptions in Greek and Latin, giving warning to all strangers not to proceed any farther upon pain of death. To this inclosure there was but one entrance towards the east, but towards the north and south, at equal distances, thence. In the middle of now stood five hundred years, as well as the violence of enemies, was in a very decayed and ruinous condition. In two years' time he got together all proper materials, and in nine ^c and a half more, had it so far finished as to make it fit for divine service; though, to carry on the outbuildings, workmen were continued about it to the time of our Saviour's ministry, and longer.

While these things were doing in Judea, the temple of Janus was shut at Rome. In times of war the custom was to have its gates laid open, but shut in the time of peace; and it was now the fifth time, since the building of that city, that the gates of this temple had been shut. The first time was in the reign of Numa; the second, after the end of the first Punic war; the third, after Augustus's victory over Anthony and Cleopatra; the fourth, upon his return from the Cantabrian war in Spain; and the fifth, now in the twenty-sixth year of his reign, and in the thirty-third of Herod's, when a general peace, which lasted for twelve years together, prevailed over the world, and was a proper prelude for ushering in the advent ^d of the Prince of peace, even these two inclosures, there was a third, which included the temple, strictly so called, and the altar of burnt sacrifices, which was fifty cubits high, and forty cubits wide every way, all built of rough stone, on which no tool had ever been used. Into this court, which none but priests were permitted to enter, there were nine gates; one towards the east, four towards the south, and as many towards the north; but towards the west there was no gate, only one great wall ran all along from north to south. At the entrance of each gate within were large rooms in form of pavilions, of thirty cubits square, and forty high, supported by a pillar of eighteen feet in circumference; and the whole was adorned with porticoes, sustained by two rows of pillars, to the east, north, and south, but towards the west there was nothing but the wall just now mentioned. This is the description of the temple, as it was repaired by Herod, that may be extracted from Joseph. Antiq. b. xv. c. 13; but whoever is desirous to know these things more minutely, must consult those authors that have written upon them professionally; among which Mess. de Beausobre and L'enfant, in their general preface to the New Testament, have given us no bad sketch; and Jurieu, in his History of Opinions, &c. has rectified some mistakes in the account of Josephus, part ii. c. 4.

^c And yet the Jews could tell our Saviour, that ‘ forty and six years had the temple been building,’ (John ii. 20); but this is easily reconciled. For, though at the time, when the Jews spake to our Saviour, six and forty years had passed from the time that this building was begun, yet in nine years and a half it was made fit for divine service. The outbuildings however were far from being finished; and therefore a great number of labourers and artificers were continued at work all the time that our Saviour was upon the earth, and for some years after; till upon the coming of Gessius Florus, to be governor of Judea, eighteen thousand of them were discharged at one time, and these for want of other employ, began those mutinies and seditions, which at last drew on the destruction of Jerusalem, and the temple with it.—Joseph. Antiq. b. xx. c. 8.

^d According to the vulgar era, Christ was born in the four thousand and fourth year of the world's creation; but this way of computation, though it be commonly used, especially in this western part of the world, is a manifest mistake, which Dionysius Exiguus, a Scythian by birth, and afterwards a Roman abbot, was the first author of. In the first ages of Christianity, Christians had no particular epocha to themselves; they generally used that of the building of the city, or the years of the Cæsars in common with the Romans. The first that they made use of, was the era of Dioclesian; for his terrible persecution had made such an impression on their minds, that the time when it happened was long had in remembrance. It was in the year 527 of the vulgar Christian era, and not sooner, that the world began to compute time from our Saviour's birth; and therefore the wonder is less, that, after so great a distance of time, this Roman abbot should make a mistake in fixing the first year of it; but the mis-

Christ our Lord, who, according to the exactest computation, was born in the 4000th year ^a [the 5411th year according to Hales] of the world's creation.

CHAP. II.—Objections answered.

It cannot be expected, indeed, that any human composition should be without faults, and least of all can history promise itself that exemption, when it has so many distant and abstruse matters to inquire into, and is forced in many cases to take up with the testimony, and sometimes the conjectures of others. It may be said, however, in favour of Josephus, that the records from whence he compiled his history of the Jews, were either those of their own sacred Hebrew books; those of the prophets during the continuance of their succession; or those of the most authentic writers that flourished in their nation all along afterward. For, in the main, he was not so much an original historian himself, as an abridger of such ancient histories as he found in the highest esteem and veneration; and how fair and impartial he has been, about these times more particularly, in making this compilation, any one may perceive that will but give himself the trouble of comparing his abridgment of the first book of the Maccabees with the book itself. So fortune was, that, before the mistake was discovered, our countryman Bede's taking it without examination from him, and using it in all his writings, gave it a sanction; nor has the learned world as yet thought fit to correct it, out of a persuasion, I presume, that there may be some danger in altering things that are settled. It is thought sufficient for the purposes of chronology, that there is a certain Christian era fixed, which every one knows, and reckons by, though there may be some mistake, as to the particular time when it should have commenced. In short, this error has been too long followed to be corrected, which must of course alter all dates, and give the world too much trouble; and therefore it is but calling it a vulgar Christian era, and remembering that Christ was born four years before it began; it is but remembering, I say, that the year which we now write, 1743, ought to be 1747, and all is well.—Prideaux's Preface to the first part of his Connection; and Hearn's System of Universal History, b. i. c. 3.

^a This, we may observe, falls in exactly with the time where an old tradition of the Jews places the beginning of the days of the Messiah. According to that tradition, the world was to last six thousand years; two thousand before the law, two thousand under the law, and two thousand under the Messiah. This tradition is of great antiquity, and esteemed as authentic as any of this sort; and though its pretending to foretel when the world shall end, (which the scriptures make a secret that God has reserved for himself,) sufficiently shows its vanity; yet since the Jews have thought fit to place it among the most authentic of their traditions, it serves against them, 1st, To prove the time when, according to their own doctrine, the Messiah was to come; and, 2dly, To convict them of their gross and most perverse infidelity, in that, though Christ was born in the 4000th year of the creation, from which, according to this their tradition, his appearance was to commence, they have now suffered above seventeen hundred and twenty years to pass, and have not yet acknowledged him.—Prideaux's Connection anno 4. [This is very well argued, if the Jewish tradition respecting the ages of the world, were exactly such as it is here said to have been; but there is good reason to believe that it was very different. According to the rabbinical tradition founded, as the Jews pretended, on prophecy, the world was to last 7000 years, and the Messiah to make his appearance about the middle of the sixth millenary, or the year of the world 5500; and, according to Dr Hales's computations, he actually appeared in the year 5411.]—Bp. Gled.—Ed.

justly might Suidas give ¹ Josephus the title of a “lover of truth;” and so truly might Josephus say of himself, at the conclusion of his Antiquities, as well as of his Jewish Wars, “As for the style and manner of my writing them, that I submit to the judgment of my readers; but as for the candour and sincerity of my accounts, I do here declare to the world, that I have kept strictly to the truth, and have had nothing else in view, through the course of my whole work.”

² That Alexander the Great, after his having taken the city of Tyre, invaded the northern parts of Judea, and went as far as the balsam trees, near Jericho, not only Eusebius in his Chronicon, but Pliny, ⁶ in his Natural History likewise, directly informs us; and that he not only subdued that part of Syria, which is called Palestine, but went also about at this time to those cities that refused to submit to him, we have the concurring testimony both of Curtius ³ and Arrian; ⁴ and if their testimony be true, it is very presumable that he did not forget to visit Jerusalem in his indignation for its having refused to send him supplies.

The Samaritans, indeed, acted another part: they obeyed Alexander's summons, and went in a body of 8000 men to his assistance at Tyre. As soon as he had carried the place, they marched with his army to Jerusalem, and these are the men whom Josephus joins with the Phœnicians, though by an error of the press, or transcription at first, they are called Χαλδαίους, instead of Νοβαίους, according to Bishop Loyd's emendation, Chaldeans, instead of Cutheans or Samaritans, the old inveterate enemies of the Jews, and who therefore were glad of this opportunity of destroying them, and promised themselves, as Josephus ⁵ expresses it, “all the licence of blood and pillage upon the high priest himself, as well as upon the citizens, that rage or revenge could draw from a victorious prince, under the sense and provocation of the affront he had received.”

Alexander accordingly comes, breathing out wrath against the Jews, and, with his victorious army, is ready to revenge the insolent message of their being unwilling to fight for any but his enemy Darius: but, instead of that, in a day or two he goes away with the greatest love and kindness for them; permits them to live by their ancient laws; forgives them the tribute of the sabbatical year; readily invites them to fight for him as his allies, and, the very next year, in his own new built city of Alexandria, gives them all equal privileges with the Macedonians themselves. Now this sudden alteration of his cannot well be imputed to any thing else but a divine interposition; and therefore, since Plutarch ⁶ informs us, that it was no unusual thing for this great man to be influenced in his conduct by dreams and visions on other occasions, it is highly probable, that this remarkable change in him did likewise depend upon the remembrance of the vision which he had at Dio in Macedonia, as himself relates in the history.

^b Therein he tells us, that as this tree was peculiar to Judea, he might have said to that part near Jericho, Alexander, when he waged war there, caused an experiment to be made of the quantity of balsam that distilled from one of these trees; and upon trial it was found, that, on a summer's day, so much would drop from one as filled a concha.—Natural History, b. xii. c. 25.

¹ The like is to be said of the change that was made at this juncture in the conduct of the high priest, and all the people. For since, before this, they durst not fight against Darius for their oath's sake, and yet could now, without any scruple, go into that very army which had twice conquered his forces, and was then going to take away all his dominions, they must have had such a divine warrant for doing this, as the vision and admonition which, the night before, was given to the high priest, may be interpreted to imply. This, indeed, we own, is all providential and miraculous: but, if we look into their histories, whether canonical or apocryphal, we shall find, that from the days of Abraham to the days of Josephus himself, things of this nature were very common among the Jews.

The short of the matter is this.—The Jews at this time had certainly a great and eminent deliverance; but then the question is, Whence did this deliverance come? ² If we judge by the entire history of the Jewish nation, we shall expect it to have been after some extraordinary and providential manner. The Jewish records tell us, that it was really so, and give us the particular account of it. The heathen records say nothing at all, either against it or about it; and therefore we must be left at liberty to think, that the authority of the Jewish historian who relates it, if nothing absurd or incongruous appears in his relation, does certainly preponderate such a negative argument, as the bare omission of one transaction by some later heathen historians can amount to.

Upon the supposition then, that Alexander, by this supernatural direction, entered Jerusalem in a peaceable manner, his offering sacrifice to the God of Israel, whom, according to the principles of his own religion, he might take for the national god of the Jews, was exactly agreeable, as appears by the several accounts of his life, to his usual method upon the like occasions; and his promising to grant the same immunities he had given to them in Judea, to the Jews in Media and Babylonia, though he had not as yet conquered these countries, was the natural result of his having seen the prophecy of Daniel, which, both he and the high priest fully persuaded themselves, that he was the person appointed by Providence to fulfil.

Now, whoever considers the natural effects of conquests, which changes and revolutions they make, not only in the constitution, but in the language likewise, of any kingdom, and how fatally prone the very conquered are to learn the speech, as well as imitate the manners, of those that have brought them under subjection, will have no occasion to wonder, that, after the reduction of Judea, by a Grecian prince, and a prince who had distinguished that nation above all others with his royal favours, the Grecian language should soon grow into request, especially among the people of the better fashion, and such as made learning their profession.

³ The Macedonians had not long made themselves masters of Babylon, before Berosus, who is said by Tatian to have lived in the time of Alexander, became such a proficient in the Greek tongue, that in it he wrote the history of the affairs of the Chaldeans, and the actions of their kings, whereof we have some fragments in the writings of Josephus and Eusebius; and, ⁴ not long after him, Manetho, a priest of Heliopolis in Egypt, in the same language wrote his commentaries of the Egyptian affairs, which he dedicated to this very Ptolemy Philadelphus, for whose use the Septuagint translation was made. The Greek language, in short, spread itself abroad wherever Alexander's arms prevailed, and soon became the universal language of the polite and learned; and therefore we can hardly suppose, but that in a populous nation there should be found a competent number of persons duly qualified to translate a short book, for the Pentateuch ^a was all that they translated, and this, every one knows, is far from being a long one, into a language that was then in the highest vogue, from another in which some of their doctors are said to have been so critically, so minutely skilled, as to be able to tell how often each letter occurred in the whole.

Demetrius Phalereus was not only a learned philosopher, but a person likewise of great wisdom, justice, and probity, as appeared by his government of Athens, ^b under Cassander, one of Alexander's captains: but being expelled from thence by the prevailing power of Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, and, after the death of Cassander, forced to withdraw into Egypt, he was there received with great favour and honour by Ptolemy Soter, and became one of his chief counsellors. He dissuaded the king from making any of his sons co-partner with him in the kingdom, and ⁵ told him the inconvenience of it: but we do not perceive from Laertius, or any other historian, that he any ways opposed the succession of Philadelphus. The king indeed did not follow his advice in this particular; but still we find him in great favour and request at court both with the father and son: and therefore, if, after the son's accession he fell into some disgrace, whatever the occasion of it might be, it is but supposing, either that this misfortune befell him some years after the king's accession, or that he, after a short disgrace, was restored to favour again, and then we may allow him space enough, and without any disparagement to his character, to have, at one and the same time, both the direction of the Septuagint version, and the superintendency of the royal library. For whatever some may think of the servile employment of looking after books, it is very well known ⁶ that, at Rome, one of the prime cardinals always holds the office of librarian to the pope, and, as to the king's library in France, it is not long since the archbishop of Rheims, who is by his place primate of the Gallican church, and first peer of the whole realm, thought it no disparagement to his honour to be appointed to the same office.

It is natural to suppose, that a prince, who himself was a man of great learning, and had always a long train of learned men about him, should be for making some trial of the abilities of the Jewish interpreters, before he set them about the work; and therefore, if the questions which the king made, and the answers which the interpreters returned, be but adapted to their respective circumstances, instead of being an argument against, they will prove a confirmation of the truth of the account which Josephus gives us of this transaction. Now, whoever looks into these questions and answers, as they are set down in Aristeas, will find that the former, which are said to have been suggested by Demetrius, are chiefly philosophical, such as savour of the museum or college of learned men that had lately been erected at Alexandria; ¹ such as became an inquisitive heathen philosopher, who, in a great measure, was grown weary of the gross polytheism and idolatry of the Egyptians, and, by his conversation with the Alexandrian Jews, more inclinable to the belief that one invisible and true God, whom they worshipped: and that the latter are every one made with such a distinct regard to God and his providence, as is always uppermost both in the words and writings of every wise and religious Jew.

^a Aristæas, Aristobolus, and Philo say, that the law only was translated by the LXX; and Josephus in the preface to his Antiquities, expressly tells us, that they did not translate for Ptolemy the whole scriptures, but the law only.

^b In acknowledgment of his just government, the Athenians erected for him as many statues in their city as there were days in a year, which was the greatest honour that ever was done to any citizen in that place.—Diog. Laertius in the Life of Demetrius Phalereus; and Diodor. Sicul. b. xviii.

The character which Appian ² gives us of Ptolemy Philadelphus, is, that “he was the most splendid and magnificent of all the kings of his time in expending his money;” and therefore we may less wonder at his giving so much for the redemption of the captive Jews, ³ when we find him bestowing upon Aratus the Sicyonian, for his having been serviceable to him in the collection of some books and pictures, the sum of 150 talents to adjust the properties and settle the peace of his city; ⁴ may less wonder at his sending away the Jewish interpreters so amply rewarded, when we find him presenting the Roman ambassadors every one of them with a crown of gold, and upon their taking their leave, heaping upon them gifts of an inestimable value; may less wonder, in short, at his profusion in this particular, when we find him, ⁵ as Athenæus assures us, spending 2200 talents in one pompous festival to Bacchus.

His own inclination, ⁶ prompted by Demetrius Phalareus, led him to be prodigiously fond of the most complete and authentic copies of any curious book. Fifteen talents he gave for such copies of the tragedies of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, and yet these were already written in Greek and needed no translation; ⁷ whereas the bare permission of a version of the Jewish law, that nation’s peculiar and inestimable treasure, was a favour that had never been asked before, and what, upon any common application, would probably have been denied: and as the authenticity of this version must entirely depend on the skill and faithfulness of the Jewish translators, since they were the only persons that understood the Hebrew language, the king had no other way to obtain a confidence herein, than by gaining the entire good opinion of the high priest and people of the Jews.

Upon the whole, therefore, we may conclude, that though the sums bestowed upon the Jews upon account of this translation be very large, yet considering the king’s vast liberality upon other occasions, the objection would have been stronger, had the sums been less; since, upon the highest computation, his whole expense in redeeming the captives, in presents to the temple and altar, and in rewards to the interpreters and high priest, being all put together, does not amount to so much as he spent in one festival to Bacchus.

In so great and pompous a court as this of Philadelphus must needs have been, we need not be solicitous to answer the objection of his being addressed to by way of letter, or memorial, even by persons that had otherwise a constant access to him; because in matters of great importance, this, in most courts, is the common method of proceeding even now. But this we may safely add, that how warmly soever some modern critics have attacked the history of this Septuagint version, yet the ancient testimonies of such authors as have made mention of it, namely, of Alexander Polyhistor, ⁸ a learned heathen, who was greatly inquisitive about the affairs of the Jews; of Aristobolus, the peripatetic philosopher, and tutor to Ptolemy Philopater; of Philo, who lived at Alexandria, the very place where this version was made; of Tertullian, one of the most accurate writers of Christian antiquity; of Eusebius, a learned and faithful ecclesiastical historian; of St Jerome, a vehement enemy to this very version, as compared with the Hebrew copy; and of several others, that might be produced, are a confirmation of what Josephus (a priest of that very temple, to which the presents from Philadelphus were sent) relates concerning it, and such strongholds and fastnesses, as the maintainers of its antiquity have not yet been prevailed upon to give up.

CHAP. III.—Of the Profane History during this period.

Most of the historical facts in profane authors, that had any relation to the sacred records, we have, in the course of this history, endeavoured to abridge, and reduce into notes, at their proper periods; and have nothing more now to do, but only to take notice of some extraordinary and remarkable events in the Persian, Grecian, and Roman empires, down to our Saviour’s time, which did not then so properly fall in with our design.

After the dissolution of the ancient Assyrian monarchy, by the death of Sardanapalus, there arose up two lesser empires in its stead; one founded by Arbaces, governor of Media, and the other by Belesis, governor of Babylon, the two principal commanders who headed the conspiracy, whereby the former empire was brought to an end.

Arbaces, who in scripture ⁹ is called Tiglath Pileser, had the larger share of empire, and therefore fixed his seat at Nineveh, where the former Assyrian kings used to have their residence, and there governed his new erected empire for nineteen years. He was succeeded by his son Salmanassar; Salmanassar by Senacherib; Senacherib by Esarhaddon; Esarhaddon by Suosduchius, in ¹⁰ the book of Judith called Nabuchodonosor; Suosduchius by Chymiladanus; Chymiladanus by Nabopolassar; and Nabopolassar by his son Nebuchadnezzar the Great, of whom we have said so many things: Nebuchadnezzar the Great was succeeded by his son Evilmerodach; Evilmerodach by Neroglossor; and Neroglossor by Belshazzar; in whom the united empire of the Assyrians and Babylonians terminated.

Belshis, who in scripture is called¹ Baladan, took up his residence at Babylon, and was succeeded by his son Merodach; but who were his successors, we have no account to be depended on, only we know, that Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, conquered the kingdom of Babylon, and that he and his successors Sinsoduchims and Chyniladans possessed it, until Nabopolassar, governor of Babylon, and general of the Assyrian forces, joining his arms with Astyages, the son of Cyaxares king of Media, slew Chyniladans, took and destroyed Nineveh, and translated the empire to Babylon.

After the terrible blow which Sennacherib's forces received in Judea, the Medes, understanding in what a low condition he was, returned to Nineveh, immediately shook off his yoke, and made Dejoees, who in scripture is called Arphaxad, their king; who, having beautified and enlarged Ecbatana, made it the royal seat of his kingdom, and there reigned for fifty-three years. He was succeeded by his son Phraortes; Phraortes, by Cyaxares I.; Cyaxares I., by Astyages; Astyages, by Cyaxares II., called in scripture Darius the Mede, who conquered Belshazzar, and began to lay the foundation of the Persian monarchy, which, during his life, was called the empire of the Medes and Persians, but, after his death, was united by Cyrus.^a Cyrus succeeded his father Cambyses in the kingdom of Persia, and his uncle Cyaxares, in the kingdom of the Medes, and empire of Babylon, by this means founded the second great monarchy, which was the Persian. His wars with the Assyrians, his defeat of Croesus king of Lydia, his wonderful taking of Babylon, and obliging all the east to submit to his power, are subjects that we have already touched upon, either in our history or notes: but there are some things in his war with the Scythians, might we but credit their story, that justly deserve our observation.

² At the time when he made his expedition into Scythia, Tomyris was queen thereof, a woman of great courage and bravery of mind; for, though she could have hindered Cyrus's army from passing the river Araxes, she permitted them to do it, in confidence of fighting them with more advantage within her own dominions, and of making their retreat more difficult, by their having the river on their backs. Cyrus took this opportunity to pass the river, and, having marched a little into the country, and pitched his camp, the next day he abandoned it as if he had fled for fear, leaving plenty of wine, and other provisions behind him. Tomyris having intelligence of this, sent her son, with the third part of her forces, in pursuit of the enemy; but when he came to their camp, as if he had been sent to a banquet, not a battle, he suffered his men, who were strangers to that kind of liquor, to intoxicate themselves with wine to such a degree, that when Cyrus marched his army back again in the night time, and came upon them, he found them incapable of fighting, or of making any resistance, and therefore put them all to the sword.

Upon the loss of so great an army, and, what more nearly concerned her, the loss of her only son, Tomyris did not betake herself to tears, the usual refuge of women upon such occasions, but cast about in her mind how she might revenge herself of the enemy; which, in a short time, she did by the like stratagem, and with the like success. For, observing that the Persians were now grown secure by reason of their late victory, she retired before them with her army, as if she had been afraid to venture the decision of a battle, until she had drawn Cyrus unawares into a defile, where, having placed an ambuscade in the mountains, she killed two hundred thousand of his men, inasmuch that there was not one left to carry home the news, and himself upon the spot. Thus fell this great prince, in the seventieth year of his age, though Xenophon, and from him other historians, are clearly of opinion, that he died peaceably in his^a bed.

^b Xenophon adds, (b. viii.) that finding his death approaching, he called his nobility together, his two sons, Cambyses and Tanaoxares, to his bedside, and after a long speech concerning the immortality of the soul, and rewards or punishments consequent upon every man's good or ill conduct in this life, he exhorted his sons, by the strongest arguments, to a perpetual concord and agreement, and uttered many other things, which make it not improbable, that he received the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when he governed Shushan in Persia. Strabo assures us, (b. xv.) that he was buried in a city called Pasargardes, which himself had built, and where his monument, even in his time, was with this inscription, "O man, whoever thou art, and from whatever place you come, for I was not ignorant that you would come here: I am Cyrus, who gave laws to the Persians; do not envy me this little heap of earth with which my body is covered o'er." This very tomb, Alexander the Great, according to Q. Curtius, opened, either in hopes of some treasure, which he imagined might have been there deposited, or with a desire rather to do honour to his remains: for so we are told, that he caused the coffin, wherein his body lay, to be covered with his own garment, and a crown of gold to be set upon it: all which gives credit to the account we have in Xenophon, but derogates not a little from Herodotus, who leaves his body in the hands of Tomyris.—Raleigh's History, b. iii. c. 6. [The whole story of the invasion of Scythia by Cyrus is rejected as false, by Dr Hales, who produces, from Scripture, the Persian writers, Xenophon, and others, such evidence in support of his own opinion, that Cyrus, far from being a mad conqueror, thirsting for blood, was revered as the father of his people, as is much more than sufficient to counterbalance the testimony of Herodotus and Justin. "Herodotus viewed Cyrus with aversion as the enslaver of his country. And this antipathy biased an historian, elsewhere so candid and impartial, to prefer a worse account before the better, of which he was not ignorant, and which was afterwards furnished by Xenophon, tacitly vindicating the character of his hero from the aspersions of Herodotus."—"The Persian writers relate, that after a long and bloody war Khesru (Cyrus) subdued the empire of Turen, and made the city of Balk, in Choresen, a royal residence, to keep in order his new subjects; that he repaid every family in Persia the amount of their war taxes, out of the immense spoils that he had acquired by his conquests; that he endeavoured to promote peace and harmony between the Turonians and Irenians; that he regulated the pay of his soldiers, reformed civil and religious abuses throughout the provinces; and at length, after a long and glorious reign, resigned his crown to his son Lo-horsh (Cambyses), and retired to solitude, saying, 'that he had lived long enough for his own glory, and that it was now time to devote the remainder of his days to God.'" That Cyrus was a monotheist; that he was well acquainted with the prophet Daniel; and that the God whom he worshipped was the Lord, the

He was succeeded by his son Cambyses, and Cambyses by the Magian, who, under the false name of Smerdis, usurped the throne, and brought discredit upon the whole sect, until its character came to be restored again by the management and reformation of Zoroastres.

At what time this Zoroastres, or Zardusht, as the Persians call him, lived, there is a wide difference both among the Greek and oriental writers; since some of them will have it, that he lived many years before the flood, others in the days of Abraham, and others again not before the reign of Darius the son of Hystaspes. Moses, according to the sentiments of several learned men, speaks of the pyrae, or temples consecrated to the worship of fire, when he brings in God threatening the Israelites, ¹ 'to overthrow their high places, and destroy their chaminim, or places appointed for the worship of fire, and to cast their carcasses upon the carcasses of their idols;' ^a although they are certainly mistaken who think, that the fire which he ordered to be kept always burning upon the altar of the Lord, was in imitation of the fire of the Magians.

If then we suppose that Zoroastres was the first author of the worship of fire, we must acknowledge him more ancient than Moses, but if we look upon him only as the reformer or restorer of it, though we cannot tell the precise time when he flourished, it must not be long after the Magians fell into disgrace, and may therefore very properly be thought to be in the reign of Darius Hystaspes.

God of heaven, who 'had given to him all the kingdoms of the earth, and charged him,' as he said himself, 'to build him a house at Jeru-salem,' there seems to be no room for doubt.]—Hales's Analyses, vol. iv. second edition.—Bp. Gleig.—Ed.

^a That the worship of the sun—the source of light and heat, was more ancient than Moses there can be no doubt; but that the worship of the element of fire or of fires burning on earth was more ancient can never be proved by this text of Ezekiel. They were the idolatrous Jews of his own age that the prophet thus addressed in the name of Jehovah: and they certainly had idols or images, perhaps indeed images of the sun, which the prophet assured them should be broken; but the Persian worshippers of fire or light allowed no other images of their god. No ground therefore is furnished by this text from which an argument can be drawn to ascertain the era of Zoroaster.—Bp. Gleig.—Ed.

^b To this purpose we may observe, that most of his reformations in the old religion of the Magians are taken either from the ancient writings or the ancient usages of the Jews. For whereas Moses heard God speak to him out of a flame of fire in the bush, Zoroastres pretended that he in like manner heard God speak to him, at the time when he was taken up to heaven. Whereas the Jews had a visible shechinah of the divine presence among them, resting over the mercy-seat in the holy of holies, unto which they turned themselves when they prayed; Zoroastres taught his disciples, that in the sun, and in the sacred fires in their temples, God more especially dwelt; and therefore he obliged them to offer up all their prayers with their faces turned to both these. Whereas the Jews had a sacred fire which came down from heaven upon their altar of burnt offerings, which as long as Solomon's temple stood, was preserved with the utmost care from extinguishing; Zoroastres pretended, that when he was in heaven, he brought some of that holy fire out of which God spake unto him: and therefore he enjoined that it should be kept with diligent care, and that all the fires on the altars of the new erected fire temples, should at first be lighted only from thence: and whereas the Jews were very nice in using no wood on the altar of their temple, but what was reputed clean, and had it therefore all barked and examined, before it was laid on, and, when it was laid on, allowed of no bellows to blow it, but left it to kindle and flame out of itself; Zoroastres ordained his followers, in relation to the sacred birth and education very probably a Jew, and, as some suppose, a servant to the prophet Daniel; because he was certainly a man of great learning, and thoroughly acquainted with the books of Moses. As soon as he took upon him the prophetic office, he retired into a cave, and there lived a long time as a recluse, pretending to be abstracted from all worldly considerations, and to be given wholly to prayers and divine meditations. In this retirement he composed the book, ^c wherein all his pretended revelations are contained. ² The first part of it contains a liturgy, which the Magians, in all their oratories and fire temples, make use of to this day. The rest is an historical account of the life, actions, and prophecies of its author, the several articles and branches of his superstition, together with rules and exhortations to morality, wherein he is very pressing and exact, except his allowing of incest; and the whole being interspersed with several things taken out of the Old Testament, abundantly shows that his original was from the Jews.

Upon leaving his retirement, he went into India among the Brachmans, where, having learned all their knowledge in mathematics, astronomy, and natural philosophy, he came back, and taught his disciples these sciences, which gained him so great a reputation, that, for many years after, a learned man and a Magian became equivalent terms. Nay, he pretended, that, once upon a time, he was taken up into heaven to be instructed in those doctrines which he was to deliver unto men; that there he heard God speak out of the midst of a great and bright flame of fire; and for this reason he taught his followers that fire was the truest representation of the divine presence, and the sun, as the most perfect fire, the more immediate throne of his glory; that of the fire from whence God spake, he upon his return brought some with him, and placed it on the altar of the first fire-temple he erected; from whence, as they say, it was propagated to all the rest, and this is the reason they give for keeping it so carefully, and treating it with so much superstition.

Having thus qualified himself to be a prophet, he made his first appearance in Media, in the city of Ziz, say some, or in Ecbatan, now Taurus, according to others; where the principal doctrines that he professed, as a refinement upon what the old Magians maintained, were these, — 'That there was one Supreme Being, independent, and self-existing from all eternity; that under him there fires of their temples, to observe both these particulars, commanding them to bark all their wood, and use no other means for the kindling it up into a flame but the pouring oil, and leaving it to the blasts of the open air; and that he should, in so many singular and unobvious things, imitate the Jewish religion in the scheme of his reformations, it can hardly be imagined, without supposing, that at first he had his education in it; nor is it improbable, that if, as some think, he was the disciple of Daniel, his seeing that great and good man arrive at such a height of dignity, by being a true prophet of God, might put him upon the thoughts of being a false one, in hopes that, if he acted his part well, he might obtain to himself the like advancement.—Lightfoot's Temple Service; Hyde's Religion of the Ancient Persians; and Prideaux's Connection, anno 486.

^c This book is called Zendavesta, and by contraction, Zenda, which signifies a fire-kindler, such as a tinder box is with us; and this fantastical name the impostor gave it, because, as he pretended, all that would read this book, and meditate thereon, might from thence kindle in their hearts the fire of all true love to God, and his holy religion.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 486.

were two angels, one the angel of light, who is the author and director of all good, and the other the angel of darkness, who is the author and director of all evil, and that these two out of the mixture of light and darkness, made all things; that they are in perpetual struggle with each other, and that where the angel of light prevails, there the most is good, where the angel of darkness, there the most is evil; that this struggle shall continue unto the end of the world, when there shall be a general resurrection, a day of judgment, and a retribution to every one according to his works; and that after this, the angel of darkness and his disciples shall go also into a world of their own, where they shall suffer, in everlasting darkness, the punishments of their evil deeds; and the angel of light and his disciples, shall go also into a world of their own, where they shall receive, in everlasting light, the reward due to their good deeds, whereupon they shall remain separated for ever, and light and darkness are to be no more mixed together to all eternity." And all this, the remainder of that sect, which is now in Persia and India, do, after so many ages, still hold without any variation, even to this day.

After Zoroastres had acted the part of a prophet in Media, and there settled all things according to his intentions, he removed from thence into Bactria, the most eastern province of Persia, and their settling in the city of Balch, which lies on the river Oxus, in the confines of Persia, under the protection of Hystaspes the father of Darius, he soon spread his imposture through all that province with success. From Bactria he went next to the royal court at Susa, where he managed his pretensions with so much address and insinuation, that he made Darius likewise a proselyte, and, from his example, drew over the courtiers, nobility, and great men of that city into the same profession: but when, upon his return into Balch, he attempted the like upon Agarsp, king of the oriental Scythians, and a zealous Sabian, and pretended an authority from Darius to that purpose, the Scythian prince resented it with such indignation, that he invaded Bactria with an army, and, having there defeated the forces that opposed him, slew Zoroastres, with all the priests of his patriarchal church, amounting to the number of eighty persons, and demolished all the fire-temples in the province; but it was not long before Darins ^a fell upon him, and revenged the injury. ^b

^a After he had overthrown him with a great slaughter, and driven him out of the province, he rebuilt all the fire-temples, and especially that of Balch, which, as it was the patriarchal temple of the sect, he failed not to erect with a grandeur suitable to its dignity, and had it called after his own name. For he was a zealous promoter of this religion, and after the death of its author, continued to propagate it with the same ardour as before.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 486.

^b According to Dr Hales there were two Zoroasters—the former contemporary with Abraham, and king of Bactria; the latter a disciple of the prophet Daniel, who flourished in the reign of Darius Hystaspes. Of the religion taught by the former, he speaks in terms of the highest praise, as a sublime system of pure atheism, similar to the religion of Abraham and the other patriarchs of the Old Testament; and the object of the teaching of the latter, was to bring back the religion of Persia to its original purity, by the expunging from it the corruptions which had been introduced into it from Zebliim. All this seems to be very probable; but what the modern Persian writers, together with Abulfaragi, say of his foretelling the precise time of the birth of a Divine Child in Palestine, and his doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, and a future state of rewards and punish-

This Darius was one of the seven lords who slew the false Smerdis; and by an artifice he obtained the kingdom of Persia; but it was by the cruel policy of Zopyrus, that he made himself master of the city of Babylon. This city having for many years, during the Babylonish empire, been mistress of the east, and domineered over all its neighbouring countries, could not bear the subjection it was fallen under to the Persians; especially since the removal of the imperial seat to Shushan, whereby its wealth and grandeur were much diminished. Taking the advantage therefore of the late revolution which had happened in the Persian empire, the Babylonians resolved to set up for themselves; and accordingly, having stored the city with a sufficient quantity of arms and provisions, in the fifth year of the reign of this Darius, they broke out into an open revolt.

The army had now lain before the city a year and eight months, without having made any great progress in the siege, which raised the indignation of Zopyrus to such a degree, that, having cut off his nose and ears, and mangled his body all over with stripes, in this condition he fled to the besieged, and feigning to them that he had suffered all this by the cruel usage of Darius, he thereby insinuated himself so far into their confidence, that at length they made him the chief commander of their forces, which trust he made use of to deliver the city, which could not otherwise have been taken, into his master's hand; and, for this remarkable piece of service, was rewarded with the highest honours that his prince could heap on him, all his life after.

By this hardy stratagem Darius recovered the city of Babylon; but in his war with the Greeks he was so far from having any good success, that, ² at the battle of Marathon, his vast army received a total overthrow by Miltiades, prince of the Thracian Chersonesus, and his two generals, Dotis and Artaphernes, were forced to return home with baille and disgrace.

He was succeeded by his son Xerxes, who, ³ after ten ments, much more perspicuous than any thing on the subject that is to be found in the Old Testament, is unquestionably a legend forged since the general propagation of Christianity. This led Warburton to deny the very existence of the second Zoroaster, and to treat with contempt, as a set of fables, all the Persian writers by whom he is mentioned; but this was surely going too far. That the Sedder and Zendaviste are unworthy of the Persian reformer, or of regard, is indeed true; but, as Dr Hales well observes, the rejection of such spurious productions, as well as of the legends of Abulfaragi and others, by no means invalidates the actual existence of such a reformer of the Magian religion, as Zerdusht or the younger Zoroaster; for what ancient teacher of religion has there been, of whom fables have not been told in the course of ages? In all probability Zoroaster himself never pretended to have gone to heaven for the sacred fire, of which he may have conceived the idea from Daniel's account of the sacred fire among the Jews.—Ep. Gleig.—Ed.

years' preparation, renewed the war with the Greeks; but with worse success than his father: for, at the straits of Thermopylae, Leonidas, the king of the Lacedaemonians, with a handful of men, slew twenty thousand of his forces: at the straits of Salamis, Themistocles, the general of the Athenians, ruined the greatest part of his fleet: in Sicily, Gelo, the king thereof, made great havoc among his confederates the Carthaginians: at Plataea, Pausanias slew his general Mardonius, and cut his army to pieces; and at Mycale, Leotychides both vanquished his troops by land, and burned the remainder of his fleet; so that never was there a man who set out with so great an armament both by sea and land, and returned in so abject and disgraceful a manner. He was succeeded by his son Artaxerxes; Artaxerxes by Xerxes II.; Xerxes II. by his brother Sogdianus; and Sogdianus by his brother Ochus, who is commonly called Darius Nottus. Ochus was succeeded by Artaxerxes II., surnamed Mnemon; Artaxerxes II. by another Ochus, who took upon him the name of Artaxerxes III.; this Ochus by Arses; and Arses by Darius Codomannus; in whom the Persian monarchy, terminating by Alexander the Great, was translated to Greece.

The army which Alexander carried into Asia, according to the highest computation, amounted to no more than thirty thousand foot, and five thousand horse; and yet, with these few forces, he not only attempted, but accomplished likewise the conquest of the whole Persian empire, and added India likewise to his acquisitions: but what was the most remarkable thing in his expedition is, that he set out upon it with no more than seventy talents, which was scarce enough to supply the army with necessaries for thirty days; but, as he trusted in providence, providence did not fail him. In a few days, at the river Granicus, he encountered Darius, and, having vanquished his troops, though they were five times more in number, he thereby got possession of a great part of his treasure, and all the provinces of the Lesser Asia. Not long after this, at Issus in Cilicia, he gave him another defeat; where, having taken all his camp, bag and baggage, with his mother, wife, and children, he left a hundred thousand Persians dead upon the field of battle: and about two years after, not far from Arbela, he gave him a final overthrow: for there, with no more than fifty thousand men, he vanquished the vast army of the Persians, which consisted of above twenty times as many, and thereby determined the fate of the Persian, and established the third great monarchy, which was the Grecian, in the person of Alexander. It lasted no longer than six years and ten months: for, after his death, it was divided among his generals, and, as Judea lay between Syria and Egypt, according as their arms prevailed, it was generally under the dominion of one of these, until the Roman power began to exert itself.

The Romans, having built their city, and out of the neighbouring villages¹ (as we related the story before) furnished themselves with wives, for seven successions lived under the dominion of kings; but in the family of Tarquin, which had justly incurred the people's displeasure,^a that form of government was quite dissolved.

Many, however, and fierce were the wars which, both in their regal and consular state, the Romans waged with the nations round about them, but their conquests were confined to the bounds of Italy only; nor was the glory of their name much known to foreign nations, until the war which they had with Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, gave them an opportunity^b to signalize their bravery and greatness of mind, which excited Ptolemy Philadelphus, then king of Egypt, to send them an embassy, congratulating their successes, and desiring to enter into alliance with them.

² To make a return of the like respects, the Romans next year sent Q. Fabius Gurgus, Cn. Fabius Pictor, and Q. Ogulnius, their ambassadors to the Egyptian court, whose behaviour, in that capacity, was very remarkable; for when the king, having invited them to supper, in the conclusion of the entertainment, presented each of them

² Livy, b. xiv.; Eutropius, b. ii.; Valerius Maximus, b. iv. in-law Servius Tullius, and, upon his ascending it, put all his friends to death. The affairs of the state he managed by himself alone, slighted the senate, diminished their authority, cut off several of them upon frivolous pretences, and seized upon their estates. Among these Marcus Junius was one, who left behind him a son named Lucius Junius; but he, fearing the fate that his father and brother had undergone, counterfeited the fool (and was thence called Brutus) so very artfully, that he was taken by Tarquin into his house to make his children sport. In the mean time, Sextus, one of Tarquin's sons, inflamed with the beauty of Lucretia, got privately to Collatia, where she resided, and ravished her; whereupon she sent for her father from Rome, and her husband Collatinus from the camp, which was then before Ardea, desiring them to bring along with them some of their particular friends. Publius Valerius came with her father Lucretius, and Lucius Junius Brutus with her husband; to whom, as soon as they were arrived, she related the whole story, and then with a poniard stabbed herself to the heart. Upon the sight of this they were all filled with grief and indignation; but, to their great surprise, Brutus, throwing off the disguise of his folly, declared his resolution, and made them swear upon the bloody poniard to assist him in revenging this, and the other wickednesses of Tarquin and his family, by expelling him and them from the government, which accordingly they did, thereby putting an end to the regal power at Rome, and turning it into a consular state.—Hearn's System, b. iii.

^b One great instance of this appeared in the course of this war, which is thus related by Plutarch:—When Fabricius was consul, and at the head of his army, an unknown person came into the camp, and delivered him a letter from king Pyrrhus's chief physician, offering to take him off by poison, and so end the war without any farther hazard to the Romans, if he might have a reward proportionable to his service. Fabricius, enraged at the villany of the man, and disposing the other consul to the same opinion, sent dispatches immediately to Pyrrhus to caution him against the treason. His letter was to this effect:—"Caius Fabricius, and Quintus Æmilius, consuls of the Romans, to Pyrrhus the king, health. You seem to have a very ill judgment both of your friends and enemies. You will understand by this letter, which was sent to us, that you are in war with honest men, and trust knaves and villains; but we have not discovered this to you to insinuate into your favour, but lest your ruin might bring a reproach upon us, as if we had ended this war by treachery, when we were not able to do it by our courage and virtue." When Pyrrhus had read the letter, and made strict inquiry into the treason, he caused the physician to be executed, and, in acknowledgment of this civility of the Romans, sent to Rome the prisoners without ransom, and again employed Cineas to negotiate a peace for him. The Romans, who were above receiving from their enemy a recompence for not having been guilty of the vilest injustice, disdained to accept of the prisoners, without returning to him an equal number of Samnites and Tarantines; but, as for the peace, they would not suffer Cineas so much as to mention it, until Pyrrhus had removed his arms and forces out of Italy, and sailed back to Epirus in the same ships that brought him over.—Plut. on Pyrrhus.

with a crown of gold, they accepted of the crowns, upon account of the honour that was done them, but, next morning, they crowned therewith the statues of the king that stood in the public places of the city; and when again, at their audience of leave, he presented them with very valuable gifts, they took them indeed for fear that their refusal should give offence; but as soon as they were returned to Rome, they delivered them all into the public treasury, before they appeared in the senate to give an account of their embassy, whereby they declared, that they desired no other advantage from the service of the public, than the honour of discharging it well.

This spirit of moderation and disinterestedness, while it continued in the state, and the many great instances of invincible courage and resolution, which upon all occasions they showed, made the Romans of great note in the world, and after the defeat of the Carthaginians in the second Punic war, they became indeed the terror of all other nations.

Hannibal was certainly the most dangerous enemy that ever Rome had. As soon as war was declared between these two states, he left Spain, where he then was, and at the head of fifty thousand foot and nine thousand horse, marched directly towards Italy. He crossed the Pyrenean mountains into Gaul, crossed the Rhone, and came to the foot of the Alps, which, in fifteen days' time he got over, but not without much danger and difficulty, as well as the loss of half his army. When he got footing in Italy, he defeated Scipio, one of the Roman consuls, at Pavia, and his colleague Sempronius, in another action near Trebia. Near the lake Trasymene he cut off the Roman army, and their consul Flaminius, even after he had destroyed a detachment of forty thousand, which the other consul Servilius had sent to his assistance; but in the famous battle at Cannæ, he made the greatest slaughter of them; for therein he defeated the whole army, and slew Æmilius, one of their consuls; killed 50,000 men, two questors, twenty-one tribunes, eighty of the senatorian, and of the equestrian order a much greater number.

This last defeat caused a dreadful consternation in Rome, but did not abate the people's courage, who still refused to hearken to any overtures of peace; till, having sent Scipio the Younger into Africa, they by that means gave the Carthaginians so much disturbance, that they were forced to recall Hannibal, who, coming to a decisive battle, was routed by the Romans, and his countrymen forced to sue for a peace, which was granted them upon terms very honourable and advantageous to Rome.

After this peace with the Romans, Hannibal¹ lived quietly at Carthage for the space of six years; but, being under a suspicion of holding correspondence with Antiochus, surnamed the Great, (between whom and the Romans there was at that time a misunderstanding,) and of plotting with him to bring a new war upon Italy, some of his enemies at Rome procured ambassadors to be sent to Carthage, in order to inquire into the matter, and if they found any reason for it, to have him delivered into their hands; which when Hannibal understood, he made his escape before the ambassadors had time to deliver their message, and put himself under the protection of Antiochus.

² Antiochus, at this time, was in debate with himself on the point of entering into war with the Romans, but at the coming of Hannibal he soon determined for war; and had he taken Hannibal's advice of carrying it into the bowels of Italy, he might probably have met with a better event; ^a but his resolution was to begin it in Greece, where being shamefully defeated in every engagement, both by sea and land, he was forced at last to send an embassy to the Roman consuls, desiring conditions of peace, which were granted him upon these hard terms:—That he should pay the whole expenses of the war, which were estimated at fifteen thousand talents of Eubœa; ^b should quit all Asia on that side the mount Taurus, and deliver up Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoas the Ætolian, as the chief incendiaries of the war; but as soon as these heard that a treaty was begun, they easily foresaw what would be the result of it, and therefore both took care ^c to get out of the way before it came to a conclusion.

^a Antiochus's army is said to have consisted of seventy thousand foot, twelve thousand horse, and fifty-four elephants: whereas all the Roman forces amounted to no more than thirty thousand, and yet Antiochus was totally overthrown; for in the field of battle he lost fifty thousand foot, and four thousand horse; fourteen hundred were taken prisoners, and himself with much difficulty escaped to Sardis.—Appian, in Syriacis; Livy, b. xxxvii. and Justin, b. xxxi. c. 7.

^b There is a difference between Livy and Polybius in this matter: for whereas in Polybius the words are, that the money to be paid to the Romans should be ἀργυρίου Ἀττικῶν ἀξίον, Livy, mistaking the meaning of the Greek phrase, rendered it Attic talents; whereas Polybius meant it only the Attic standard; for as the Eubœan talent was the greatest weight, so the Attic money was the finest silver of any in Greece, and by this treaty the money was to be paid according to both, that is, the Romans, having conquered Antiochus, not only obliged him to pay this vast sum for his peace, but also made him pay it in talents of the highest weight, and of silver of the best and finest standard in all Greece.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 290.

^c What became of the Ætolian we are not concerned to inquire; but Hannibal, after he was deserted by Antiochus, fled to Prusias, king of Bithynia; where, being slighted by him, and in danger of being delivered to the Romans, it is generally said that he put an end to his days, for which purpose he carried poison always about him concealed under the stone of his ring. This is the account we have in Livy, b. xxxix. c. 51; and what Plutarch and the Roman satirist does more than allude to.—“O glory, what art thou! The same man, (namely, Hannibal,) is vanquished, and flies precipitantly into exile, where he sits, the great and wonderful suppliant! beside the king's tent, until it pleases the Bithynian tyrant to protect him. Neither swords nor stones, nor darts, but that ring, the avenger of Cannæ, and the punisher of so much slaughter, shall put an end to that soul which once confounded all human affairs.”—Juv. Sat. x. He was born a soldier; and a continual exercise of arms made him a great captain. He was always just in his schemes, and immense in his views; had an admirable genius at hitting the true means for the execution of his designs, and the greatest artifice in acting without being discovered. He was infinite in expedients, and as skilful in recovering himself out of danger, as he was in drawing others into it. But then he was a person of no fidelity, no religion, no humanity, though he had the art of putting on the appearance of all these virtues, whenever he thought it subservient to his interest.—Vertot's Revolution of the Roman Republic. [The author seems to have founded his opinion of Hannibal from the Roman writers, who have loaded his memory with every imputation of cruelty and perjury. It is however evident that the Romans were actuated by feelings of the most bitter hostility and resentment against Hannibal, and were therefore little inclined to do justice to his character. It cannot be denied that he was one of the most consummate masters of the art of war recorded in ancient history, and although profuse of human blood, and but little scrupulous as to the manner in which he accomplished his ends, he showed on several occasions that he was not destitute of noble and generous sentiments. For a particular account of this illustrious general, and a vindication of his character from the aspersions of Livy, see Hooke's Roman History.]—ED.

^a Next to the Carthaginian war, the longest and most obstinate that the Romans ever had, was the war which Mithridates king of Pontus, in the reign of Alexander Jannæus at Jerusalem, waged with them. For, having very unjustly seized on the kingdoms of Cappadocia and Bithynia, when the Romans interposed for the surrender of them to the persons to whom they had decreed them, he refused to obey, and thereupon hostilities ensued. ¹ For some time at first Mithridates was successful; but ^b was very cruel, while he had the superiority; till, having sent into Greece an army of three hundred and ten thousand men, under the command of three of his best generals, Sylla alone, with no more than fifteen thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse, vanquished them all in several battles; and Pimbría, the next year, with another Roman army, pressed Mithridates himself so very close, that in Patana, a maritime town in Ætolia, he was in imminent danger of being made a prisoner, ² which terrified him to such a degree that he sued for peace, which, upon these conditions, was granted him:—“That he should restore Bithynia to Nicomedes, and Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes, and to the Romans whatever he had taken from them in the late war; that he should content himself with his paternal kingdom of Pontus, yield to the Romans seventy of his ships; and pay them three thousand talents for the charge of the war.”

^a The war with Jugurtha intervened indeed, but this was not of any long continuance, nor is it any where referred to in the sacred history; however, it may not be improper to mention thus much of it:—That this Jugurtha was nephew to Micipsa, king of Numidia, who left behind him two sons, Adherbal and Hiempsal, both of whom Jugurtha murdered, and then usurped their kingdom; that when the Romans were for calling him to an account for all this wickedness, he for a long while bribed the commissioners and generals that were sent against him, till at length, being defeated first by Metellus, and afterwards by Marius, he was betrayed by Bocchus king of Mauritania, who was both his ally and father-in-law: that being thus betrayed and seized, he was laden with chains, and given up to Sylla, who delivered him into the hands of the general Marius, and he, in the triumph that was given him, dragged him like a slave at the wheels of his chariot; and that, after this ceremony was over, he was led to prison, stripped of his royal robes, and then pushed naked into a dungeon, where he was condemned to be starved to death.—Sallust's Jugurthine War.

^b To this purpose historians have observed, that when, upon a defeat given the Roman forces, he had taken Manlius Aquilius and Quintus Oppius, the two generals, prisoners, he not only treated them with the utmost indignity, but afterwards with equal cruelty tortured them to death; and that, finding a great number of Romans and Italians, upon one occasion or other, dispersed through all the provinces and cities of the Lesser Asia, he sent secret orders to all the governors of these provinces, and magistrates of these cities, to put them all to death in one and the same day, which was accordingly executed with such rigour, that no less than eighty thousand, say some, near double that number, say others, of Romans and Italians were then massacred in that country.—Appian, in Mithrid. epist.; Liv. b. lxxvii. lxxviii.; and L. Florus, b. iii. c. 5.

But the terms of this peace were too hard long to be submitted to by a man of Mithridates's spirit; and therefore, as soon as Nicomedes, who left the Roman people his heirs, was dead, he again seized on Bithynia and Paphlagonia, and the Romans again were forced to declare war against him.

² The two consuls for the year, Lucius Lucullus and Marcus Cotta, were sent to carry on this war; but the latter of these, being no ways skilled in military affairs, was overcome by Mithridates not far from Chalcedon, with the loss of most of his men, and a good part of his fleet, which was there to defend the coasts; till Lucullus, coming to his assistance, not only drove Mithridates from the siege of Cyzirus, a city on the Propontis, that was in the Roman interest, but destroyed his fleet in the Hellespont, retook Bithynia and Paphlagonia from him, pursued him into his kingdom, besieged his very capital, and in one engagement ruined all his forces, and compelled him to flee into Armenia, there to implore the protection and assistance of Tigranes, his son-in-law.

Nor was this all; for, as soon as Lucullus understood that Tigranes was engaged in the war with him, he immediately marched his army against him, passed the Euphrates, passed the Tigris, defeated the forces that were sent against him, and having besieged his metropolis, with not the twentieth part of their number, in one battle gained a complete victory over an army of three hundred and six thousand men that were coming to relieve it. Lucullus, in short, had in every place the advantage against these two confederate kings, ⁴ until, by the management of Publius Clodius, his own soldiers began to mutiny against him, insomuch, that having lost all the power and authority of a general, he was forced to deliver up the army to Pompey, and return to Rome.

Pompey, at his first entering upon the war, had taken into alliance with him Phraortes king of Parthia; but the mutiny which had happened in the latter end of Lucullus's time, had given Mithridates an opportunity of recovering a good part of his kingdom, and of getting together a great number of forces, wherewith he endeavoured to harass and distress the Roman army, till Pompey at length fell upon him by surprise, vanquished his troops, made him flee for shelter northward beyond the springs of the Euphrates, and then marched directly against his confederate Tigranes; but Tigranes, terrified at this, and not sufficiently provided to resist the power that was coming against him, was resolved to surrender both himself and his kingdom into the hands of the Roman general; who, upon his paying the Romans six thousand talents for making a causeless war against them, and yielding up to them all his conquests on this side the Euphrates, ordered that he should still reign in his paternal kingdom of Armenia the Greater, and his son ^c in

^c The reason why Pompey made this partition of Tigranes's kingdom, was, because Tigranes's son had put himself under the protection of the Romans. The father Tigranes had three sons by Cleopatra, the daughter of Mithridates, two of whom he had, upon slight occasions, put to death; and therefore this third, not thinking his life safe within the power of so cruel a father, fled to Phraortes, king of Parthia, whose daughter he had married, and by him was assisted to invade his father's dominions, and lay siege to Artaxata, his capital city; but, being routed by Tigranes the father, and driven out of the country, he betook himself to Gordena and Sophena, two provinces that bordered upon it.

Mithridates dreaded nothing so much as to fall into the hands of the Romans, and be led in triumph by them; and, therefore, being apprehensive that his son might deliver him to Pompey, and finding no possibility of making his escape, he retired into his apartment, and having there distributed poison to his wives, his concubines, and daughters, that were with him, he took a dose of it himself; but when he found it did not sufficiently operate upon him, he had recourse to his sword to finish the work, ^c and so died, after he had lived seventy-two years, and reigned sixty of them.

the Roman camp, and there by way of a supplicant, cast himself at the feet of Pompey. Pompey at first received him very kindly; but when he seemed dissatisfied with the portion of his father's kingdom that he had allotted him, and was for exciting the nobility of Armenia to renew the war against the Romans, and the Parthians to join in it, Pompey put him among those whom he reserved for his triumph, and after that triumph left him in prison.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 66.

^a This young prince having been hard pressed by the Romans, while they lay at the siege of Sinape, and had then by their fleet the mastery of the Euxine sea, which lay between Sinape and the kingdom of Machares, had made a peace with them, and ever since maintained the terms of it. By this means he had much incensed his father, and dreaded his approach. While, therefore, he was on the way, he sent ambassadors to him to make his peace, and to urge in excuse, that what he had done in that respect was by the necessity of his affairs, and not by choice; but, finding his father implacable, and no possibility of making his escape, he slew himself, to avoid falling into his hands.—Appian. in Mithrid.

^b A desperate expedition indeed, which contained a march of about two thousand miles, through all those countries which are now called Tartaria Crimea, Podolia, Moldavia, Walachia, Transylvania, Hungaria, Stiria, Carinthia, Tyrol, and Lombardy, and over the three great rivers of the Boristhenes, the Danube, and the Po.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 64.

^c The character which Velleius Paterculus gives us of this great man, is expressed in these words:—"During these times Mithridates a king of Pontus lived. He was a man whose

The Romans, after they had overcome all foreign powers and potentates that pretended to rival them, and thereby become masters of the greatest part of the then known world, fell soon into contests with one another about the government of it, and in every age some one appeared, who, at the expense of the public peace, affected to become the sole regent of it: but the most remarkable struggles of this kind, that any way relate to the scripture history, were between Sylla and Marius, Cæsar and Pompey, Anthony and Augustus.

The occasion of the difference between Sylla and Marius was the choice of a general to the Mithridatic war. Marius, ³ who was by birth a plebeian, and of a very mean parentage, had, by his military prowess and interest with the common people, raised himself to the chief command of the Jugurthine war; and, in the war against the Teutones and Cimbri, had gained himself immortal honour; but, being now upwards of seventy years old, in the late confederate war he had not so well maintained his reputation; whether it was that old age rebated his activity, or fortune had not thrown occasions of signaling himself in his way. Sylla, on the contrary, a patrician by birth, and one of the most illustrious families in Rome, was lively, active, and impetuous, had gained great battles, taken considerable towns, and, through the whole course of the war, so distinguished himself by his many and glorious successes, that he soon had the consulate conferred on him, and was afterwards declared governor of Asia Minor, and commander-in-chief in the war against Mithridates. Marius, who thought that all the preferments of the commonwealth did of right belong to him, looked upon this preference as an injustice done him, and was therefore resolved to carry by force, what he had not attained by the people's choice.

character can neither be passed over in silence, nor spoken of without care. In war he was most acute, in valour most illustrious; sometimes by fortune and always with judgment was his success obtained; in the closet he was a leader, in the field a soldier, and his hatred towards the Romans was that of a Hannibal;" and from other historians we may learn, that he was naturally a man of great capacity and understanding, which he had taken much care to improve; for he was not only well skilled in all the learning of those times, but, though he had two and twenty different nations under his dominions, yet he could speak to every one of them in their own proper language. He was a prince of great undertakings; and though he failed in most of those wherein he had to do with the Romans, yet, after every overthrow, we find him still rising up again with new vigour; for his last design of invading Italy sufficiently shows, that, though his fortune often forsook him, yet his stout heart, his courageous spirit, and his enterprising genius never did. After all, he was a man of great vices, as well as virtues. His cruelty was shown in the murder of his mother, and his brother, and the great number of his sons, friends, and followers, whom, at several times, and often on slight occasions, he put to death. His ambition was manifest by his many unjust invasions of other men's rights for the augmentation of his own dominions, and the many wicked methods of treachery, murder, and perfidiousness, that he took to accomplish his end. And his lust appeared in the great number of wives and concubines he had to serve it: for, in the one or other of these capacities, wherever he found a handsome woman, he always took her to him, and carried some of these with him wherever he went: but, when reduced to any distress, he always poisoned those whom he could not carry off, in like manner as he did his sisters and daughters in this case, that none of them might fall into the enemy's hands.—Velleius Paterculus, b. ii. c. 18; Valerius Maximus, b. viii. c. 7; Appian. in Mithrid.; and Plutarch on Lucullus and Pompey.

To this purpose he drew over to his interest a tribune, called Publius Sulpicius, an inveterate enemy to Sylla, and who, by his power and authority among the people, procured a law to pass, which took from Sylla the command of the army against Mithridates, and conferred it upon Marius. Marius accordingly sent some officers of his party to take possession of the command of the army, until he himself could come to them; but Sylla had prevented them, and made so sure of the affections of the soldiers, that, instead of obeying the orders sent from Marius, they killed his officers, and besought Sylla to lead them against his enemies at Rome, before he transported them into Asia. Incensed at the death of his officers, Marius had caused several of Sylla's friends to be put to death, and their houses to be plundered. This made Sylla hasten his march to Rome, where he soon defeated the body which Marius and Sulpicius had raised to oppose him, and entered the city sword in hand. The decree which transferred the command of the army from him to Marius, he caused to be repealed, and articles of impeachment drawn up against C. Marius, young Marius his son, the tribune Sulpicius, and twelve senators, who were of their party, for having been the authors of the late insurrection. Hereupon they were declared enemies to the Roman commonwealth; were interdicted water and fire, that is, all manner of sustenance, or assistance from any body; had rewards set upon their heads, and troops on all sides detached to hunt them down.

Sulpicius in the search was apprehended by some of Sylla's soldiers, who cut off his head, and carried it to Rome, and nailed it to the rostrum; but Marius had the good luck to make his escape, though ^a he underwent many dangers and hazards of his life during the time of his exile.

In the mean time, Cornelius Cinna, who, though a

^a After he was upwards of seventy years of age, and had been six times consul, he was forced to fly from Rome on foot, without either friend or servant to accompany him; and to avoid Sylla's people, that pursued him, to throw himself into a morass, where he lay the whole night, sunk, and buried in mud up to the neck. In the morning, when he got out, and endeavoured to gain the sea shore, in hopes of meeting some vessel to carry him out of Italy, he was known by the people of Minturne, seized and carried into the town, with a rope about his neck, all naked and muddy. The magistrates of the place, in obedience to the decree of the senate, which had attainted him, and set a price upon his head, sent a public slave, a Cimbrian by birth, to put him to death; but as the slave approached with his naked sword, "Canst thou, thou barbarian," said he with a loud voice, "have the assurance to assassinate Caius Marius!" Whereupon the slave, frightened at the sound of a name so terrible to his countrymen, threw down his sword, and ran out of the prison in great disorder, crying out, "that it was not in his power to kill Marius." The magistrates of Minturne, looking on this as an interposition of heaven for the preservation of this great man, not only set him at liberty, but furnished him with a vessel, wherein he sailed first into the island of Ænaria, and thence, designing for Africa, he was forced, either by stress of weather, or want of water, to go on shore on the coasts of Sicily, where he met with new dangers. For a Roman quaestor, who had the chief command there, offered to seize him; so that Marius, being forced to defend himself, lost sixteen of his men, who made a stand just upon the shore whilst others helped him on board. From Sicily he sailed to Africa, and landed at Carthage; but from thence he was expelled by Sextilius, who, as pretor, commanded in that province, and, notwithstanding the rigour of the season, was forced to go on board, and spend a good part of the winter in his ship, wandering up and down those seas, till being informed of what was doing at Rome by a messenger from Cinna, he returned to Italy, joined Cinna, besieged Rome, and revenged himself too severely on his enemies.—Vertot's Revolutions of Rome, b. x.

patrician by birth, had devoted himself to the plebeian party; when once he was created consul, and Sylla was gone to his command in Asia, was for rescinding the decree, whereby Marius was proscribed: but, when the senate perceived his design, they soon passed sentence upon him, declaring him fallen from the right of a citizen, and deprived of the dignity of a consul, and in his room they elected Lucius Merula. Cinna, who was naturally proud and fiery, upon hearing of this sentence, raised an army with purpose to revenge himself upon the authors of it, and sent to Marius to come to his assistance, who, as he passed through the cities of Italy, was joined by some veterans that had formerly served under him, and, by promising freedom to all slaves that would come under his banner, had got together a good body of men. With these, and the forces that Cinna had collected, they both marched directly to Rome, where, of the two consuls, Octavius was killed on his tribunal, and Merula, to prevent the enemy from putting him to a worse death, had his veins opened; where several senators of great note were by the order of Marius murdered in the streets, their heads cut off, and laid upon the rostrum, and their mangled bodies left to be devoured by dogs; and where he caused Sylla's house to be razed, his goods confiscated, his wife, children, and friends to be proscribed, and himself to be declared an enemy to the commonwealth, even while he was adding large provinces and kingdoms to the Roman state.

In the mean time, his wife, children, and friends, who had fled to his camp for protection, were continually soliciting him to turn his arms against his private enemies, and to free his country from these tyrants, who had so long oppressed it: so that, having concluded a peace with Mithridates upon very advantageous terms, he passed over with his army into Italy. But, before he was arrived, Marius was dead of a pleurisy, occasioned by excessive drinking, to which, in the decline of life, he accustomed himself; and young Marius, who inherited his father's cruelty, as well as power, entered into a close league with Cinna, and engaged Valerius Flaccus, whom they procured to be made consul, in their interest, and design of opposing Sylla. But Sylla, as soon as he landed in Italy, defeated Marius, and reduced him to the necessity of laying violent hands upon himself; and having vanquished all his other enemies, entered Rome at the head of his victorious forces, and there gave a loose to his licentious passion of revenge. All the people, that had appeared against him in arms, even though they came to beg quarter, he ordered to be massacred. Fourscore senators, and six hundred knights, together with an infinite number of the richest citizens of Rome, he caused to be proscribed: their sons and grandsons he degraded from all their rights and privileges: those that should protect or harbour any of them, he threatened with the like proscription; and to those that should apprehend or murder any of them, he promised a reward of two talents; so that it became no uncommon thing for slaves that had murdered their masters, nay, for children that had murdered their fathers, to come, with their hands reeking in blood, to demand the reward of their treason or parricide.

Nor was it only the party that favoured Marius which suffered in this barbarous manner, but, as Sylla ¹ made little or no account of any man's life, he permitted his friends and officers, with impunity, to revenge themselves of all their private enemies, inasmuch, that fresh numbers were proscribed, and murdered every day, and no one, especially if he was rich and wealthy, was secure of his life for a moment: nay, to such an excess of cruelty and arbitrariness did he proceed at last, that, without naming any particular persons, he proscribed whole cities and nations, and, by way of confiscation, seized on all the estates, houses, and territories, belonging to such towns in Italy as had declared for Marius during the civil war, which, to attach them more firmly to his interest, he took care to distribute among his soldiers.

Some, however, that were about him, and had probably been benefited by these usurpations, being apprehensive that such violent proceedings might not last long, to give them the better sanction, and some colour of law, advised him to take upon him the office, not of a temporary, but perpetual dictator. The power of this supreme magistrate was boundless. The authority of the consuls, and all other magistrates, except that of the tribunes, was superseded by it. He had power of life and death over his fellow citizens, was sole arbiter of peace and war, was at liberty to raise or disband forces as he thought fit, and under no obligation to give an account of his conduct to any body. In a word, he had all the power of the most absolute king, greater indeed than any of the ancient kings of Rome ever had; but then it was only in the times of the greatest exigences of the commonwealth, when it was endangered either by powerful enemies abroad, or by civil commotions at home, that such an officer was appointed; and, lest such a large power should be abused, no man was invested with it for longer than six months. But Sylla, who had terrified the people into a tame submission, and made himself absolute at Rome, would have it conferred on him for a time undetermined; so that the Romans, who had changed kingly government into the republican under consuls, and military tribunes, after many ages, relapsed again into the absolute power of one; though Sylla, to lessen the aversion which all republicans could not but have to such a form of government, took care to disguise what was in reality a royalty, under the less odious title of a "dictatorship."

This success of Sylla's in climbing up to the empire, and supporting himself therein, made it apparent to those

a One thing is wonderful in this Sylla, that after he had destroyed more than a hundred thousand of his fellow citizens in the civil war, and had caused ninety senators, of which fifteen had been consuls, and more than six and twenty hundred knights to be put to death, he had the courage to lay down the dictatorship, and to reduce himself to the level of a private citizen, without fearing the resentment of so many illustrious families, whose heads he had destroyed by his cruel proscriptions. The Romans in general looked upon this his abdication of the sovereign power, as an instance of the greatest magnanimity, and gladly forgave him all the murders, for the sake of the liberty which he thereby restored them; but his enemies imputed it to the natural uneasiness of his mind, and his continual fear, lest some Roman might be bold enough, at one stroke, to deprive him of both his empire and his life. However this be, it is certain, that, after having shed so much blood, he died peaceably in his bed, and a few days before his death, composed his own epitaph, which comprises his true character, namely, "That no body had ever outdone him, either in obliging his friends, or persecuting his enemies."—Vertot's Revolutions, b. xi.

that came after him, that the Romans could bear a master, and gave occasion to the violent contests which afterwards happened between Caesar and Pompey, who, after the death of Crassus,^b and the Parthian war, were the two great competitors for the sovereignty of Rome.

Cneius Pompeius, whose father being of the same name, had been consul, and served his country faithfully in the wars, was, from his very youth, the darling of the Roman people; created a general before he had been a soldier; and through the whole course of his life attended with a wonderful train of victories and successes:¹ but being all along accustomed to the command of armies, he could not so well, upon the expiration of his commission, reduce himself to the simplicity of a private life; and therefore, whenever he appeared in public, he was always followed by a crowd of his dependents, whose numerous appearance looked more like the court of some great prince, than the attendants of a citizen of any republic. It must be owned, however, that in his pursuit of dignities, he was less fond of the power that is inseparable from them, than of the honours and splendours that surround them; that, in short, he was a man of show rather than real ambition; and, if he affected any high office in state, it was chiefly to raise himself above all the commanders of his time; for the great pride of his soul was, to be thought the only general of the commonwealth, whereas, he ought to have contented himself with being the first.

² Caius Julius Caesar was born of the illustrious family of the Julii, and was indeed the most extraordinary person of his age. Nature, which seemed to have formed him for the command of the rest of mankind, had given him an air of empire, and a dignity of aspect inexpressible; but then this air of grandeur was allayed by the gentleness and sweetness of his behaviour, which gained him the hearts of those he conversed with, and laid the foundation of his future greatness. He was a man of exalted courage and insinuating eloquence, extensive in his designs, indefatigable in pursuing them

b When Crassus led his army into Mesopotamia, there came to him a certain chief of an Arabian tribe, who, having served in the wars under Pompey, had contracted an acquaintance with several of the Romans, and was therefore a proper instrument for Surenas, the Parthian general, to employ upon this occasion. He told Crassus, inquiring about the strength of the enemy, that they were unable to stand before him, and that, to obtain a complete victory, he had nothing to do but to march directly against them, for which purpose he offered himself to be their guide; Crassus was weak enough to accept of his offer; and accordingly the crafty man led them along the plains of Mesopotamia, until he had brought them into a sandy desert, where the Parthians, he knew, would have the best opportunity of destroying them, and then rode off to acquaint Surenas with it, who immediately fell upon them, and gave them a terrible defeat. Nor was this the only false step that Crassus made: for having rested the remains of his army for one day at Carrhae, not far from the place where the battle was fought, when, in the night following, he endeavoured to make his escape, he committed himself to the guidance of one Andromachus, another traitor, who led him into the midst of bogs and morasses, where Surenas overtook him, slew him, and gave his army the greatest overthrow that the Romans had ever received since the battle of Cannae; for, in this engagement, twenty thousand were slain, and ten thousand taken prisoners; and the rest forced to make their escape by several ways into Armenia, Cilicia, and Syria.—Plutarch. in Crasso; Appian. in Parthiis; and Dion Cassius, b. xl.

and ambitious of the great offices of state, chiefly for the increase of his interest and power, and for the means and opportunity which they afforded him, by gentle degrees, of becoming the master and sovereign of his country.

Upon the death of Crassus, who held the balance between these two great men, the emulation between them began to break out. Cæsar was in Gaul, pursuing his victories against the Helvetians, the Germans, the Belgæ, the Britons, and several other nations, and astonishing all the world with the fame of his great exploits; but Pompey, since the time of his victories in Asia, had continued, now for the space of twelve years, for the most part in Rome, notwithstanding he had obtained a large commission to govern the provinces of Spain and Africa.

By his constant residing at Rome, he had got a perfect ascendancy over the senate; and some, to remedy the disorders they then laboured under, were for creating him dictator, till Cato, who was always watchful for the public liberty, proposed rather to choose him sole consul, without a colleague; because a consul was responsible to the people and senate for his conduct, which a dictator was not.

The senate approved of this expedient, and accordingly made Pompey the sole consul. They continued him likewise in his former governments, and for the payment of the forces he had under him, gave him an annual allowance of a thousand talents out of the exchequer: but, as all good understanding between him and Cæsar was now vanished, he took care to prefer two laws, which the senate readily agreed to, namely, "That the miscarriages of officers, for twenty years last past, should be inquired into; and that all absent persons should not be allowed to demand any public employments;" the latter of which was more immediately levelled at Cæsar: for Pompey's design herein was, to oblige him to abandon the government of the two Gauls, and the command of his army, in order to come in person to solicit the consulate, which he in his return, as he assigned by his letters, expected to have conferred on him.

Cæsar was very well aware of Pompey's design; but, instead of relinquishing his government and returning to Rome, he chose to remain at the head of his forces, and when the senate, by Pompey's procurement, came to a resolution of taking the government from him by naming his successor, he wrote several letters to them, with a great deal of temper, requesting either that they would continue him in his government, as they had done Pompey, or permit him, though absent from Rome, to put up for the consulate; but the majority of the senate, that was entirely under Pompey's direction, rejected every proposal that he sent; so that, finding himself treated with contempt, he passed the Alps at the head of the third legion, and halted at Ravenna, from whence he sent Fabius, one of his lieutenants, with letters to the senate,¹ "wherein he magnified his own exploits, expecting that some regard should be had to his services; and wherein he declared his readiness to lay down his command, in case Pompey would do the like; but that if that general pretended to retain his forces, he knew very well how to defend himself at the head of his legions, and would in a few days be at Rome, to revenge the injuries which were done to him, as well as the public."

This letter, when read to the senate, was represented as a "decree that Lucius Domitius should be Cæsar's successor, and have four thousand new levies to enable him to go and take possession of his government; and that in case Cæsar refused to disband his army within such a time, he should be prosecuted as an enemy to the commonwealth." When Cæsar was informed of this decree, he sent orders to such of his troops as were nearest at hand, to advance towards the Rubicon, a small river that parted his government of Gallia Cisalpina from the rest of Italy. When he came up the next day, he found there five thousand foot, and three hundred horse; and having halted a while on the bank of the river, he is said there to have been seized with some remorse upon consideration of what he was about to do; till having reflected on the hatred and inveteracy of his enemies, he threw himself into the river at once, passed it, and took Ariminum by surprise; and from thence put all Rome in such a disorder, that Pompey, not having sufficient forces to resist him, with the consuls and a great number of senators, retired to Capua, and thence to Brundisium, where taking shipping, they soon arrived at the port of Dyrrachium, a city of Epirus, where Pompey intended to gather together such an army as might enable him to make a stand.

Upon the retreat of Pompey, Cæsar, in the space of sixty days, made himself master of all Italy, and came to Rome, where he promised the people every thing should be done for the good of the commonwealth: and having filled up the senate, and settled some kind of government among them, he marched his army directly into Spain, where Pompey was governor, and had left several troops attached to his interest. As soon as he came thither, he fell upon Afranius and Petreius, Pompey's lieutenants; and having driven them out of the province, he made himself master thereof, and so returned to Rome, where he was declared dictator, though after eleven days, he laid down that office, and, together with Servilius Isauricus, was elected consul for the year ensuing.

Pompey, by this time, had been in Epirus for the space of a year, and had got together a considerable army out of Greece, Asia, and all the eastern countries, to support his interest; but when Cæsar went after him, the season of the year was too far advanced, either for the fleets to be at sea, or the armies to take the field, and so both sides lay still in their winter quarters.

In the spring both armies took the field, and encamped against each other near Dyrrachium, now Durazzo, where, in several skirmishes, Cæsar had the better; but at length in one of them he received so great a defeat, that himself acknowledged he must have been utterly undone, had Pompey seen his advantage, and pursued it. For fear of the like disaster, therefore, or the want of provisions for his army, Cæsar decamped the next day, and marched towards Thessaly, where he found plenty of all things, and there waited to give Pompey battle. Pompey had an army of forty-five thousand foot, and five thousand horse, but they were most of them raw inexperienced men, raised out of the effeminate nations of Asia, and some Roman senators, and other gentlemen, who knew very little of war. Caesar, on the other hand, had an army of twenty-two thousand foot, and one thousand horse; but then they were most part of them veteran soldiers, who, for the space of ten years, had been accustomed to war and victory in Gaul. On the plains of Pharsalia these two armies met with two of the greatest generals in the world at the head of them, disputing for universal empire. The engagement for some time was sharp on both sides: but, at length, Pompey's army was vanquished and broken. Fifteen thousand of them were slain; twenty-four thousand made prisoners; their camp was taken, and their general, with much ado, forced to make his escape in disguise, and, after having wandered from place to place, was, at length, in Egypt, "perfidiously slain in the fifty-ninth year of his age.

After the death of Pompey, and the return of Cæsar to Rome, the senate decreed him uncommon honours, and an unlimited authority. He was appointed consul for ten years, and perpetual dictator; had the name of 'imperator' given him, and the august title of 'father of his country.' His person was declared sacred and inviolable; and at all public games he had the privilege of sitting in a gilded chair, with a golden crown upon his head; but, notwithstanding all this profusion of honours, we find in what a barbarous way he was murdered at last.

After the death of Julius Cæsar, great confusion and disorders happened in the Roman state, till at length Anthony and Octavianus, upon the forced abdication of Lepidus, became the two great men in the empire. Anthony had all the east, and Octavianus all the west; but not content with this, they soon took occasion to differ with each other, and entered into contest who should have the whole.

^a After the defeat of his army, Pompey, not well knowing which way to betake himself, determined at last to go to Egypt. He had been a very considerable friend to the late king Ptolemy Auletes, and therefore he expected a kind reception from his son. Taking therefore his wife Cornelia, and his younger son Sextus with him, he steered his course towards Egypt, and, as he drew near to land, sent messengers to the king, desiring his protection and aid in his present distress. The king was then a minor, under the tuition of Pothymus a eunuch, and Achilles the general of his army, who, taking Theodotus, and some others into the consultation, advised together what answer to send. Some were for receiving, and others for rejecting him; but Theodotus was of opinion, that their only safe way was to despatch him: for should they receive him, as he argued, Cæsar would revenge it; should they reject him, if ever he recovered power, himself would revenge it; and therefore the only method to secure themselves from both, was to cut him off; for hereby they would certainly make Cæsar their friend, and prevent the other from doing any mischief: 'for dead men,' said he, according to the proverb, 'never bite.' This advice prevailed, and accordingly Achilles, with Septimus a Roman commander, then in the service of the king of Egypt, was sent to put it in execution. Under the pretence therefore of conducting Pompey to the king, they took him out of the ship into a boat; but as soon as they came near the shore, they fell upon him, and slew him, cut off his head, and cast his dead carcass on the strand. His wife and son, seeing this barbarous murder, raised bitter cries and lamentations: but all to no purpose; perceiving therefore themselves in the like danger, they hoisted sail and made off, leaving this great man, who, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, came to this woful end, no other funeral, than what Philip, an enfranchised bondman of his, and a poor Roman, who came thither by accident, could give him, by making a funeral pile of the broken pieces of an old boat, that lay wrecked on the shore.—Plutarch on Pompey; and Appian on the Civil Wars, b. ii.

Anthony was a person of great note for his military skill and abilities. At the battle of Pharsalia he did wonders: and in that of Philippi, where Octavianus ^b behaved but very meanly, the whole victory was owing to his courage and conduct; but he was exceedingly addicted to vice, especially to the love of women, which Cleopatra observing, laid hold on him on this weak side, and for the gratification of her ambition and avarice, which were the two predominant passions in her, put him upon such measures, as gave a general offence to the Romans.

Octavianus, on the other hand, though he was always successful, yet for this he was indebted not so much to his courage, as his cunning and management; for, though he had a genius capable of framing the greatest projects, yet, in cool blood, he found himself incapable of facing the meanest danger. And therefore being conscious of his weakness in this respect, he contented himself with supplying the schemes, and called in the valour of other men to put them in execution. In most of his military undertakings, he borrowed, as it were, Agrippa's courage, and the rather made use of him, because he was a mere soldier of fortune, and, consequently, incapable of creating any jealousy, or making himself head of any party.

After ^c a vast preparation for war, these two great men, of different characters, met with their armies and fleets near Actium, a town on the coast of Epirus, there to decide the empire of the world. Canidius, who had the chief command of Anthony's army, persuaded him to de-camp and march into the country of Thrace, or Macedonia, there to try his fortune in a battle at land, because his army was much more to be depended on than his fleet: but Cleopatra, who was then in company with Anthony, advised him rather to decide the matter by a fight at sea; and her advice prevailed.

On the second of September, therefore, A. M. 3973, A. C. 31, the two fleets engaged before the mouth of the Ambrasian gulf, in the sight of the two armies, the one drawn up on the north, and the other on the south, side of the straits which entered the gulf, there to attend the event of the battle. The fight for some time continued dubious, with as fair a prospect of success for Anthony as for his adversary, until Cleopatra forsook him: for she, being affrightened with the noise and terror of the battle, gave orders to the captain that commanded her ship to sheer off, and so drew after her the whole Egyptian squadron, which consisted of sixty large men of war.

Anthony, giving all for lost, made after her as fast as he could, and so, by his flight, yielded the victory to Octavianus; but after he was gone, his ships fought so

^b On the eve before the battle at Philippi, under pretence of some indisposition, he left the body which he commanded, and, while the two armies were engaged, hid himself amongst the baggage; and, in a sea fight against young Pompey, he had not the courage to see the two fleets engage, but lay in the bottom of the ship, with his eyes lift up to heaven, as if he had been in a trance, and never once showed himself to his soldiers, until news was brought him that the enemy was fled.—Fertot's Revolutions of Rome, b. xiv.

^c Anthony's forces, by land and sea, consisted of a hundred thousand foot, twelve thousand horse, and five hundred ships of war: and Octavianus's of eighty thousand foot, twelve thousand horse, and two hundred and fifty ships of war.—Plutarch on Antony; and Dion Cassius, b. lxxx.

valiantly, that, though the engagement began at noon, it was not ended till it was night.

In the mean time, Anthony and Cleopatra got to Tenedos, in Laconia, whither some of his ships, that had escaped the fight, and several of his friends, repaired to him, from whom we understand, that though his fleet was destroyed, his land-army was still safe; and therefore he wrote to Canidius to retire with it through Macedonia into Asia, in hopes of being able, by that means, to renew the war: but Canidius, in his march, being overtaken by Octavianus, fled by night to Anthony, and the army, finding themselves deserted by their generals, went over to the enemy, as the foreign forces, which had come to the assistance of Anthony, fled all home to their respective countries, and made their peace afterwards with the conqueror on the best terms they could.

By this time Anthony and Cleopatra were both returned to Alexandria, and it was not long before Octavianus went in pursuit of them. On their first coming, Anthony fell upon the Roman troops, while under the fatigue of their march, and put them to a total rout; but in a second engagement with them, he was vanquished, and driven back into the city with great loss. The next morning, when he went down to the harbour to put the fleet in order to engage the enemy, no sooner were they drawn up in line of battle, but he saw them desert and go over to them, and, to his great mortification, when he returned to the city, he found that all the land-forces, both horse and foot, had in like manner revolted from him.

When Anthony understood that all this was done by Cleopatra's treachery, and in hopes of making her peace with Octavianus, he could not forbear expressing his resentment of it in loud complaints; so that Cleopatra, for fear of him, but, as she pretended, to secure herself from the enemy, fled to a monument, which she caused to be built of a great height, and wonderful structure, and having there shut herself up with two maids and one eunuch, she had it given out that she was dead. Anthony no sooner heard the news, but, supposing it to be true, fell upon his sword; however, having intelligence some time after, that Cleopatra was still alive, he ordered those about him to carry him to her monument, where might be seen one of the most deplorable spectacles that can be imagined. Anthony, all over bloody, and breathing out his last, was, by the hands of Cleopatra and her two maids, drawn up by the ropes and pulleys that were employed in the building, to the top of the monument, and there, in a few moments, expired in her arms.

After the death of Anthony, the great care of Octavianus was to make himself master of Cleopatra's person and riches; of her person to adorn his triumph; and of her riches to defray the expenses of the war: but after he had luckily compassed both, she, having private notice given her of her being designed to be carried to Rome, to make part of the show in her conqueror's triumph, caused herself ^a to be bitten with an asp, and so, to avoid this

^a The asp is a serpent of Egypt and Libya, and proper only to those climates. Those that are bitten by it die within three hours, in a kind of gentle sleep or lethargy, without any sensation of pain; and therefore Cleopatra, who had experienced all kinds of poisons upon other creatures, made choice of this, as the easiest way of dying; and, to deceive her keepers, kept an asp always hid in her chamber, under figs, grapes, and flowers, which, when she was determined to die, she took and held to infamy, ^b died, after she had reigned, from the death of her father, twenty-two years, and lived thirty-nine.

Octavianus, ¹ though much concerned for having thus lost the chief glory of his triumph, did nevertheless make for Cleopatra, as he had permitted her to make for Anthony, a splendid and royal funeral. He had them both deposited in the same monument which they had begun, and gave orders to have it finished. Having thus settled his affairs in Egypt, and cut off all those from whom he might expect any fresh disturbances, he made a review of the several provinces of the Lesser Asia, and the isles adjoining, and so, passing through Greece, returned to Rome, where he triumphed for three days successively, for his victory over the Dalmatians, and for the sea-fight at Actium, and for the conquest of Egypt; in the last of which were led before him the children of Cleopatra, and though herself had escaped that fate, her effigy was carried in procession, with an asp hanging at her arm, to denote the manner of her death.

After this triumph, he held a private consultation with Agrippa and Mecænas, his two chief ministers and principal instruments of his greatness, whether he should restore the commonwealth to its ancient state, or retain the sovereign power. Agrippa was for restoring, but Mecænas for the retaining part; whereupon Octavianus, knowing that the senate was filled with his creatures, whose fortunes depended on his holding the sovereignty, proposed indeed, in a formal speech, to resign his authority; but, no sooner was the proposal made, than the whole senate, with a unanimous voice, dissuaded him from it, and, with all manner of arguments, pressed him to take upon him the sole administration of the government, which, with much seeming reluctance, at length he consented to. But by no means would he submit to accept of it for a longer term than ten years, though from ten years to ten years, upon one pretence or other, he continued himself in it as long as he lived, and so transmitted it to his successors.

With this new power the senate was determined to confer on him a new name. Himself had taken upon him the common title of imperator, which the soldiers, during the times of the republic, used to give to victorious generals; but this was not thought adequate to his merit: and therefore, since the word Augustus seemed to signify something that, above human, was sacred and venerable, this was made choice of, and, by the general suffrage of the senate, first given to him, with many more things decreed to his honour, by the flattery of some who courted his favour, and the fear of others, who dreaded his power.

her arm, and, soon after its biting her, fell into a sleep, and so died.

^b In her death ended the reign of the family of the Ptolemies in Egypt, which hereupon was reduced into the form of a Roman province, and was governed by a prefect sent thither from Rome. Under this form it continued a province of the Roman empire six hundred and seventy years, till it was taken from them by the Saracens, in the year of our Lord 641.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 50.

priest of Rome, was dead, assumed to himself, as did his successors in the empire, that office; and the first thing he did, was to examine into the prophetic books, which at that time went abroad under the name of the sibyls.⁴

That in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus, there came a strange woman to Rome, who offered to sell to the king nine volumes of these sibylline oracles, but, upon his refusing to purchase them, burnt three of them, and afterwards coming with six, and being rejected, burnt three more, and yet at last obtained the full amount of what she had asked at first for the three remaining: that these volumes when purchased,¹ were laid up in the capitol, committed to the custody of proper officers, never consulted but upon great exigences of state, and carefully preserved, until at the burning of the capitol in the civil wars between Sylla and Marius, they happened to be consumed: that, upon the rebuilding of the capitol,² the Romans, with great care, made another collection of sibylline oracles from several countries, and, after they had selected such as their church and state did approve of for their purpose, laid them up in the new capitol, instead of those which the fire had consumed: that, besides those capitoline volumes, there were a great many more sibylline oracles in the world,³ which Augustus, in the beginning of his office of pontifex maxi-

Octavianus, in carrying on the war against Sextus Pompeius, the son of Pompey the Great; but when he arrogated the whole honour of their successes to himself, Octavianus drew over all his army to desert him, and so reduced him to the necessity of begging his life, and of being content to lead the remainder of it in a private and mean condition, at Circeii, a small maritime town among the Latins, where he was sent into banishment, and there died in obscurity and contempt.—Suetonius in Octavio, b. xvi.; Appian on the Civil Wars, b. v.; *J. a The sibyls were women of ancient times said to be endued with a prophetic spirit, and to have delivered oracles, foreshowing the fates and destinies of kingdoms. We have in the writings of the ancients, mention made of ten of them: the Cumæan, the Cumanian, the Persian, the Hellespontian, the Lybian, the Samian, the Delphian, the Phrygian, the Tiburtine, and the Erythrean; but some are of opinion, that the Cumæan and the Erythrean was one and the same sibyl: that she was born at Erythrae in Ionia, and therefore was by the Greeks called Erythrae; but, having removed from Erythrae to Cumæ in Italy, and there delivered all her oracles, she was from thence by the Romans and Italians called Cumæa. These sibyls, among the pagans, were what the prophets and prophetesses were accounted among the Hebrews; and, as the most ancient of these were named Sibylla, so all others of the same sex, who pretended to the like fatidical spirit, were called sibyls. The place from whence these sibyls gave out their oracles, was generally a cave or subterraneous vault, if we may judge of others by that at Cumæ, whereof Justin Martyr gives us this account. "I have seen the place," says he, "which is a large chapel, or oratory, hewn out of the main rock, and must have been a work of great labour. Here the sibyl, as the inhabitants, who had a tradition thereof, told me, gave forth oracles. In the middle of the chapel they showed me three hollow places hewn out of the same rock, in which, when filled with water, the Sibyl used to bathe herself, and so having put on her garment retired into the innermost cell of the chapel, which was likewise hewn out of the same rock, and having placed herself upon an elevated seat, which jutted out into the middle of the cell, she there uttered her oracles."—Lactantius on a False Religion, b. i. c. 6; Salmasius in his Essays to Solinus, p. 8; and Justin Martyr's Exhortation to the Greeks.

mus, endeavoured to collect, and what he reputed genuine, or rather what suited his purpose best, these he deposited likewise in the capitol, burning the rest: that⁴ Tiberius made another review of these oracles, and condemned several volumes of them to the flames; but the capitoline copies were still held in great veneration,⁵ until they fell into disgrace in the reign of Honorius, and, by his order and appointment, were burnt and destroyed;⁶ these are facts that are confirmed by all antiquity, and what comprise indeed the whole history of these sibylline writings. But if they were all thus finally destroyed, the question is, how came we by the present collection of Greek verses, comprised in eight books, which go under the name of sibyls, and of what merit and authority are we to account them?

Now, in answer to this, it is to be observed,⁷ that, long before the times of Christianity, there were extant, among the heathens, several oracles, or predictions of future events, ascribed to one or more of these prophetesses, who were styled sibyls, that these predictions were held in great esteem among the ancients, as containing notions consonant to true religion, the worship of one God, the conflagration of the world, the renovation of it again, the general resurrection, and the rewards and punishments hereafter; and that both heathen, Jewish, and Christian authors, who make mention of these sibyls give a strong sanction to their authority.

Varro looks upon them as inspired prophetesses; Virgil does them honour in citing their predictions; Josephus thinks them useful to establish some positions in sacred history; and Clemens Alexandrinus, as he quotes a more ancient author for it, brings in St Paul addressing himself to a heathen audience in these words: "Take the Greek books in your hands, read the sibyls, and see what they say of the unity of God, and how they foretel what is to come, and you will there clearly find the Son of God." It must be acknowledged, indeed, that the whole collection of these sibylline oracles, as they are now extant, in eight entire books, is far from being genuine. The first, second, and most of the fifth, all the sixth, seventh, and eighth books, seem to be a manifest forgery, the spurious production of some zealous Christian, perhaps about the middle of the second age after Christ, for the promotion of the religion he professed.

⁸ In one place, he explicitly declares himself to be a Christian, and speaks of the whole mystery of our salvation, and of the methods whereby it was accomplished; of the incarnation and birth, the circumcision and death, the resurrection and ascension of our Saviour Christ, with as much accuracy as do the evangelists. ⁹ In another place he mentions Christ's future reigning here upon earth, according to the notion of the millenarians, which was not started till the second century; and, ¹⁰ in another, gives us a succession of the Roman emperors, in their order, from Julius Caesar to Antoninus Pius, together with the adoption of Marcus Aurelius, and Lucius Verus, which has much more the air of an historical narrative, than a prophetic prediction.

These things discover a forgery, at least a great part of these pretended oracles, a little too palpably; but then, it must be observed, that neither the heathens before, nor the Christians for the three first centuries after Christ, knew any thing of these spurious pieces, because we no where find them making any citations from them; but now,¹ from the whole poem, the greatest part of the third, all the fourth, and a small branch of the fifth book, which are the only parts of the present collection, that are either cited or referred to by the ancient heathens, their quotations are innumerable: and therefore we may justly infer, that the present copy of eight books is not the same with what was extant before, and in the first ages of Christianity, but widely different from it; that those are the genuine prophecies only, which we find the ancient heathens, and primitive Christians, so frequently citing, and so generally esteeming, upon the account of their divine inspiration; and that the rest, which have visible marks of forgery upon them, were probably the spurious additions of such conceited Christians as called themselves Gnostics: because Epiphanius tells us, that this set of men boasted of having books written by the daughter of Noah, even as the pretended prophetess, at the end of the third book, which is a spurious addition to what went before, gives us to know that she was a wife to one of the three sons of Noah, and was with him in the ark during the whole time of the deluge.

Upon the whole, therefore, we may conclude, that though in the collection which we now have of the sibylline prophecies, several whole books, and some parts in others, are confessedly spurious, yet others there are, which have all the evidences we can desire of their being genuine: and therefore to condemn them all in the lump, and, because some appear to be palpable forgeries, to include all under the same category, is an act of great injustice.

If indeed we attend ever so little to the contents of those oracles, which we deem genuine, we cannot but perceive, that neither heathens, Jews, nor Christians, could consistently with themselves, be any ways the forgers of them.² The heathens could not, because they are directly levelled against their wickedness, idolatry, and polytheism. The Jews could not, because they foretell the subversion of their state and temple by the Romans, which we all know they would never believe: and the Christians could not, because many quotations out of these oracles are found in other authors previous to Christianity; and in the beginning of it several of them are cited by the first Christians, in the open view of all men, as very ancient at that time, very well known, and universally received over all the heathen world.

If then these genuine prophecies of the sibyls were not of human contrivance and invention, the conclusive question is, from whence was it that they derived their original? God, no doubt, who forced Balaam, contrary to his will, to bless the Israelites, and to prophecy³ 'the coming of his Son out of Jacob,' could, in what manner he pleased, control the diabolical spirits, which presided in the heathen oracles, and make them utter things even relating to the kingdom of the Messiah, which otherwise they might have no inclination to utter. But there is no necessity for our having recourse to this extraordinary expedient; since the contents of the sibylline oracles, those I mean that are genuine, are every where agreeable to the scriptures, and foretell, for the main part, the same great revolutions of providence that they do; it is no way inconsistent with the divine attributes to suppose, that though God gave positive laws, or an institution of religious worship to the Jews only, and intrusted none but them with those divine oracles, which related to that worship; yet he might not wholly confine divine inspiration to that nation, but might support the law and religion of nature, and the right worship of himself, as the one true God, among the heathens likewise, by the help of these oracles, until⁴ 'the day dawned,' that is, a more perfect revelation came, and 'he who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, gave the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.'⁵

⁵ The most rational and consistent account of the sibylline oracles, that is perhaps anywhere to be found within a small compass, is given by Bishop Horsley in his ingenious 'Dissertation on the prophecies of the Messial dispersed among the Heathen.' In that dissertation there are one or two positions strenuously maintained, which I cannot admit; but the general principle on which the reasoning rests as its foundation, no reflecting Christian can, I think, call in question. It is, that the rise and progress of idolatry were partial and gradual: that all nations did not become idolaters at the same period of time; that the first idolaters no where abjured the worship of the true God, when they began to worship subordinate deities in conjunction with him; and that they carefully collected and religiously preserved the prophecies of the patriarchal ages, until they degenerated so far as to forget the worship of the true God entirely. Even then they would not destroy the sacred books of their more orthodox and pious ancestors, but would rather add to them other predictions or pretended predictions, derived from an impure source: for, as he justly observes, superstition has uniformly been in its own nature timid, and more likely to give credit to false predictions than to destroy the books which contain predictions that are true. He supposes therefore that the sibyls were fictitious beings who never really existed; but that the oracles attributed to them were collections of true and false prophecies—of prophecies which had really been delivered under the influence of the Spirit of God to the patriarchs of the human race, and of false prophecies which had been added to these by the heathen priests and soothsayers, to whom were committed the original sacred oracles. Such a mixture of truth and imposture he supposes to have constituted the matter of the sibylline books which were preserved in the capitol of Rome; which the early fathers of the Christian church, such as Justin Martyr and Clemens Alexandrinus quoted; and which furnished Virgil with the ideas which run through his sublime eclogue entitled Pollio. Four-fifths of the oracles quoted from these books by the latter fathers, after pious frauds became frequent, he justly considers as palpable forgeries by some indiscreet Christians, who absurdly hoped to serve their cause by means calculated to injure it among thinking men. It is not, I confess, clear to me that Virgil took his ideas from the sibylline books, though he quotes them, or rather refers to them; for the Old Testament, having long before been translated into Greek, was accessible to Virgil, who was himself a learned man of great curiosity; though, wishing to pay a compliment to a great man of Rome, he might not choose to rest the foundation of that compliment upon the sacred books of a people so generally hated and despised as were the Jews by the Romans.—*Ips. INTRODUCTION

CHAP. I.—Judaism preparatory to Christianity.

“THAT the Mosaic dispensation was from the first intended not for the exclusive benefit of the chosen people, but as instrumental to the introduction of an universal blessing to mankind, is evident from the very first promise made to Abraham; which to the personal and national blessing, with which it encouraged and rewarded the faith and obedience of the patriarch, added this remarkable declaration, as the crown and completion of all: ¹ ‘And in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed;’ a declaration again repeated to the same patriarch on two solemn occasions. ² First on disclosing to him the intended punishment of Sodom and Gomorrah, and receiving with the most gracious condescension, his humble but earnest intercession in favour of those few righteous who might be found in those receptacles of guilt; and again still more emphatically, in consequence of his obeying the voice of God, and ³ ‘and not withholding his son, his only son.’

“It deserves to be particularly noticed, that in the former of these transactions, the patriarch interceding with God, ⁴ ‘as Judge of all the earth,’ was an evident representation of the Great Intercessor whose appearance was predicted in the promised blessing: and that in the latter he beheld, in the commanding sacrifice, and the providential restoration of his only begotten son, the clear representation of the only begotten Son of God; prefiguring at once the voluntary sacrifice and the triumphant resurrection of that Christ who was the promised seed, ‘in whom all the nations of the earth were to be blessed.’ So that in both cases, but especially the last, the nature of the promised blessing was not obscurely intimated, by the immediate circumstances attending the divine declaration.

“As the patriarch thus ‘rejoiced to behold the day of Christ,’ it cannot be doubted but he communicated to his family this joyful hope, and explained the great object to which it was directed; so that when the same promise was solemnly renewed, first to Isaac, ⁵ and afterwards to Jacob, ⁶ its meaning and object were distinctly understood by these patriarchs: and that wherever the blessing of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob is referred to, or the covenant which God made with them and their posterity recognized as the glory and the hope of Israel; this essential part of it, the promise of the Messiah, and the blessing by him to be communicated to all the nations of the earth, must have been equally and perpetually recognized as the great object of the Jewish scheme, to which every other part of it was instrumental and subordinate. So that the original foundation and primary characteristic of this scheme, far from being partial and exclusive, avowedly extended to all the nations of the earth, and centered in that Messiah, who is the grand object of all the divine dispensations, from the creation of the world to its close.

“This original and perpetual purpose of God, to extend the effects of the Jewish dispensation to all the nations of the earth, is also most clearly recognized in the celebrated prophecy of Jacob; ^a ‘The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be.’ Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the event described, and the period marked out by the ‘sceptre’s departing from Judah, and the lawgiver from between his feet;’ there appears no reasonable ground for doubting, that the word Shiloh designates the Messiah, and that the gathering of the people to him,

I am disposed to adopt Warburton’s interpretation of this prophecy, in preference to any other; and to believe that it denoted the continuance of the theocratic sceptre over the Jews, which remained until our Saviour came, who instituted in its place his kingdom ‘not of this world.’ (See Warburton, b. v. sect. 3. subsect. 3. vol. iv. p. 243—266.) presignifies the extension of the church to all nations without distinction.

“The admission of the Gentiles into the church of God, is indeed an event which the inspired psalmist predicts in a variety of passages with the greatest clearness; and which all the prophets dwell on with such distinctness, copiousness and animation, as prove beyond controversy, that this great consummation was uninterruptedly the leading object of the divine purposes and communications, to which the whole Jewish scheme was merely preparatory and subordinate. It is expedient to cite a few passages to illustrate this assertion; a few, however, will be sufficient, for its truth is so certain, it scarcely requires confirmation, and the passages establishing it are so numerous, to transcribe them all would be at once tedious and unnecessary.

“In the second psalm, which is clearly and exclusively prophetic of the Messiah, the psalmist asks, ‘Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord, and against his Anointed; saying, Let us break the bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us.’ This clear prophecy of the resistance which would be attempted, against the establishment of the Messiah’s kingdom, is followed by as clear a prediction that this opposition would be ineffectual. ‘He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh, the Lord shall have them in derision. Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath and vex them in his sore displeasure. Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion; I will declare the decree the Lord hath said unto me, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee.’ Thus, emphatically and distinctly does the inspired penman predict the divine nature and supreme exaltation of the Messiah, and he then proceeds to declare the universal extent of his dominion. ‘Ask of me and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession: thou shalt break them with a rod of iron, thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter’s vessel. Be wise now therefore, O ye kings, be instructed, ye judges of the earth: serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling: kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way; when his wrath is kindled but a little, blessed are all they that put their trust in him.’ It seems impossible to describe in clearer terms the Messiah’s reign, as not confined like the Mosaic law to a single nation, but including within its sway all nations and regions of the earth.

“In the twenty-second psalm, which describes with equal distinctness, the rejection, the sufferings, and the death of the appointed Saviour, even to the minutest a All the versions agree in translating this passage in a manner applicable to the Messiah. The Chaldee Targum uses the very word, Messiah, and the Seventy the word Christ or Anointed. See Biblia Polyglotta Walton; indeed the seventh, eighth, and twelfth verses are entirely incapable of being fully accomplished or clearly understood, except as applied to the Messiah. The only variety of any moment is in the eleventh verse, where instead of ‘kiss the Son,’ that is, as we explain it, adore him, all the versions except the Syriac read, ‘receive instruction lest the Lord be angry.’ &c. This makes the sense more clear and coherent, and is justified by a very slight change in the original. Yet Hombigant, whose authority is considerable, retains the present reading of our Hebrew text, and translates it, ‘adore the Son.’

particulars of ‘their piercing his hands and his feet, parting his garments among them, and casting lots upon his vesture.’ The prophecy goes on to declare that, notwithstanding this apparent depression, God would regard and exalt the sufferer. ‘He hath not despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted, neither hath he hid his face from him, but when he cried unto him he heard him.’ And it proceeds to declare that the final event would be, his extending universally the dominion of true religion. ‘All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee; for the kingdom is the Lord’s, and he is the governor among the nations.’

“With equal sublimity does the forty-seventh psalm call on all nations; ‘O clap your hands, all ye nations; shout unto God with the voice of triumph, for God is the king of all the earth; sing ye praises with understanding, God reigneth over the heathen, God sitteth upon the throne of his holiness; the princes of the people are gathered together unto the people of the God of Abraham; for the shields of the earth belong unto God, he is greatly exalted.’

“The sixty-seventh and the seventy-second psalms, are not less express in predicting that a period should arrive, when the dominion of the God of Israel should be acknowledged by all the nations of the earth. The seventy-second especially declares, that a Son should inherit the kingdom of David, ‘who should judge the people with righteousness, and the poor with judgment;’ and the extent and effects of his dominion are described in terms applicable only to the Messiah’s reign. ‘In his days shall the righteous flourish, and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth. He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth; they that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him, and his enemies shall lick the dust. The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents, the kings of Arabia and Seba shall offer gifts; yea all kings shall fall down before him, all nations shall serve him.’ The nature of this homage and its motives are declared to be spiritual and religious: ‘for he shall deliver the needy when he crieth, the poor also and him that hath no helper; he shall spare the poor and needy, and shall save the soul of the needy; he shall redeem their souls from deceit and violence, precious shall their blood be in his sight. His name shall endure for ever, his name shall be continued as long as the sun, and men shall be blessed in him, all nations shall call him blessed.’ Enraptured at the glorious prospect of the universal dominion of him, in whom, according to the promise made to Abraham, ‘all nations were to be blessed,’ the psalmist exclaims, ‘Blessed be the Lord God, the God of Israel, who only doeth wondrous things; and blessed be his glorious name for ever, and let the whole earth be filled with his glory: amen and amen.’

“Isaiah, the great evangelic prophet is still more explicit, in predicting the extension of the Messiah’s kingdom over the Gentile world: and that the character of the religion to be by him established, would be in the highest degree spiritual and comprehensive, free from any local or national restriction, and unincumbered with any burdensome ritual or ceremonial observances. Yet that Israel should be instrumental in forming this kingdom, and should, ultimately at least, partake of the blessings it confers. 'It shall come to pass,' says he, 'in the last (or latter) days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob, and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths. For out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem, and he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people; and they shall beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.'

b See Mat. xxvii. 46, where our Lord appropriates this psalm as directly applicable to his sufferings.

"This prediction of the extent and effects of the Messiah's reign, though exactly descriptive of the genuine character of the Christian religion, and its perpetual tendency to produce the full effect here described, yet undoubtedly peculiarly relates to a period in the history of the church of Christ not yet arrived; to the final result of a system yet in progress: which, whenever it shall be accomplished, will display in full lustre the wisdom and the mercy of the divine dispensations; but it is such a result as the continuance of the Jewish ritual, and the restrictions of the Jewish law could never produce. It therefore implies an improvement of that law, and a breaking down of that wall of partition between Jews and Gentiles, founded on the Mosaic ritual, which the Messiah, appearing as a new lawgiver, could alone have authority to remove.

"In various subsequent chapters, the prophet with still greater clearness predicts the extension of the Messiah's kingdom over the heathen world. I select only one passage; as remarkable from its connecting this prediction with the declaration of the Messiah's humiliation; and therefore proving the kingdom described by the prophet was spiritual not temporal. ² 'And now, saith the Lord, that formed me from the womb to be his servant, to bring Jacob again to him; though Israel be not gathered, yet shall I be glorious in the eyes of the Lord, and my God shall be my strength. And he said, it is a light thing that thou shouldst be my servant, to raise up the tribes of Judah, and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give thee as a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation to the ends of the earth. Thus saith the Lord, the Redeemer of Israel, and his Holy One: to him whom man despiseth, to him whom the nation abhorreth, to a servant of rulers; kings shall see and arise, princes also shall worship the name of the Lord that is faithful, and the Holy One of Israel, and he shall choose thee.'

"Thus expressly do the prophets foretell the universal extent and the spiritual nature of the Messiah's reign. Now, had no distinct and direct intimation been given, that a change must take place in the character of the religion established by divine interposition, in order to fit it for this greater extension, and more spiritual efficacy; yet the nature of the case would compel us to infer the necessity of such a change.

"A religion which was to be received in every nation and region of the globe, could not, like the Jewish law, require that all the adult males of every nation professing it, should visit the temple at Jerusalem, three times each year, to celebrate the three great festivals: this would be physically impossible. It could not enjoin the observance of those various rites, ceremonies, and institutions, which were either commemorative of events, in which the Jewish nation alone were interested; or which were calculated to separate them from all other nations, by a marked opposition of laws and manners: this would be totally unnatural and irrational, when it was predicted that the Jewish dispensation should terminate in a religious system, calculated to attract, not to repel the rest of mankind, and destined to embrace all the nations of the earth.

"It is indeed unreasonable to expect, that the Jewish lawgiver at the very moment he was delivering his law, should be directed by God to weaken the reverence of the nation for it, by declaring that its duration would be short, and its obligation transitory; or that while he was labouring to impress the necessity of avoiding all similarity of manners, principles, and religion, with the surrounding nations, he should at the same moment distinctly announce, that it was for the sake of these very nations ultimately, that the peculiar scheme of the Jewish institutions was formed, and that this scheme would terminate in the abolition of all the distinctions now established.

"We know the Jews were at that time at once dull and carnally minded, very averse to the restraints their law imposed, and above all to its prohibitions against imitating the manners of their neighbours, sharing in their festivities and idolatries, and uniting with them by intermarriages. And we can hardly conceive it possible for Moses to have expressed to them such sentiments as these, without utterly alienating them from the system he proposed, and subverting the influence of his laws, by the very manner of promulgating them: and this without the least conceivable necessity for acting so hazardous a part, or the prospect of any advantage to be derived from it.

"The divine wisdom is indeed most conspicuous in the conduct of this, as of every other part of the Jewish scheme. In the infancy of the Jewish people, while they were immature in intellect, and wedded to external objects, a law adapted to that state, and calculated at the same time to prepare for a more universal and perfect religion, was employed to control them by its restraints, while it attracted and engaged them by its ceremonies and its festivals. During this stage of their progress it was unnecessary, and would probably have been injurious, to have announced distinctly the future abrogation of the ceremonial law, and the admission of the Gentiles into the church of God. But as soon as the adherence of the people to that law was sufficiently secured by its long establishment, and by the erection of the temple, the prophets were empowered to predict this constantly intended change in the divine dispensations with perpetually increasing clearness, as that change approached.

"It ought however to be observed, that the Jewish lawgiver, to prevent all suspicion of inconsistency in the divine conduct, not only recorded the promise to Abraham and the prophecy of Jacob, but was himself empower to intimate the purpose of God, to send, at some future period, another lawgiver, authorized to promulgate a new law.

“ This seems plainly the purport of his celebrated prophecy, delivered towards the close of his own ministry. ‘ The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet from the midst of thy brethren, like unto me : unto him ye shall hearken. According to all that thou desiredst of the Lord thy God, in the day of the assembly, saying ; Let me not hear again the voice of the Lord my God, neither let me see this great fire any more, that I die not. And the Lord said unto me, they have well spoken that they have spoken, I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren like unto thee ; and I will put my words in his mouth, and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him ; and it shall come to pass that whosoever will not hearken unto my words, which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him.’ ”

“ It has been justly observed, ^a that this prophet to be like unto Moses must be a lawgiver ; for this appears the essential distinction between him and all inferior prophets. We cannot suppose the divine messenger thus pre-eminently marked out, was to do nothing more than cause the ancient statutes of his predecessor to remain as originally established ; since that essential character of similarity would thus be wanting, and no sufficient reason would appear for his mission being peculiarly predicted. And since the promulgation of a new law implies a change of the pre-existing system, the certainty of such a change being intended, may be fairly inferred from this prophecy.

“ We cannot but observe how accurately the meek and humble tenor of our Saviour’s life, and the merciful nature of all his stupendous miracles, accords with the motive assigned by the Jews, for imploring that they might not again receive the will of God in the same manner as they had done at Mount Sinai ; even the overwhelming terror with which they were then filled, ‘ Let me not hear again the voice of the Lord my God, neither let me see this great fire any more that I die not.’ God, indulgent to this weakness of human nature, approves of and grants this treaty ; and as the mode of impressing the Jewish law was suited to its nature as a system of coercion ; so the gospel scheme, which proclaimed not only ¹ ‘ glory to God in the highest,’ but ‘ on earth peace and good will to man,’ was ushered in with the most attractive manifestations of mildness and mercy, benignity and love. As Moses deserved the epithet of the ‘ meek-est of men,’ so the Son of God displayed meekness and forbearance as much greater, as the dignity from which he stooped was unspeakably exalted, his voluntary humiliation profound, and his sufferings unparalleled. How wonderful the coincidence of the prophetic description and the real history ! ² ‘ Behold,’ the evangelic prophet thus anticipates the facts, ‘ my servant whom I uphold, mind elect in whom my soul delighteth ; I have put my Spirit upon him, he shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles ; he shall not cry nor lift up, nor cause his voice to be heard in the street ; a bruised reed shall he not break, and the smoking flax shall he not quench. He shall bring forth ^b judgment unto truth ; he shall not fail nor be discouraged, till he have set judgment in the earth, and the isles shall wait for his law.’ And again, ³ ‘ He was oppressed and afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth ; he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth.’ Yet notwithstanding this humiliation, he displayed a dignity as a divine lawgiver, which no other prophet presumed to claim. ‘ He spake as one having authority,’ as exercising a right not only to explain and enforce the Mosaic laws, but to repeal, to alter, and to improve them ; as in the instance of the liberty with respect to divorce, which our Lord states Moses to have yielded to the Jews ‘ for the hardness of their hearts ;’ but which he disallows, as inconsistent with the original strictness of the marriage tie, and the perfect purity of the gospel scheme.

^a See Newton’s sixth dissertation, where it seems to me clearly proved, that this prophecy cannot be applied either to Joshua or any other successor of Moses, as judge or king ; nor yet to any single prophet or succession of prophets ; particularly from the three concluding verses of Deuteronomy, probably added by Ezra, and the history in Numbers xii. from 1 to 8. See also Mr Faber’s Horæ Mosaicæ, vol. ii. b. ii. sect. 3. ch. 3. This learned writer has very fully treated of the subject of this entire Lecture in his second book, to which I would refer my reader ; as I conceive it unnecessary for me to dwell more fully than I have done, on a subject which has been so lately and amply discussed by this learned divine.

“ And to complete the accurate accomplishment of the Mosaic prediction, how awfully is that clause fulfilled, which declares in the name of Jehovah, ‘ Whosoever will not hearken unto my words, which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him.’ The Jewish nation did not hearken to the promised prophet, and of the whole nation how awfully has it been required ? 1800 years’ dispersion and degradation has not yet closed the effect of that dreadful imprecation, ‘ his blood be on us and on our children.’ ”

“ Thus is Jesus of Nazareth, though in his divine nature infinitely superior, yet as a prophet accurately like unto Moses ; ^c in his office as legislator ; in his full participation of the divine councils and the divine influence, for ‘ God gave not the Spirit by measure unto him ;’ in the magnitude and variety of his miracles ; in the importance and permanence of that religious system which he introduced ; in the meekness of his character, and the signal punishments with which God has vindicated the authority and punished the neglect of his laws.

“ Subsequent intimations of the intended substitution of a more spiritual religion, and a more refined and perfect law, in place of the Mosaic, are frequent and clear. The fact recorded by the Jewish lawgiver, of the great patriarch Abraham having paid religious reverence to Melchizedek, ‘ the priest of the most high God ;’ receiving his blessing and paying him tithes, is alluded to by the inspired psalmist, at the very period when the Levitical priesthood and the ceremonial law were most fully established : when he describes that promised ruler whom he terms ‘ his Lord,’ declaring, ‘ the Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool ;' to whom he ascribes a distinguishing feature of his character, his possessing a priesthood similar to that of Melchizedek. 'The Lord hath sworn and will not repent, thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek.' This declaration the apostle to the Hebrews^a argues on at large, and irrefutably proves, that it implies the abrogation of the Levitical law, and the substitution of a more perfect religion. 'If' says he, 'perfection were by the Levitical priesthood, for under it the people received the law, what farther need was there that another priest should rise after the order of Melchizedek, and not be called after the order of Aaron ; for the priesthood being changed there is made of necessity a change also of the law.' For the full illustration of this argument, I refer to the learned commentators who have explained the passages in which it is contained, the conclusion thus stated by the apostle, is evidently contained in the scriptures, and is that which I wish to impress, as it proves the consistency, and illustrates the connexion, of the Mosaic and the Christian codes.

^b Lowth for the words ‘ he shall bring forth judgment unto truth,’ reads ‘ he shall publish judgment so as to establish it perfectly ;’ which gives a much more clear sense.

^c For a variety of more minute points of resemblance consult Bishop Newton’s sixth dissertation : Eusebius, Demonstratio Evangelicæ, b. i. c. 3, and b. ix. c. 11, and Collatio Philippi a Limborcum erudito Judeo, pp. 4, 31, 289, et seq. ; and Faber’s Horæ Mosaicæ, vol. ii. pp. 145 and 263.

"With equal clearness the same great apostle argues from the very nature of the Levitical law, that it was intended as the type and introduction of the Christian scheme ; and here again adduces the prophetic declaration of the inspired psalmist. 'The law having a shadow^b of good things to come, and not the very image

^a The general scope of the apostle's argument is, that Abraham acknowledged the superiority of Melchizedek ; that his order of priesthood was therefore prior and superior to the Aaronical order, and that Christ being of that order, as the psalmist prophesies, his priesthood is superior to and supersedes the Aaronical, which must therefore be changed, and with it the Levitical law. In the second verse the apostle declares Melchizedek was by interpretation king of righteousness, and after that also king of Salem, that is, 'king of peace.' In these great and peculiar characters the priesthood of Christ was pre-eminently distinguished. The apostle then in the third verse, describes the priesthood of Melchizedek by additional characters, which belong not to him as a human individual, but to the priesthood he possessed. 'In this sense he was without,' that is, independent of, 'father, without mother, without descent,' that is, independent of his descent, 'having neither beginning of days, nor end of life,' as to his priesthood, 'but being made like unto the Son of God, abideth a priest continually.' See Macknight's very clear illustration of this passage, in his view and illustration prefixed to this chapter. Like Melchizedek ; Christ is a king as well as a priest, being the Son of God and Lord of all. He is also king of righteousness, to promote which is the object of his moral government. He is also king of peace, reconciling sinners to God and to one another. Like Melchizedek Christ is not descended from parents who were priests, but derives his priesthood from the special designation of God, independent of all limitations of descent, and his priesthood is of a nature so excellent as to have no companion nor successor in it, but he liveth for ever to execute it himself. Like Melchizedek, Christ's priesthood did not, as that of the Levites, begin at thirty and end at fifty years ; but he exercised it from the first, and retains it through his whole existence ; and finally, like Melchizedek, he acts as priest, not for one particular nation, but for all the true worshippers of God.

of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect ; for then would they not have ceased to be offered, because that the worshippers once purged, should have had no more conscience of sins. But in those sacrifices there is a remembrance again made of sins every year ; for it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins. Wherefore when he, (the promised Redeemer predicted by the psalmist in the fortieth psalm,) cometh into the world, he saith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body thou hast prepared me ; in burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sins, thou hast had no pleasure. Then said I, lo I come, (in the volume of the book it is written of me) to do thy will, O God. Above when he said, sacrifice and offering, and burnt-offerings, and offering for sin thou wouldest not, neither hadst thou pleasure therein (which are offered by the law). Then he said, lo I come to do thy will, O God ; he taketh away the first that he may establish the second ; by the which will we are sanctioned, through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all.'

"The prophet Jeremiah, who is also appealed to by the great apostle of the Gentiles, foretells the propagation of a pure and spiritual religion, the abolition of legal ordinances, the call of the Gentiles, and the final restoration of Israel. Calling upon 'back-sliding Israel' to return from her transgressions and idolatries. The prophet encourages their repentance by declaring, 'I will give you pastors according to mine heart, which shall feed you with knowledge and understanding ; and it shall come to pass when ye be multiplied and increased in the land, in those days, saith the Lord, they shall say no more, the ark of the covenant of the Lord, neither shall it come to mind, neither shall they remember it, neither shall they visit it, neither shall that be done any more. At that time they shall call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord, and all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the Lord, to Jerusalem ; neither shall they walk any more after the imagination of their evil heart. In those days the house of Judah shall walk with the house of Israel ; and they shall come together out of the land of the north, to the land that I have given for an inheritance to their fathers.' And still more expressly in a subsequent chapter, 'Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah ; not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers, in the day that I took them by the hand, to bring them out of the land of Egypt ; which my covenant they brake, although I was an husband unto them, saith the Lord. But this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel, after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and will be their God, and they shall be my people. And they shall teach no more every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, know ye the Lord, for they shall all know me, from the least of them to the greatest of them, saith the Lord, for I will forgive their iniquity, and will remember their sin no more.' According to this prediction the ancient Levitical covenant was to be dissolved, and the ordinances of Moses to be succeeded by a law not in any degree typical, but entirely promotive of real virtue; not requiring ceremonies to preserve it, but in its very essence practical and influential, regulating the temper and written in the heart."

c. 17.) The apostle means to illustrate the imperfection of the law, that it could not bring men to perfection, that the good things it promised were but a shadow of the great realities secured by Christ, the veriest sketch or outline, in comparison of the perfect and exact picture. See Dodd, Macknight, Heylin, and Wolfius on Heb. x. 1. and Suicer's Thesaurus, and Parkhurst on the word Εικων. It is necessary to remark, that in the words 'a body hast thou prepared me,' the apostle follows the Septuagint, and not the Hebrew text as it now stands. But for the probability of a corruption in the Hebrew text, consult Dr Thomas Randolph's comparison of the citations in the New Testament, with the Hebrew and the Septuagint, No. 159, p. 22 and 44, and the authors by him referred to.

"LET us next proceed to evince, that as the law and the prophets were thus avowedly designed to predict and introduce the gospel of Christ; so they did in fact accomplish this design, their pre-existence being indispensably necessary to prepare for the reception of that gospel, and in a variety of ways illustrating its importance and facilitating its promulgation.

"To place this conclusion in a clear light, let us reflect what would probably have been the situation of mankind as to religion and morality, if no such nation or system as the Jewish had existed, before the appearance of our Lord. It seems certain that the whole world would have been sunk in the most gross idolatry, and an almost total ignorance of the principles of natural religion. The very idea of the Supreme Creator and Ruler of the universe would have been obliterated from the minds of men; or at most thought of only by a few speculative philosophers, who had never ventured to inculcate the necessity of confining adoration to the one true God, or openly to condemn the absurdities and profanations of idolatry, which would have prevailed over the world, uncensured, we may almost say unsuspected of error or depravity; since no purer system would have existed, to which an appeal might have been made, as clearly true, or supported by any acknowledged authority.

"In such a state of religious blindness, all expectations of a future retribution would have appeared ridiculous or incredible, from the falsehoods and extravagancies with which that opinion had been universally encumbered and disgraced. The evidence from prophecy could not have existed; and any appeal to miracles would have been disregarded or discredited, from the multitude of lying wonders which had usurped that name, without a single instance of any plainly supernatural interposition.

"Had the world been permitted to sink thus universally into ignorance, idolatry, and depravity; almost deprived of all ideas of true religion, and totally estranged from every feeling of pure morality; without any fixed principles to recur to on these subjects, nay almost without a language in which to speak of them: it seems nearly impossible to conceive any means, by which mankind could have been instructed or reformed, without utterly subverting the whole course of nature, and forcibly controlling the moral character of man. Darkness would have overspread the earth and thick darkness the nations; and amidst this universal moral chaos, no spot could have been found, on which the foundation of the church of God could have been laid; no nation, or tribe, or family, who, if the standard of true religion were reared, could be expected to rally round it and support the sacred cause.

"A degeneracy so fatal and irremediable was effectually prevented by the operation of the Jewish scheme. The world was rapidly sinking into idolatry with all its profanations and crimes, the pure principles of that patriarchal religion, which had originally enlightened mankind, were preserved in the family of Abraham by the transmission of parental instruction, until that family became a nation: that then this nation, which would otherwise have been hurried away by the resistless torrent of universal corruption, was placed under the immediate government of Jehovah, as their national Lord and King; rescued from Egypt and settled in Canaan, by a series of miraculous interpositions, which exhibited an irrefragable proof of the power, the providence, and the majesty of the true God, as well as the impotence and nullity of those base idols, who usurped his honour in a deluded world.

"To preserve this nation as a lasting monument of the divine supremacy, and a permanent asylum, where the truths of religion and the principles of morals might take refuge, and be preserved for a more favourable period, when their salutary influence might be again extended to all mankind with effect by the promised Messiah, 'in whom all nations were to be blessed,' the Mosaic law was given, which in this infancy of human reason and human virtue, was to act as the 'schoolmaster to bring men to Christ;' a task which it effected by a variety of means which can here be only briefly hinted at.

"First, it maintained the radical principles of true theology, while it clothed them in such a form, and promulgated them in such circumstances, as without detracting in the slightest particular from their purity and truth, rendered them interesting and attractive to a nation, which could scarcely have been induced to attend to any mere abstract doctrines concerning the being and attributes of the Deity, if he had not authorized them to look up to him as their peculiar, national, and guardian God.

"The same law inculcated the principles of pure morality, with a similar attention to the feelings and the character of the Jewish nation; enforcing the entire system by temporal sanctions, which alone were capable of influencing a people, short-sighted, incredulous, attached to present objects, and habituated from the example of the rest of mankind, to consider temporal prosperity and success as the criterion of the power and fidelity of that God, who allowed them to consider him as their national and peculiar Lord and King.

"Such a system could be carried into effect, only by a particular providence proportioning the visible prosperity both of the state and of individuals, to their obedience to the divine law. The continued display of this wonderful providential interference, supplied a perpetually increasing proof of the power, the justice, and the mercy of Jehovah, and exhibited the most awful and instructive examples to mankind, of the general conduct of God's moral government.

"The Mosaic law not only promulgated a system of true religion and pure morality, and supported that system by the most powerful sanctions; but it guarded it from the contagion of that idolatry and vice which universally prevailed, by a corresponding system of peculiar laws and manners, rites and ceremonies, calculated to form a barrier between the chosen people and the idolatrous world: while by the multitude of its rites, the magnificence, first of the sanctuary, and afterwards of the temple, the solemnity and attraction of its festivals, and finally by the influence of the priests and Levites, who were set apart as the public instructors of the nation in morals and religion, it supplied the means of counteracting the attractions of idolatry.

“Further, the Mosaic institution combining the civil government, the national religion, the tenure of private property, and the regulations of domestic life in one connected scheme; all whose parts tended to one object, the permanence of the entire system: it effectually secured that object, notwithstanding the crimes and errors of the chosen people, their idolatries and apostasies both private and public, which no system of moral government could totally prevent; amidst the powerful temptations from without, and the wrong propensities from within, necessarily arising from the general state of the world, and the peculiar character, of the Jewish people, during the entire period from Moses to Christ.

“In truth, the adherence of the Jewish nation to their law from its delivery to this hour, a period of near 3300 years, is an event so unparalleled in the history of mankind, particularly when we consider the calamitous circumstances of the Jews for the last 1750 years, as seems sufficient, even if considered singly, to prove the reality of a providential interposition, unprecedented in the history of any other nation. But when we reflect that the chastisements which should attend the misconduct of the Jews, were distinctly announced by their lawgiver, the preservation of their nation as a peculiar people, predicted by him, may the circumstances of their present dispersion not obscurely sketched out; such a prophecy, decidedly antecedent by ages to the events which it predicts, and predicting events which as nothing but an immediate and peculiar interposition of Providence could bring about, so nothing but a divine sagacity could foresee; seems to supply a decisive proof of the divine original of the Jewish scheme.

“But we are still to view this scheme in another light clearly illustrative of its divine original, as introductory to the Gospel. And here we must observe, that the chief rites and festivals of the Mosaic ritual were not only calculated to commemorate the leading interpositions of God, in the deliverance and settlement of the nation, and to exclude the infection of idolatry; but that they had a prospective signification, and were clearly ^a typical and figurative of the Messiah's character and kingdom.

“This typical character of the ritual law has been illustrated by so many eminent writers, and above all has been so clearly established by the great apostle of the Gentiles, in the epistle to the Hebrews, that I need only touch on it; and observe, that the whole system of bloody sacrifices, which had plainly preceded the Mosaic institutions, and leads us, when tracing its origin to the very earliest revelations of God to man; as it served to awaken in the minds of the offerers a strong sense of the danger of sin, and the punishment it merited even unto death; so it most evidently prefigured that great sacrifice, by which Christians ‘are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all.’

“This prefiguration of the Messiah is peculiarly remarkable in the ceremonies observed in the great day of atonement, when the high priest entered once a year into the holy of holies, ‘not without blood, which he offered for himself and for the errors of the people, being,’ says the apostle to the Hebrews, ‘the figure of him, who by his own blood entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us,’ a redemption which, as the apostle explains, essentially implies ‘a purification of the conscience from dead works to serve the living God.’

“Of the three great festivals of the Jewish law, two, the passover and the feast of pentecost, as they were commemorative of the deliverance from Egypt, and the promulgation of the law on Sinai; so were they as clearly figurative of the sacrifice of Christ and the effusion of the Spirit by which the gospel was disseminated over the world.^b

^b The analogy between the paschal sacrifice and our Lord's suffering, between the delivery of the law and the effusion of the Holy Spirit, has been remarked from the earliest period of the gospel. But it has not, as far as I can recollect, been noticed by any, that our not having as yet discovered any event in the history of Christianity, corresponding to that commemorated in the Feast of Tabernacles, or any Christian festival similar to that feast; instead of supplying an instance of dissimilitude between the two systems, strongly confirms their perfect analogy, when we consider the further progress of the gospel, which the word of prophecy leads us to expect. This observation has been suggested to me by my learned friend the Rev. Dr Elrington, late fellow of Trinity College, Dublin; and who, in the course of sermons he preached and published as Donnellan's Lecturer, in the year 1796, has so ably illustrated the truth of the gospel miracles, and exposed the sophistry of Hume. As his ideas on the present topic appear to me both original and just, I annex his own statement of them. “That the Jews annually observed three great festivals at Jerusalem, and that two of them, the passover and the feast of pentecost, had a reference to events, which were to happen under the Christian dispensation, is well known. Hence we are led to consider, whether the third solemnity was of a similar nature and has received a similar completion. This was the feast of tabernacles, beginning on the fifteenth day of the seventh month; when for seven days all that were Israelites born were to dwell in booths in remembrance of their dwelling in booths when they were brought out of the land of Egypt, and on the eighth day to return to their houses, celebrating it with great rejoicings, Lev. xxiii. 34—36, 42, 43. Now it is evident that no circumstance attending the establishment of Christianity, had any resemblance to the journey through the wilderness, and the dwelling there under tents; nor has any attempt, I believe, been made, to prove a similarity of the sort. We must therefore either admit, that this feast of tabernacles differs from the others in having no prospective reference; or we must seek in some future event its completion or antitype. And it will probably incline us to this latter opinion, when we consider, that the Jews will undoubtedly be brought back to Judea when the fullness of the Gentiles shall be come in; and if we suppose the season of the feast of tabernacles, to coincide with that of their future return, as it appears to have done with their return from the Babylonish captivity, we shall have a fulfilment of the three Jewish festivals completed finally in the conversion of the Jews to Christianity; which, with their return to their own land, will

^a This typical significance of Judaism has been fully and learnedly expounded by the Rev. Samuel Mather, a clergyman of Dublin, in a quarto volume published in 1683, entitled the Figures and Types of the Old Testament, &c. Consult particularly the Gospel of the Perpetual Types, pp. 208—218, also the Gospel of the Sacrifices and Offerings, pp. 232—254, and the Gospel of the Jewish Festivals, from pp. 520—545; see also the learned Mr Faber's Horæ Mosaicæ, b. ii. sect. 2, on the Connection between Judaism and Christianity by Means of Types, vol. ii. pp. 40—173; also the learned Outram on Sacrifice, particularly b. i. c. 18, and b. ii. c. 7: also Hartley on the Truth of Christianity, propos. 30—33.

“The Jewish law not only prepared for the introduction of the gospel, by its types and prophecies, and by preserving the principles of sound theology and pure morals; which without it would probably have been almost irrecoverably banished from the earth. But by the strictness of its moral prohibitions, and its denunciations of God’s displeasure against sin, it probed and exposed the moral maladies of man. It proved to him by decisive experience, his proneness to violate the commands of his God, even when most distinctly promulgated, and his culpable neglect of duties of the most obvious necessity; so that he could not but acknowledge how infinitely improbable it was, that he could by his own unassisted strength escape sin; and that consequently far from being able to claim eternal happiness, as a reward which human merit might challenge from divine justice, he was liable to condemnation and punishment.

“Thus the law prepared men to hail with fervent gratitude the glad tidings of the gospel of peace, which offers the aid of the Divine Spirit, to assist the weakness of those who will humbly implore and diligently improve it; and proclaim free pardon to all who, repenting of their sins, and acknowledging their own inability to escape from their power, or expiate their guilt, embrace with faith and joy those gracious terms of pardon and acceptance, offered by the mediation of that Jesus, who was ¹ ‘delivered for their offences, and raised again for their justification; who still liveth to make intercession for us: thus destroying the power of death, and ² ‘bringing life and immortality to light.’ Not that in the gospel the doctrine of a resurrection and a future retribution was first promulgated, for they were intimated by Moses and clearly taught by the prophets, but because the means ^a furnish a perpetual cause for thanksgiving and religious observance. Of the reference of this festival to the final restoration of the Jews, some of their traditions and practices may perhaps afford a further confirmation. It was their custom on the last day of the feast, to bring water from the fountain of Siloah, which the priest poured on the altar, singing the words of Isaiah, (xii. 3.) ‘With joy shall ye draw water from the fountain of salvation?’ which words the Targum interprets, ‘With joy shall ye receive a new doctrine from the elect of the just;’ and they appear, from the preceding chapter, to relate to the final restoration of the Jews. The feast itself was also called Hosanna, save we beseech thee; and was the time when our Lord spoke the remarkable words mentioned in St John (vii. 37, 38,) marking the relation which the ceremony of pouring out the water bore to his ministry. And amongst the traditions of the Jews we find that the defeat of Gog and Magog shall fall out upon the feast of tabernacles, or that the consequent seven months’ cleansing of the land (Ezek. xxxix. 12.) shall terminate at that period; and there seems little reason to doubt the reference of that prophecy to the final restoration of the Jews.

^a I am aware that commentators in general interpret this verse solely of the gospel’s bringing to light the doctrine of life and immortality; and Warburton advances as an irrefutable argument, that as it was reserved to be so brought to light by the gospel, it must have been unknown under the Old Testament. Now as I think I have proved it was not unknown under the Old Testament, it follows it was not reserved to be brought to light by the gospel alone. Undoubtedly where the Jewish religion was unknown, the doctrine was first clearly promulgated by the gospel, and even amongst the Jews it was supported by such additional miracles and examples, as threw round it a brightness of conviction, compared with which, the assent previously yielded to it was doubtful and dim. So that this expression may bear the sense usually given it, without supporting the inference which Warburton would deduce from it. But I cannot but think the apostle meant to express much more than a bare promulgation of the doctrine of life and immortality. He encourages his beloved son in the of securing life and immortality were then first clearly and satisfactorily ascertained, and placed within the reach of all who would embrace the gracious offers of pardon and mercy held out by the Redeemer of man.

“Such is the strict unity of design and the accurate harmony of parts, between the Jewish and the Christian schemes, so clearly establishing their common and heavenly original. As the period approached when the promised Messiah was to appear, we have seen this unity and harmony display itself in more illustrious characters. The visible and immediate interference of Providence in rewarding virtue and punishing vice, seems to have been gradually withdrawn from amongst the Jews after the Babylonish captivity; and the expectations of a future retribution, now plainly and authoritatively established by their sacred writers, left to operate in its room; so that at the time of our Lord’s appearance, these expectations were a leading article of the popular creed: and when promulgated anew with additional miracles, to impress them on mankind in general, found amongst the Jews minds prepared to receive them, wherever worldly views or vicious propensities did not resist and defeat the influence of truth.

gospel, to perseverance in the faith, for which he himself cheerfully sustained persecution and bonds; and for this purpose he describes in the strongest terms the blessedness of a true Christian’s temper, views, and hopes. ‘God,’ says he, ‘hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind,’ that is, strength to resist evil, derived from the assistance of the Holy Spirit; accompanied with a sincere and active love of God, and a just discrimination of things, which clearly recognizes the superiority of future and heavenly objects above present and sensual; thus comprehensively describing a perfect Christian; whose will is rectified, whose affections are purified, and whose understanding is spiritually enlightened. To attain or preserve such a character is the most glorious object of human ambition; ‘Be not thou therefore,’ says the apostle, ‘ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner; but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel, according to the power of God, who hath saved and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began; but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel, wherunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles.’ Now is it not evident, that the apostle here means to unfold the whole scheme of the gospel, the eternal purpose of God to admit in the fulness of time the Gentiles into his church, notwithstanding their antecedent idolatries and crimes; the abolition of death, by depriving it of its terrors and its sting, and redeeming men from the power of death eternal; and aid to secure eternal life, arising from that spirit of power and love and religious wisdom, with which divine grace supplies the true Christian. It is not then the simple promulgation of the doctrine of a future life, which the apostle here understands; but a promulgation of it, accompanied with such clear instruction how to seek, and such merciful assistance to obtain life and immortality, as were now first brought to light by the gospel. Thus, to adopt the words of the pious Doddridge, ‘hath Jesus Christ in effect abolished death, hath deposed it from its tyrannical empire, and thrown a light on the important doctrine of life and immortality by the gospel, which gives us a more express assurance and a more lively view of it, than any former dispensation had ever done or could possibly do.’ See also Parkhurst’s exposition of this passage as quoted by Dodd in locum: Bishop Sherlock’s opinion in opposition to Warburton, illustrated and vindicated by Dr Parry, in his defence of the bishop of London: and the judicious Benson in his paraphrase and notes on this passage, who admits ‘the Jews had expectations of a resurrection even before the coming of our Saviour, and refers to Matt. xxii. 32, and Dan. xii. 2; but the more full and clear discovery is owing to the Christian revelation.’

“ Thus also the gracious intention of Providence, to admit the heathen world into the church, and for this purpose abrogate that ritual which formed the wall of separation excluding them, was gradually more plainly notified; until by the last prophets it was distinctly announced; and as we perceive, clearly understood by all, whom national pride and prejudice did not induce to close their eyes against the light. Of this we find signal instances in John the Baptist and the devout Cornelius; and certainly there were multitudes of others amongst the Jews and Gentiles, who like them looked for salvation by the appearance of that Messiah, ‘ who was to be a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel;’ and we know that the whole nation of the Samaritans acknowledged the same truth.

“ As this glorious era drew near, we see various events crowding on our observation preparatory to its arrival; the translation of the Jewish scriptures into Greek; the general expectation of a great king to arise in Judea, diffused over the East; the increasing light of philosophy; the extension of the Roman empire; all combine to prepare for and facilitate the promulgation of the gospel. But still the Jews are the more immediate instruments whom God meant to employ in effecting his gracious purposes; and accordingly we find that, after the Babylonish captivity, they are rapidly prepared to act their part in the great and important change which now approached.

“ It is certain that in the interval between the Babylonish captivity and the advent of the Messiah, the Jews were gradually settled and multiplied, not only in Egypt, but in all Asia, Greece, Italy, and the western regions of Europe. The Jewish historian¹ cites numerous decrees of the magistrates, the senate, and the emperors of Rome, encouraging and protecting them. Julius Cæsar ordered that tables of brass, containing his decrees to this effect, should be fixed in the capitol, and communicated to the quæstors and prætors where the Jews resided. We find similar decrees formed by, or directed to the governors and people of Ephesus, Sardis, and Miletus, Athens and Pergamus, as well as the islands of the Ægean Sea; and we have the most decided classical authorities,² to prove the multitude of the Jews at Rome, the number of their proselytes, and the popularity of their opinions.

“ As the Jews were thus dispersed and situated, so that they might most generally spread their opinions, there is also reason to believe that their general character and conduct, especially in heathen countries, were such as to recommend them; they seem in general to have been humble and rational, peaceable and industrious. “ Natural justice,” says their historian, “ is most to the advantage of all men equally, Greeks and barbarians, to which our laws have the greatest regard; and thereby render us, if we abide in them after a pure manner, benevolent and friendly to all men; on which account we have reason to expect the like return from others, and to inform them that they ought not to esteem difference of positive institutions, a sufficient cause of alienation, but join with us in the pursuit of virtue and probity.”

“ By this providential distribution and settlement of the Jews, in almost every part of the civilized world; they were every where to be found carrying with them their law and their prophets, establishing their synagogues, celebrating their sabbaths, bearing constant testimony to the unity, the supremacy, and the providence of God, in opposition to pagan superstition and idolatry; and numbers of them declaring their firm belief in a future state of retribution; while all maintained a constant connexion with Jerusalem, attended there at the three great festivals, whenever it was practicable, sent thither their pious and charitable contributions, and universally gloried in the expectation of that Messiah, ‘ who was to be a light to lighten the Gentiles,’ as well as ‘ the glory of his people Israel.’

“ The influence of such a preparation for the reception and diffusion of the gospel, must have been great and salutary; every where its preachers found synagogues, where the law and the prophets were expounded each sabbath; every where they found not only Jews, but proselytes of righteousness, who, without binding themselves under the heavy yoke of the Mosaic ritual, acknowledged the great truths of natural religion, and complied with the sacred precepts of the moral law; every where some, like the officer² of Candace queen of Ethiopia, studied the scriptures; others there were like the devout Cornelius,³ ‘ who feared God with all his house, and gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God always.’ Hence the preachers of Christianity almost every where instantly found hearers who could understand and feel their addresses. Thus at Antioch in Pisidia, Paul and Barnabas⁴ were invited to preach by the rulers of the synagogue; and after the Jews went out of it, ‘ the Gentiles and religious proselytes besought that these words might be preached to them the next sabbath: and on that day came almost the whole city together to hear the word of God.’ Thus also at Iconium,⁵ when these apostles went to the synagogue, they found an audience not only of Jews but of Gentiles, who were undoubtedly such proselytes, and ‘ when they had preached, a multitude both of Jews and Greeks believed.’ Thus again at Thessalonica,⁶ ‘ of the Jews some believed, and of the devout Greeks a great multitude, and of the chief women not a few.’ And finally we see that⁷ at Jerusalem were dwelling Jews, devout men out of every nation under heaven; who were attracted by the very first sound of the gospel of Christ, for when the apostles ‘ were filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance, the multitude came together, and were confounded, because every man heard them speak in his own language; Parthians and Medes, and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, and Judea, and Cappadocia, in Pontus and Asia, Phrygia and Paumphyia, in Egypt and in the parts of Libya about Cyrene, and strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes, Cretes and Arabians, exclaimed, we do hear them speak in our tongues the wonderful works of God.⁷

“Of this assembly, which may be considered as a collective representation of all the nations of the earth, three thousand souls converted on this memorable day, and at least two thousand¹ on a second illustrious miracle within a few days after, formed a body of missionaries, to bear to their respective countries the tidings of the appearance of that promised Messiah, ‘in whom all the kindreds of the earth were to be blessed;’ a promise which in these signal instances began to be so conspicuously verified.

“The rejection of Christianity by the great bulk of the Jewish nation, assuredly forms no valid objection to the connexion and consistency of the law and the gospel. This rejection was not² obscurely intimated by the prophets, was expressly³ predicted by our Lord; and was⁴ the natural consequence of that national ambition, that carnal and worldly temper, which induced the great bulk of the Jewish people to misunderstand and misinterpret the prophecies; by directing their attention exclusively to those predictions, which speak of the supremacy and extent of the Messiah’s kingdom, and which they understood of a temporal instead of a spiritual reign, by which the Jewish nation, as they vainly imagined, was to be rescued from the Roman yoke, and exalted to the dominion of the world; while they wilfully overlooked the equally clear predictions of the same Messiah’s humiliation and sufferings, and the express declarations, that the new dispensation should not be confined to one chosen people, like the old; but should embrace without distinction all nations, who, according to the original promise of God to the great patriarch Abraham, were to ‘be blessed in his seed.’ But the true interpretation and application of the prophecies is not obscured, or the proof of divine foreknowledge, and co-operation in the establishment of the gospel arising from them subverted by the errors or the obstinacy of the Jews. The prophecies are open to our inspection as well as theirs; and when by combining the temporal humiliation with the spiritual dominion of the Messiah, both which the gospel attests, we perceive all the predictions respecting him accomplished, however apparently opposite; the proof thence resulting is the more decisive as it was more difficult for mere human sagacity to anticipate, or mere human agency to produce so extraordinary a coincidence.

“The rejection of the gospel by the Jews is indeed so far from weakening, that it greatly confirms the proof from prophecy, by establishing the authenticity and uncorruptedness of these great records of divine truth, of which the Jews are unsuspected, because hostile vouchers. Had their nation universally or generally embraced the gospel at its first publication, the sceptic might with some plausibility allege, that the prophecies might have been fabricated or altered to fit them to the events; the contrary is now certain. And so great is the importance of this circumstance, as appears to me, to establish the truth of Christianity; that I firmly believe it to be one of the great causes, why the national conversion of the Jews is delayed⁴ ‘until the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in.’ They are to continue the guardians of the prophetic records, till these shall have had their contents examined, and their application ascertained, by every other nation in the world.

“A little reflection will also evince, that the rejection of Christianity by the Jewish nation, does not subvert, but on the contrary confirms the certainty of the miracles recorded in the gospel history. It not only appears from that history,⁵ but from the admission⁶ of the Jews themselves, that the cotemporaries of these miracles did not deny their performance, but on the contrary admitted it; though they would not upon their evidence embrace the gospel, because they conceived this contrary to the Mosaic law, whose obligation their carnal and ambitious views led them to believe was eternal, and which they conceived no miracles could prove was abrogated. They therefore contented themselves with asserting, that the miracles of Christ and his apostles must be ascribed to magical influence, diabolical agency, or the mysterious potency of the ineffable name of God, which they conceived our Lord had learned to pronounce. But these opinions of the Jews affect not the reality or greatness of the gospel miracles: we can judge as clearly as they could possibly do, whether the scriptures describe the Mosaic law as of strictly eternal obligation, or on the contrary represent it as designed to introduce a more perfect and universal religion; and our improved reason and philosophic knowledge reject without hesitation the wild and absurd causes to which they imputed works, which the fair and candid reasoners amongst themselves confessed, ‘no man could do except God was with him.’

“In truth the hostility of the Jewish nation to Christianity from the first, confirms the truth of the gospel miracles. Had the Jews been universally or even generally converted by them, the sceptic might argue with some appearance of probability, that the facts had been invented or exaggerated to gratify the national propensity, credited without examination or proof, and all inquiry into them checked at the only period when inquiry could have detected imposition. On the contrary, we are now certain, that the gospel miracles were wrought in the presence of enemies, and thus subjected to the severest scrutiny, and that they carried with them conviction to multitudes, notwithstanding the fiercest opposition which national prejudice, bigotry, and vice could excite, and the strictest research which could be formed by the most vigilant hostility.

of the gospel by the Jews, was the deplorably vicious and depraved character of the nation at large, ¹ so strongly attested by their own historian, and incontrovertibly established by the facts which he relates. And this depravity, it may be said, disproves every thing I have adduced to show, that Judaism was designed or adapted to prepare for the reception of the gospel. But let it be remembered, that notwithstanding this allowed depravity of the Jews in general, it has been proved that amongst them were preserved the principles of true theology and pure morals, which the gospel adopts, and which were banished from all mankind beside. Let it be remembered, that amongst them and the various descriptions of persons connected with and enlightened by their religion, the gospel found its first teachers and hearers, its first converts and missionaries; and that the noblest and purest principles of piety adorned these great instruments, employed by God for dispensing his mercies to mankind; instruments which through every other region of the world would have been sought in vain. Finally, let us recollect the great probability, that the gospel attracted, and as it were detached from the Jewish nation every thing pure and pious, candid and virtuous; and left behind the dregs and dross alone, the hypocritical Pharisees, the epicurean Sadducees, the worldly-minded Herodians, the fierce zealots, the depraved and seditious rabble. Thus, according to the intimation of its divine founder, sifting the chaff from the wheat, separating the tares from the good seed, ² 'gathering the one into his barn, and consuming the other with fire unquenchable.'

"In truth, after the Jewish nation had obstinately rejected the Messiah, rebelled against his authority, and in opposition to his religion maintained, that the perpetual observance of the Mosaic ritual was an indispensable condition of divine acceptance, and their own nation exclusively the chosen people of God. It was indispensably necessary to put an end to their national establishment, and destroy that temple with which the observance of their ritual was essentially connected; in order to maintain the universal sovereignty of the Messiah, in opposition to their rebellion, as well as to prevent all possibility of corrupting Christianity by the adoption of their errors, and of their now burdensome because useless ceremonies. Whoever observes the struggles of the Judaizing Christians, thus to encumber the religion of Christ, and the extreme difficulty with which their efforts were resisted, even by direct revelation, and apostolic authority, in the very first and purest era of the church, will easily perceive the necessity of this precaution, to preserve the purity, and extend the dominion of the gospel; and that in this view, ³ 'through the fall of the Jews salvation is come unto the Gentiles.'"—Graves' Lectures on the Pentateuch.

denominated Jews, who are scattered among the various nations of the earth. When we inquire into the reason of these denominations, we find the former are so called from their belief in, and adherence to, a divine teacher, called Christ; and the latter, from their being the descendants of Judah, one of the twelve patriarchs, sprung from Jacob. The former maintain certain opinions which were taught by Christ; they observe certain rites appointed by him; and they meet on the first day of the week to worship the Deity by prayer and praise. They have among them written books which they account sacred; and one part of their worship is, for a person properly qualified to read some portion of these books, and to explain to them the various duties which man owes to his Creator, himself, and his neighbour.

"In every country where Christians are numerous, they erect edifices for the purpose of divine worship; and where they are few, they assemble in some house with the same design. For public worship is essential to Christianity; and one day in seven has been, and is now, kept sacred, and spent in the exercises of devotion. When we inquire into its origin, the most authentic history carries us back near eighteen centuries; and, from the testimony of those who then lived, we are sure that there were persons at that period denominated Christians, and that they had among them the same sacred books which they now have, and that they observed the same rites, and believed the same doctrines. Happily we have not only the testimony of Christian writers, but of polytheists who were the avowed enemies of Christianity.

"Tacitus, writing the life of Nero, who set the city of Rome on fire, the report of which rendered him odious, tells us, that Nero imputed it to a set of people called Christians. The founder of that name was Christ, who suffered death in the reign of Tiberius, under his procurator Pontius Pilate. This pernicious superstition, thus checked for a while, broke out again; and spread not only over Judea, where the evil originated, but through Rome also, whither every thing bad upon earth finds its way and is practised. Some, who confessed their sect, were first seized, and afterwards, by their information, a vast multitude were apprehended, who were convicted, not so much of the crime of burning Rome, as of hatred to mankind. Their sufferings at their execution were aggravated by insult and mockery; for some were disguised in the skins of wild beasts and worried to death by dogs; some were crucified; and others were wrapt up in pitched shirts, and set on fire when the day closed, that they might serve as lights to illuminate the night.

"This testimony proves, first, that the founder of Christianity was put to death: secondly, that, in the same country in which he was put to death, the religion, after a short check, broke out and spread: and, thirdly, that it so spread that, within thirty-four years from the author's death, a very great number of Christians were found at Rome. This testimony from a heathen historian establishes the leading facts of the Christian records. His opinion of this sect is what we might expect from his habits and principles. Suetonius gives the same account of the sufferings of Christians at that period.

"On examining the books held as sacred and divine by Christians, we find that four of the disciples of Christ wrote narratives of his life. They differ in their manner, style, and in the order they observe, but agree in a most wonderful manner as to the facts they record. They write like persons who had heard and seen what they relate, or who had received information from such as had; and through the whole of their narratives an artless simplicity prevails which strongly prepossesses the mind in favour of their veracity. Another book contains a history of the persecutions of Christians, and the progress of Christianity, during a period of about thirty years. The remaining books are letters directed to different Christian societies; and were evidently written on particular occasions, either to oppose some error or to explain and enforce some part of Christian truth. One book is so peculiar in its style, imagery, and design, that it has been considered prophetic, and as emblematically setting forth the events, whether adverse or prosperous, of the Christian church till the consummation of all things.

“It is generally admitted that Matthew wrote his gospel for the use of the church in Jerusalem, and of the Jews in Palestine. According to the testimony of antiquity, it was written in Hebrew,^a or the language the Jews then spoke; and of course it would be accessible to the whole Jewish nation. The time when this gospel was composed has not been precisely ascertained. Dr H. Owen thought that it was written as early as Anno Domini 39 or 40, or about six years after our Lord’s ascension. Lardner, however, supposes it was not written till the year 64. It is most probable that Matthew wrote his gospel while Peter and Mark were in the northern part of the Lesser Asia, which might be while Paul was preaching in Greece, about the year 54. Peter, we know, was at Antioch about this period; and might with Mark thence go to Pontus and Bithynia.

“On the establishment of Christian societies beyond the boundaries of Judea, it is natural to suppose that an authentic narrative would be given in Greek, the language then most generally spoken. Accordingly, the gospel of Mark is said to have been the second narrative presented to the church; but when published is uncertain. He was the companion and attendant of Peter, as the Christian fathers relate: and, with the greatest probability, is supposed to be the person he mentions in his first epistle, chap. v. 3, and calls his son.

“It is not improbable that, while Paul was at Rome, Peter again visited Antioch, and afterwards, the churches in Pontus, Galatia, &c.; and Mark, his convert and attendant, as the fathers relate, might write his gospel for the use of those churches; and as it would have the approbation of Peter, it would often be called the gospel of Peter, as in fact it was called; Peter afterwards going to Rome, and communicating a copy of Mark’s gospel to that church, the tradition might arise that it was written for that church. After weighing the statements of the fathers and the opinions of learned men, this seems the most probable hypothesis.

“The evangelist Luke has given to the church the fullest history of its founder and head. There is no ground for doubt but that he is the person who accompanied Paul, and who wrote afterwards the Acts of the Apostles. Paul has mentioned him with the highest respect in his epistles.¹ From Acts, it appears that he regularly attended Paul from his voyage into Macedonia till he was carried prisoner to Rome, whither the evangelist also went with him. Compare Acts xx. 5, where Luke speaks of himself as with Paul, and he ever after uses the same mode of speaking.

“The style of Luke proves that he was a Jew by descent; and most probably one early converted to the faith. It does not appear, from what he says, that he had personally seen Christ, but had derived his knowledge from the apostles, who had been eye and ear witnesses of what our Lord did and taught; and especially from Paul, to whom the gospel had been communicated by special revelation.² Dr Campbell thinks it highly probable that he was a native of Antioch, the capital of Syria, where the Greek language had been long cultivated, and was generally spoken by the higher classes. If Mark wrote his gospel while Paul was a prisoner at Rome, whither Luke had accompanied him, and where he continued till the release of the apostle, as is nearly certain from Paul’s mentioning him in the epistles which he there wrote,³ he could not, I think, have written his gospel sooner than a. d. 63, and most probably in Greece.

“It has been observed that the language of Luke is more pure and copious, and there is more of composition in his sentences than in those of the other evangelists. From his profession as a physician, he might have received a superior education; and from his intercourse with men might have derived his superior accomplishments in the Greek language. In relating the same facts which Matthew and Mark had related, he uses, in some instances, the same expressions, and in others there is but little variation. From him we learn whatever relates to the birth of John the Baptist, the annunciation, and other important circumstances concerning the nativity of the Messiah; the occasion of Joseph’s being then in Bethlehem; the vision granted the shepherds; the early testimony of Simeon and Anna; the wonderful manifestation of our Lord’s proficiency in knowledge when only twelve years old; his age at the commencement of his ministry, connected with the year of the reigning emperor.⁴

“He has given us also an account of several memorable incidents and cures which had been overlooked by the rest; the conversion of Zaccheus the publican; the cure of the crooked woman, of the dropsical man, the cleansing of the ten lepers, the repulse he met with when about to enter a Samaritan city, and the instructive rebuke he gave on that occasion, to two of his disciples for their intemperate zeal: also the affecting interview he had, after his resurrection, with two of his disciples, in the way to Emmaus, and at that village. Luke has likewise added many edifying parables to those which had been recorded by the other evangelists. Of this number are the parable of the creditor who had two debtors; of the rich fool who hoarded up his increase, and, when he had not one day to live, vainly exulted in the prospect of many happy years; of the rich man and Lazarus; of the reclaimed prodigal; of the pharisee and the publican praying in the temple; of the judge who was prevailed on by a widow’s importunity, though he feared not God nor regarded man; of the barren fig-tree; of the compassionate Samaritan; and several others; most of which so early a writer as Irenæus has specified as peculiarly belonging to this gospel.

“On comparing these three gospels, it is clear that one was not copied from another; for in this case there would have been not only the same facts, but the same order. It is equally clear that the two latter could not be translations of Matthew’s Hebrew original; we must then deem them independent testimonies to the same facts, and account for the coincidences and verbal agreement from the materials they possessed; and for the variation of the order and arrangement, from the judgment of each writer, and from the circumstances and design he had in view.

“Luke also wrote the Acts of the Apostles, which contains the history of the church till Paul obtained his liberty, about the year 63. He has traced the most material occurrences during this period, and the history may be considered as a continuation of his own gospel. His information was derived from the best sources; and, in regard to many transactions, he was personally concerned. This book is of the greatest value, as it shows the manner in which the apostles fulfilled their commission and propagated the gospel abroad.

“The gospel of John is uniformly stated to have been written the last; and he has designedly omitted most of what the others had related, with whose writings he was acquainted; and has given many interesting discourses of our Lord at great length. It is generally admitted that John lived to an advanced age; and that one design of his gospel was to refute the errors which had already sprung up in the church. John himself mentions the Nicolaitans,¹ a sect of the Gnostics. They introduced into the Christian church the most absurd speculative doctrines respecting the person of the Saviour, his works, sufferings, and resurrection. John, in consequence, begins his gospel, with establishing his glory as God, and the Creator of all things. He is wonderfully simple and artless in his style and manner; and every where discovers the most amiable and affectionate temper. From internal evidence he is supposed to have written previously to the destruction of Jerusalem.² In the year 70, this city was taken and in a great measure destroyed; and had John written after that event, it is natural to think he would have referred to it.

“The epistles of Paul have been generally admitted genuine. When considered in connexion with the Acts of the Apostles, there is such an undesigned coincidence of persons, circumstances, and facts, as not only proves their genuineness, but their truth. It is concluded, from evidence contained in the Acts and epistles themselves, that they were written in the following order, according to Dr Wall. 1. The first epistle to the Thessalonians, A. D. 51, from Corinth. “The copiers at the end of this epistle say it was written from Athens: and the English have thought that note of theirs worth translating: but whoever reads Acts xviii. 5, will see that it was at Corinth that Silas and Timothy came to Paul; and they join in the epistle.” 2. The second epistle to the Thessalonians, in the same year, 54, from the same place. 3. The epistle to the Galatians from Ephesus, A. D. 55. 4. The first epistle to the Corinthians from Ephesus, A. D.

57. 5. The second epistle to the Corinthians from the same place, in the following year. 6. The epistle to the Romans from Corinth, A. D. 60, Usher; 58, Pearson. 7. The epistle to the Philippians from Rome, during his imprisonment, A. D. 62, 8, 9, and 10. The three epistles to the Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon were written from the same place, and sent by the same person, Ty-chicus, during the same period. From internal evidence it is now generally admitted that the epistle to the Ephesians is the same as that to the Laodiceans, and Paley considers that the true reading is “Laodicea.”³ 11. The epistle to the Hebrews, soon after the former, in the opinion of Wall, but whether sent to the church at Jerusalem, or some other church of Judea, is not known.^a 12. After Paul obtained his liberty, he travelled into various parts; and having left Timothy at Ephesus, he sent from Laodicea the first epistle to Timothy, about A. D. 65.^b 13. About the same time, he wrote the epistle to Titus, whom he left the year before in Crete. 14. Paul was again a prisoner at Rome when he wrote the second epistle to Timothy. This last letter of the great apostle contains intimations that he considered his course as now run, and that he was ready to be offered up as the victim of persecution.

“The first epistle of John and the first of Peter are, by the consent of antiquity, admitted to be genuine. The second and third of John, and the second of Peter, as well as of James and Jude, were not so generally received. They possess, however, such internal evidence as must satisfy any impartial inquirer, and, accordingly, they have been admitted into the canon. The book of Revelation was for some time undisputed, and, as far as external authority goes, it is better supported than most others.

“James is called the brother of our Lord, that is, kinsman; and is said to have been the first stated bishop or pastor of the church at Jerusalem. He was eminently pious, and was called James the just. Josephus has mentioned the manner in which Herod, to please the Jews, put him to death in the latter end of the year 62, or the beginning of 63. The epistle might be written the year before. It is directed to the twelve tribes of Israel, or to those who dwelt among the Gentiles; but I consider it as particularly referring to such as had embraced the gospel. It is wholly practical.

“The first and second epistles of Peter were addressed to believing Jews and Gentiles, scattered through Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. It is evident, from the design of the first epistle, that those to whom it is directed were in a state of suffering and per-

³ See Griesbach’s Greek Testament.

^a This epistle was not so soon known or admitted into the canon as the rest. As it was written to the Hebrews, and chiefly respected them, it is natural to infer, it might be some time before it was communicated to the Gentile churches. On having examined the testimonies of the fathers, Lardner observes, “It is evident that this epistle was generally received, in ancient times, by those Christians who used the Greek language, and lived in the eastern parts of the Roman empire. Professor Stuart, in his valuable critical examination of this epistle, has made it probable that it was composed and sent to the Christian church at Casarea, where Paul had resided as a prisoner more than two full years.—Acts xxiv. 27.

^b Bishop Pearson, Paley, and others, have justly observed, that the epistle to Timothy and that to Titus must have been written subsequent to Paul’s imprisonment at Rome, recorded in the Acts.—See Howe Paulina, pp. 320—322.

secution: and some think it was written about the same time with the above. The second is supposed to have been written just before the breaking out of the Jewish war, A. D. 66.

“The epistle of Jude is thought to refer to the second of Peter, v. 17, and of course was written after it. He calls himself the brother of James. It might be written soon after the above, about the year 70. The epistles of John are thought to have been written as late as the year 90. The first breathes the spirit and manner of the evangelist; the two latter are directed to two pious individuals, and the sameness of style would justify us in considering John the author, had we no other testimony.

“The Revelations were communicated to John in the isle of Patmos, and contain the last divine revelations given to the church. They are, with the greatest probability, supposed to have been given about the year 96.

“The four gospels and the epistles were communicated by one church to another, and were most of them read and commented on in the churches on the Lord’s day. Some of them are quoted or alluded to by Clement of Rome, by Hermes, by Ignatius, by Polycarp, disciples and contemporaries with the apostles, and by every Christian writer that followed in the next age; by Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Theophilus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and others. Tertullian refers to the churches as then possessing the very letters which Paul addressed to them. He bids “any one who is willing to exercise his curiosity profitably in the business of his salvation, to visit the apostolical churches, in which their very authentic letters are recited, ipsæ authenticæ literæ eorum recitantur.” Then he goes on: “Is Achala near you? You have Corinth. If you are not far from Macedonia, you have Philippi, you have Thessalonica. If you can go to Asia, you have Ephesus; but if you are near to Italy, you have Rome.”

“Little more than seventy years after the death of our Lord nearly the whole of the canonical books were translated into Syriac, which still remains. The accurate Lardner observes, ‘In the remaining works of Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian, there are perhaps more and larger quotations of the small volume of the New Testament, than of all the works of Cicero, in the writings of all characters for several ages.’

“Having stated, according to the best evidence extant, the manner and the time when the books of the New Testament were published, we may justly infer that nothing can be brought to invalidate either their genuineness or authenticity.” As far as the authority of external testimony goes, it is wholly in their favour, without any direct opposing testimony.

“There is strong reason to believe that, within forty years after the ascension, the evangelists and the chief part of the epistles were collected together, and read and commented on in the Christian churches, as the law and the prophets were in the Jewish synagogues. Ignatius contrasts the gospel with the prophets. ‘Ye ought,’ says he, ‘to hearken to the prophets, but especially to the gospel, in which the passion has been manifested to us, and the resurrection perfected.’

“Supposing the books of the New Testament the mere invention of men, and the facts they relate respecting the person of Jesus Christ to be without foundation, it is difficult, nay impossible, to account for the rise, spread, and duration of Christianity in the world. General experience supports the remark, that on no subject are men, in general, more indisposed and disinclined to entertain and cordially receive a new sentiment than on religion.

“Were the Christian records merely the invention of artful and designing men, how could it have been possible to persuade either Jews or heathens to become Christians? It cannot be denied that these books contain doctrines and precepts wholly opposed to the known prejudices, sentiments, and practices of both those classes of men. By the doctrine of Christ their religious ritual and ceremonies were represented as of no intrinsic importance, and, unless accompanied with faith, purity of heart, and integrity of life, unavailable in the sight of God. Another part of the Christian doctrine was equally opposed to Jewish pride and prejudices, that the Gentiles should enjoy equal privileges with them under the Messiah’s reign.

“In the same manner was the Christian doctrine opposed to the opinions and prejudices of the heathens. They had gods many and lords many; and were ready to admit any new god to a place in their pantheon. The Christian doctrine on this point was opposed to every article of their mythology; it denied the very existence of every object of their worship. It taught that an idol was nothing but an imagination. It is evident that such a sentiment must have tended to overthrow every statue, altar, and temple in the world; and how could a doctrine like this prevail, unless founded in truth, and supported by such evidence of its divine origin, as must have been most convincing to those who embraced it?

“Were men induced to become Christians by the prospect of temporal gain? Were riches and honours the consequence of embracing Christianity? No; this was a sect every where spoken against; and Christians had nothing to expect but reproaches, insults, and persecutions. During a considerable part of the first three centuries, Christians had to endure whatever the malice of Jews and heathens could inflict. The civil power was exerted in every way to induce them to renounce Christianity, and to conform to the established and prevailing superstition. They were plundered of their property, many were banished, many immured in prisons, and great numbers tortured and put to death in the most painful manner.

“The arguments in proof of the reality and certainty of the Christian doctrine, derived from these sufferings, undergone only on account of their testimony to Jesus, and their adherence to him, are strong and decisive. When was it found that men, without any temporal interest, and in the face of the most formidable difficulties, persisted in a scheme of falsehood? The Christian records only assign adequate causes of the effects which are acknowledged to exist; and from them we see why the first Christians chose rather to suffer than to be silent, or to deny their Lord. The objects then which usually influence the human mind are here out of question; and it must be admitted, either that the first Christians

^a Bishop Watson has pertinently observed, that there is an important distinction between the genuineness and authenticity of any book. “A genuine book is that which was written by the person whose name it bears, as the author of it. An authentic book is that which relates matters of fact as they really happened. A book may be genuine without being authentic; and a book may be authentic, without being genuine.”

acted contrary to the known principles of human nature, or that the facts they believed, on the evidence of their own senses, were true. To admit the former supposition is to admit a miracle; for what is a miracle, but a fact above, or contrary to, the usual course of nature: To admit the latter, is to admit that Christianity is founded in truth.

“The facts contained in the New Testament were the continual topics on which the apostles of our Lord dwelt in their public ministry; and if these facts were not true, their enemies would not have failed to expose them; as they could not have wanted either the inclination or the opportunity. The books of Christians were not locked up, but alike accessible to friends and to foes. Curiosity, as well as a desire to invalidate their authority, must have stimulated the latter to peruse them; and had they not been supported by the most decisive evidence, we should have had refutations without end. After a lapse of more than a century, an attempt was made, not to prove that the Christian records were a mere fiction, but to account for the miracles they contained from the supposed powers of magic. The Christian records could not, therefore, be a cunningly devised fable, but must have been allowed to contain a faithful narrative of facts, which courted the strictest scrutiny, and which did not admit of refutation.

“These three circumstances support both the genuineness and authenticity of the books of the New Testament. First, the recognition of the facts, doctrines, and precepts they contain, by a series of succeeding writers; secondly, the total absence of any account of the origin of Christianity substantially different; thirdly, the early and extensive prevalence of rites and institutions, founded on the facts and doctrines contained in the Christian records.

“Admitting the authenticity of the New Testament, we cannot reasonably doubt that of the books of the Old. The evangelists and apostles appeal to them, and often quote largely from them. We have in their writings references to most of the books of the Old Testament: to the five books of Moses, to Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Job, the Psalms, Proverbs, and the Prophets. Independently of this evidence, we have a translation of these books into the Greek language, made, at least in part, in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, more than two hundred and fifty years before the Christian era. The Samaritans, who were opposed to the Jews in many things, retained the law, or the five books of Moses, in the old Hebrew character, which the Jews used prior to their captivity in Babylon. This carries us back a considerable period; and the existence of the Samaritan Pentateuch, and the version of the Seventy, uncontestedly prove that the authenticity of the books of the Old Testament was then admitted.

“The books of Moses contain the civil and religious institutions of the Jewish nation, and the body of their laws; and it cannot admit of doubt that their civil polity and religious ritual and conduct were regulated by these laws. Their whole history proves this; and the unvarying testimony of Greek and Roman writers corroborates the fact. All the subsequent writers of the Old Testament refer to the facts and laws contained in the five books of Moses; the state of the earth when created—the primeval darkness—the division of time into weeks which has obtained among the most ancient nations—the creation of man, and the happiness of the paradisiacal state—his fall and consequent depravity and misery—the longevity of the antediluvians—Noah’s flood, and the manner in which he and all with him were saved in the ark—the increase of mankind and rise of ancient nations, have been either more expressly or more obscurely referred to by the most ancient heathen historians and poets. Josephus refers to Eerosus, Manetho, Hesiod, Hecataeus and others in proof of what Moses relates.¹

“The history of Abraham, and of his posterity, is so full of particulars and incidents that it may be regarded as a family memorial. The promises and predictions made to him we find subsequently fulfilled. His posterity increased wonderfully on their having gone down to Egypt, and were afterwards enslaved and greatly oppressed. Moses was raised up, by a special providence, to be their deliverer, lawgiver, and ruler. God furnished him with talents and power to do what he designed; and by a series of miracles and judgments, Pharaoh and his people were compelled to permit the Israelites to depart from Egypt. The events which followed the exodus, the passage of the Red Sea, journey to Sinai, the giving of the law, the idolatry of the people, erection of the tabernacle, the pillar of cloud and of fire, the manna, &c., are clearly described, and by one who was eye-witness of what he relates. The historians and prophets of after-times borrow their language and imagery from the facts Moses relates.

“On the whole, there is no ground for doubt as to the genuineness or authenticity of the Old any more than of the New Testament. The external evidence is as complete as could be expected in respect to writings by far the most ancient in the world. The internal evidence arising from the style, foreign terms, simplicity, brevity, sublimity, and grandeur, the pure morality, elevated views of the divine nature, of the works of God, of his providence, his universal dominion, power and glory, not only prove the truth of the Old Testament, but its inspiration and divine authority.

“The scriptures are not only genuine and authentic, but inspired. Inspiration consisted in a supernatural influence on the human mind, elevating and directing its natural powers, and imparting such truths, and such knowledge of God’s will, as could not be otherwise attained. Inspiration must, from its very nature, have been personal, and the inspired person must have been fully assured of it from his own consciousness. Inspiration included both the divine influence, and the effect of it, in the communications or discoveries made; and these communications and discoveries, when embodied in language, constituted a divine revelation. A revelation indeed might be made without inspiration. God might, and from scripture we know, he actually did, assume some form, and make known his will to men; or without any form, speak in human language, as at the giving of the law, and on many other occasions. In these cases, the discoveries made would be of the same nature and deserve the same regard as truths directly inspired.

“From this statement, it appears that inspiration was miraculous. An uncommon influence was exerted, and knowledge imparted, without the intervention of the usual means. How was it possible for the inspired person to convince others that God had inspired him; and that the truths he announced were divine revelations? Such a pretension would be regarded with suspicion, as being contrary to general experience; and, without some sensible, evident proof of divine power and influence, would command no respect, nor produce any beneficial effects. If the inspired person should work miracles, or should miracles be wrought at his word, this must with all reasonable men, establish his claim; for it would be absurd to suppose the God of truth would give his sanction to falsehood and imposture. As a miracle is an effect above the power of created beings to produce, and a deviation from the laws and course of nature, it is the strongest and most convincing proof of the agency of God. Nicodemus reasoned justly, when he said to our Lord, 'We know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him.'

"1. Inspiration has been properly divided into that of superintendence and that of suggestion. 'The former implies such a divine influence on the mind, as to secure the person who speaks or writes from error in the statements of facts, or the declaration of any doctrine.' It cannot be denied that such an influence is possible. Such an influence as this is also consistent with the free exercise of the person's own faculties: so that he would express himself in his own usual manner, in words and phrases to which he had been accustomed. Such an inspiration, the writers of the historical books of the holy scriptures enjoyed; so that what they wrote contained only truth, though expressed in their own style. And though they availed themselves of well-authenticated documents, and the oral testimony of honest and competent witnesses, yet, in arranging these materials, and stating circumstances, they enjoyed this superintending inspiration.

"From the Acts, it is evident that the apostles and other disciples were in a most wonderful manner inspired by the Holy Spirit. They were originally Galilean fishermen; and their circumstances must have precluded any literary advantages. They attended the ministry of Jesus, but they had no opportunity of acquiring the knowledge of any foreign language. How then was it possible for these men to speak at once in various languages, unless they had been inspired? Whoever reflects on the nature of language must be sensible that there could, in this, be no collusion. When the multitude heard the disciples speaking and praising God, each in his own tongue, well might they be amazed, and say, 'Are not all these who speak Galileans?' The gift of tongues was essentially necessary in their circumstances to spread the doctrines of their Lord and Saviour; and the power of conferring this gift seems to have been bestowed on the apostles. Hence, those who went forth to preach the gospel were, by this supernatural gift, qualified for the work, and with the strictest truth the apostle might say, that the gospel was preached, 'not in the enticing words of human wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit.'

"If inspiration were necessary to those who first preached the gospel, and if the preachers assert that they enjoyed it, it is not reasonable to suppose that those apostles and evangelists who wrote the life, and stated and illustrated the doctrines of our Lord, should be considered as having been unaided in this important work. The interests of Christianity were involved in the accuracy, faithfulness, and truth of their writings, and had they not enjoyed as full an inspiration as was necessary, their writings would have been of less authority than their oral testimony. Examine their writings, and, unless I am greatly deceived, their agreement in the facts they record, their harmony in doctrinal sentiments, in moral precepts, directions, cautions, and exhortations to duty, will produce the fullest conviction that they wrote under the influence of the same Spirit. In short, the excellence of the doctrines delivered in their writings, their elevation, holiness, and spirituality, their obvious tendency to raise the moral state of man, and to promote his happiness, demonstrate their divine origin.

"As the miracles which the Saviour wrought demonstrated his divine mission, so those of the apostles and disciples support the inspiration and truth of their writings. Those to whose writings we are most indebted wrought miracles, and by this clearly evinced that they were under a special divine influence.¹

"Think of the lustre of those astonishing works which were wrought by Paul wherever he went, and of those wrought in his favour, which showed him so eminently the care of heaven: demons ejected, distempers cured, sometimes with a touch, and sometimes without, by a garment sent from him to the patient; his motions guided from place to place by a divine oracle; Elymas struck blind for opposing him; his bands loosed by an earthquake; his strength and vigour instantaneously restored, when the rage of the mutable and barbarous populace at Lystra had stoned him and left him for dead; and, to add no more, his safety in a shipwreck, with that of near three hundred more in the same vessel for his sake, promised by an angel, and accomplished without the loss of a single person.

"John is associated with Peter in the cure of the impotent man;² and to him Jesus appeared in the isle of Patmos, and made use of him as his amanuensis, expressly dictating to him the letters he was to send to the seven churches of Asia. Is it possible then to think that he was not under an inspiration of superintendency, or of suggestion, when he wrote his gospel and his epistles?

"The sacred writers expressly assert such a divine inspiration.³ They represent their Lord and Saviour, while he was yet with them, as giving them power to effect miraculous cures and other wonders in his name; and also as promising that, after his departure from them, he would send them the 'Spirit of truth.'⁴

"If the apostles and evangelists did not receive this Spirit, and were not divinely inspired in their preaching and writing, they furnished their enemies with an argument to prove that Jesus was a deceiver; but their writings show us that our Lord fulfilled, in the most ample manner, the promises which he had made. Under the influence of this 'Spirit of truth,' their mistakes respecting the nature of our Lord's kingdom were corrected, their timidity was converted into a holy boldness, and they displayed, through the whole course of their ministry, a wisdom truly heavenly, a fortitude, patience, meekness, love, and zeal suitable to the cause they advocated, and according with the example of their Lord and Saviour.

“Collateral proof of the inspiration of the New Testament may be derived from a comparison of these writings with the spurious writings handed down to us under the name of the apostles. Let any man read the gospel of Nicodemus, of the Egyptians, or the remains of that of the Ebionites, and compare them with Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John; and if he possess any judgment, he will not hesitate to conclude that, while the latter possess all the characters of truth, and are worthy of the high claims which they maintain, the former contain ridiculous stories, in language and style below notice.

“The belief of the first Christians in the divine authority of the scriptures, the regard they paid to them, and the care with which they read and transcribed them, furnish a strong presumptive proof of their genuineness, authenticity, and inspiration.” They found here recorded the facts and doctrines taught them by the apostles and the first Christian preachers; and thus their faith would be strengthened. On the doctrines taught by our Lord and his apostles, and contained in the writings of the New Testament, the Christian church was founded; and on the preservation of these, its purity, perpetuity, and safety depended. If our Lord intended that his kingdom should continue among men, that the great purposes of his divine mission, sufferings, and death should be accomplished, it was necessary, either that the power of miracles should be continued to his disciples, or, that they should leave behind them written records of whatever was requisite for faith and practice, and that these records should contain nothing but the truth; or in other words, that they should be sanctioned by divine authority. Such authority was at first admitted, and on the same authority Christians now build their faith and their hopes.

“2. The second kind of inspiration is that of suggestion, in which God by his Spirit speaks directly to the mind, making such discoveries as could not otherwise be in any manner known. Thus, if a man was to give a just account of what another did at a distance, at any given moment, it must be evident that this was given to him by an inspiration of suggestion. In like manner, if a man declare what will come to pass in any future period, and the event happen accordingly, he must be under the influence of the same kind of inspiration. For instance, should a man inform us that a person of such a name shall exist a hundred or a thousand years hence, that he shall obtain power, and reign over such a kingdom, and vanquish the surrounding nations, and should it happen accordingly, who could doubt but that this had been revealed to him? In the New Testament we have many instances of this inspiration. Indeed, every prediction of future events, and every revelation of doctrines and truths, which unfolds what are the designs of the divine wisdom and mercy, comes under this species of inspiration. When the inspired person was to commit such discoveries to writing, that of superintendence was necessary to preserve him from mistake or error. Hence both kinds were often united. ^b

“The marks and evidences of inspiration, in the books of the New Testament, are equally manifest in those of the Old. The prophetic books contain many singular predictions of events which were to happen at distant periods, and which in the New Testament are said to be fulfilled. In the writings of the prophets there is a frequent reference to the future Saviour; his incarnation and his miraculous birth, his family, his poverty, his miracles, his sufferings, his death, his resurrection, his kingdom and glory are described with an accuracy which defies misapplication. Circumstances the most minute are noticed; and though the Jews have rejected our Lord as the Messiah, they still apply the same prophecies to him whom they expect. Of the inspiration of the prophets, in the highest sense, there can be no doubt; unless it can be proved that they wrote after the events which it is pretended they predicted; but this is impossible, as the Jews never would have supplied arguments in favour of Christianity.

“In regard to the Psalms, some are prophetic, others didactic, and others only commemorative. The Proverbs and Ecclesiastes contain maxims of prudence and wisdom. The evident design and tendency of these writings establish their claim to a divine inspiration, either of superintendence or suggestion. The same view may be taken of the historical books. We may also add that our Lord affirms their divine authority, and he directs his hearers to search them. As to the writings of Moses, they have the highest authority. God spake to him with an audible voice, ‘as a man speaketh with his friend.’

“Considering the laws of Moses, in respect to civil polity or religion, they are so peculiar that little doubt can be entertained of their divine origin. On these laws the Jewish state was founded, and continued with little interruption for a period of more than fifteen hundred years. The prophets refer to these laws as of divine origin, and our Lord and his apostles in like manner. We may then conclude that the writings which Jews and Christians deem sacred, are not only genuine and authentic, but, in the sense explained, divinely inspired. They mutually illustrate and support each other.

“We may fairly, and in all reason, incontrovertibly infer, the inspiration of the holy scriptures from a comparison with the writings of the most enlightened and polished heathens. The Jews were never celebrated for their attainment in science or literature. We have reason to believe that they never carried the arts to any high degree of perfection. Solomon, in erecting the temple, and in accomplishing his other works, availed himself of the superior skill of the Tyrians, and probably of other neighbours. The Jews were employed in agriculture, a calling which, while it furnishes the means of subsistence, does not require to call forth the active and inventive powers of the human mind. A people devoted to the labours and toils of agriculture have neither leisure, means, nor inclination to indulge in speculation, to investigate the laws of matter or the properties of mind. Content with the produce of their lands and flocks, their vine-yards and olive-yards, they remain nearly stationary in arts and speculative sciences.

^b God, in communicating his will, spake at various times and in various manners to the fathers, by the prophets. Sometimes in a dream. (Compare Gen. xv. 12—15, and xxviii. 12—17, and other places.) Sometimes in a vision. By this term is meant, such a representation to the mind of things, distant or future, as occupied and abstracted it from all other things. In a dream, the person was asleep; but in a vision awake. The prophets in general received the divine will in the latter method. (Compare Ezek. viii.) Sometimes the word of Jehovah came to the prophet in an audible voice, and he was expressly told what to speak or do. (Compare 1 Sam. iii. 1, &c.) It is probable that this was the case when the prophets assert that, ‘Thus saith the Lord.’

^a The attachment of the early Christians to the word of God was exceedingly strong, and manifested itself in various ways, according to the circumstances and inclinations of different persons. Women wore it hanging at their necks. Children were trained up from their infancy to repeat it by heart. Most persons carried it about with them. Some washed their hands before they took it up to read. And many have been found buried with the gospel lying on their breasts.—Fleury, Mœurs des Chrétiens, s. 7.

“Such being the general state and character of the Jews, from their origin down to their dispersion, the question forces itself on the mind, how did this people attain such just notions of the divine nature, of the unity, spirituality, omnipotence, omniscience, and other natural and moral perfections of God? How did they discover the Creator in his works, and inform others that he made the world and governed it? Are these things so evident that men in the lowest state of mental culture perceive and understand them? Why then has not pure theism every where prevailed? It is well known that the reverse is the fact, and that men have in every age and country where divine revelation has not been enjoyed, worshipped the creature and not the Creator. Will it be said that they received these just and noble sentiments from Abraham? The question still recurs, whence did he receive them? To say, by tradition from his fathers, will not satisfy the inquirer after truth. For why did not others secure and retain the same truths in the same manner?

“Will it be said that Moses, by the force of his own genius, aided by the learning of Egypt, discovered these truths, and founding his civil and religious polity on them, perpetuated them among that people? It may readily be granted that Moses possessed great powers of mind, and that these were improved by the literature of Egypt: but this supposes that the Egyptians also possessed great powers of mind; and how is it that, so far from acknowledging the unity and perfections of the divine nature, they were the most degraded for worshipping the vilest idols? Had Moses received no instruction but from the Egyptians, from the penetration, genius, and force of his mind, he might, like Homer, have written an epic poem, and converted the Egyptian pantheon into the machinery of it: but there is no reason to think that his ideas would have excelled those of the Grecian bard.

“In short, the just sentiments respecting the divine nature, good and evil, providence, the state and condition of man, his civil, social, and relative duties, his accountability, and final state, scattered through every part of the holy scriptures, clearly prove that the authors were inspired; or else we must admit, what must be deemed altogether miraculous, that shepherds, herdsmen, and Galilean fishermen, without literature, possessed wisdom, and made discoveries in moral science unattained, and it may be said, unattainable by all the heathen sages of the east and west, north and south. It has already appeared that the sacred writers ascribed all their knowledge to divine influence, they asserted that Jehovah spoke by them, and that his word was on their tongues. It remains for those who deny their divine inspiration to account for their attainments, which has not yet, and on their principles, never will be done.

“Another argument may be derived from the harmony of the sacred writers. From Moses to the close of revelation elapsed a period of above fifteen hundred years; and the sacred authors lived and wrote at successive intervals. In matters of opinion, we find one writer differing from another, and each controverting the reasoning of his antagonist. The sentiments of one age are exploded by the following; and on a variety of interesting subjects the human mind is kept in suspense. The schools of philosophers were only the arenas where the masters and scholars exercised their powers in opposing one another; and after an impartial person has read all that they have said on religion and morals, he will be constrained to admit that they have done little more than ‘darken counsel by words without knowledge.’

“Go to the sacred scriptures, examine them closely and critically. Can you find one writer controverting the statements or opinions of his predecessor?—one historian who disputes any fact which another had stated? Is there in the prophets any discrepancy in doctrines, precepts, or predictions? However they vary in style or manner of illustration, the sentiment and the morality is the same. In their predictions they exceed one another in particularity and clearness: but where is there any contradiction? The same remarks apply to the New Testament. Whence then arises this harmony of scripture? Had the writers been under no peculiar divine influence, they would have reasoned and speculated like others, and their writings would have opposed each other. But if they were inspired, if they all spoke and wrote under the influence of the same Spirit, then is this harmony accounted for, and it is impossible to account for it on any other principle. Hence we may conclude that all scripture is not only genuine and authentic, but divinely inspired, ‘and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.’”—Boothroyd's Introduction to the Holy Bible, chap. i.

HISTORY OF THE BIBLE.

BOOK VIII.

CONTAINING AN ACCOUNT OF THINGS FROM THE BIRTH OF CHRIST TO THE COMPLETION OF THE CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT, IN ALL ABOUT 97 YEARS.

PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS.

WE have now perused the history of the divine dispensations from the beginning of the world to the coming of Christ. We are, therefore, about to survey those great events by which human redemption was procured, and the mighty effects which resulted from these events.

The incarnation of the Son of God is one of those events, and one which may well awaken our surprise and gratitude. He who was God, assumed the likeness of sinful flesh, and the form of a servant. He did so, that he might be capable of acting as the Surety and Saviour of sinners, in obeying and suffering in their room; and that he might thus satisfy divine justice, and reconcile them to God. He came into the world at a time, which to infinite wisdom appeared the most fit and proper. ¹ 'When the fulness of time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, that he might redeem them that were under the law, and that they might receive the adoption of sons.'

The time chosen for this great event was, on every account, the most fitting. During the interval which intervened since the fall, the effects of the curse had been developed; the hardening nature of sin, and the misery which it produces, had been shown; and the necessity of the gracious interposition of God for the redemption of mankind had been fully demonstrated.

What were the means by which this redemption was procured? These were the obedience which was rendered by the Son of God, and his atoning sufferings and death. His satisfaction for sin was not only by his last sufferings, though it was principally by them; but all his sufferings, and all the humiliation that he was subject to, from the first moment of his incarnation to his resurrection, were propitiatory or satisfactory. In like manner, his meriting eternal life for his people, consisted not only in the obedience of his whole life, but in his laying down his life in compliance with the will of his father. One and the same act of Christ, as Edwards remarks, considered with respect to the obedience there was in it, was part of his righteousness, and procured heaven; but considered with respect to the self-denial, and difficulty, and humiliation with which he performed it, had the nature of satisfaction for sin, and procured our pardon. Thus, his going about doing good, preaching the gospel, and teaching his disciples, was a part of his righteousness, and purchase of heaven, as it was done in obedience to the Father; and the same was a part of his satisfaction, as he did it with great labour, trouble, and weariness, exposing himself to reproach and contempt. His laying down his life had the nature of satisfaction to God's offended justice, considered as his bearing our punishment in our stead; but considered as an act of obedience to God, who had given him his command that he should lay down his life for sinners, it was a part of his righteousness and purchase of heaven.

He obeyed all the commands of the moral law;—all the precepts of the ceremonial law;—all the obligations of the mediatorial law. And the history recorded by the evangelists consists in an account of this infinitely perfect and meritorious obedience of the Son of God:—an obedience which he rendered in room of his people, during the whole of his life, public and private; and in the rendering of which, he exercised all the virtues of sinless humanity.

In making atonement for sin, he was subject to great humiliation and suffering. Born in a low condition, he became the object of persecution from his infancy. The Son of God, the Creator of heaven and earth, veiled his glory, and made himself of no reputation. 'The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man had not where to lay his head.' He was despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief. He came to his own, and his own received him not. He endured the contradiction of sinners, and the reproach and derision of the wicked. It was, however, in the close of his course of deep humiliation, that he suffered more peculiarly the wrath of God due to us for sin. It was then that his soul was sorrowful, even unto death;—that he was smitten, stricken of God, and afflicted;—that he was wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace having been laid upon him, that by his stripes we might be healed. It was thus he finished the great work which had been given him to do—the work of redeeming sinful men from the condemnation and the misery of sin, and of making provision for bringing them to God and to happiness.

But it was necessary for carrying on the great and gracious designs of his death, that he should rise from the dead. This formed a part of his promised reward. 'Because he humbled himself, God highly exalted him, and gave him a name which is above every name: that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, and every tongue should confess, that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.' Till Christ rose from the dead, the Old Testament Dispensation remained; but with that event it ceased, and that new and glorious economy began, which is to continue till the end of time, and under which all the nations of the earth are to be blessed.

The reader will observe, that, at the commencement of this dispensation, the Saviour commissioned his apostles to go into all the world, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. After his ascension into heaven, he copiously poured out the Holy Spirit, and plentifully endued his servants with his saving influences and miraculous gifts. Hence the extraordinary success of the gospel in all parts of the world, and the establishment of the Christian church. Hence, also, the clear and full revelation of those glorious doctrines of the gospel, which, under the Old Testament, had been obscurely made known:—even the mystery which hath been hid from ages and generations, but now is made manifest to his saints.¹

"A person was selected and qualified for the apostolic office, who was eminently instrumental in the furtherance of the great designs of redeeming mercy. As Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles, so it was mainly by his ministry that the Gentiles were called, and the gospel spread through the world; and our nation, and the other nations of Europe, have the gospel among them chiefly through his means. To the labours, trials, and sufferings of this apostle, our attention is directed in the greater part of the Acts of the Apostles. This extraordinary man, as presented to our view in that inspired record, and in his own epistles, belongs not particularly to the period in which he lived, but is equally the property of the Christian church in every successive age. Time does not diminish our interest in him. He is as fresh to every country as to his own; and the truth he preaches will be as intimately connected with that age which shall precede the dissolution of the world, as with that in which he wrote. By the Christians of all countries Paul will be considered as a cosmopolite, and by those of all ages as a contemporary."¹

The books of the New Testament were committed to writing by the direction and infallible inspiration of the Spirit of God. With the exception of Mark and Luke, the penmen were the apostles. The historical books are the writings of the four evangelists, giving us the history of Christ and his purchase of redemption, and his resurrection and ascension: and the Acts of the Apostles, giving an account of the great things by which the Christian church was first established and propagated. The doctrinal books are the epistles, fourteen of which were written by Paul; two by Peter; three by John; one by Jude. There is one prophetic book which takes place after the end of the history of the whole Bible, and gives an account of the great events which were to come to pass, by which the work of redemption was to be carried on to the end of the world.

All these books are supposed to have been written before the destruction of Jerusalem, excepting those which were written by the apostle John, who lived the longest of all the apostles. To this beloved disciple it was that Christ revealed those wonderful things which were to come to pass in the church to the end of time; and he was the person who put the finishing hand to the canon of scripture, and sealed the whole of it. A curse is denounced against him that adds anything to it, or diminishes anything from it. The means of grace, and ordinances of religion, were settled by divine authority before the death of the apostle John, and are to remain unaltered to the day of judgment.

SECT. I.

CHAP. I.—From the Birth of Christ, to the beginning of the first Passover.

THE HISTORY.

As soon as the time foretold by the prophets,^a for the incarnation of the Son of God, began to draw near,^b

^a The two principal prophets who determine the period when our Lord was to appear in the world, are Daniel and Haggai. Daniel foretells, that, at 'the end of the seventy' prophetic 'weeks,' that is, at the expiration of four hundred and ninety years after the building of the walls of Jerusalem, the 'Messiah should come,' chap. ix. 25; and Haggai prophesies that, before the destruction of the second temple, (even when the 'sceptre was departed from Judah,' Gen. xlix. 10,) the 'desire of all nations should come,' and by his frequent personal appearance in the temple, make the 'glory of that latter house' much 'greater than that of the former,' chap. ii. 7, &c.

^b The word εὐαγγέλιον signifies, in general, good news, and is of the same import with our Saxon word gospel; only in the sacred use of them both there seems to be a metonymy, whereby the words that denote good news are set to signify the history of that good news, namely, of the birth and life, the miracles and doctrine, the death and resurrection of our Saviour Christ; all of which put together do make up the joyful tidings which we call the gospel; and from the etymology of the words the persons who have recorded the life and actions of our Saviour are called evangelists, or writers of the gospel. The works of this kind, which are received as canonical, are but four, namely, that of St Matthew, St Mark, St Luke, and St John; but the spurious pieces which are handed down to us, even though several of them be lost, do exceed the number of forty. The truth is, the ancient heretics began generally with attacking the gospels, in order either to maintain their errors, or excuse them. To this purpose some rejected all the genuine gospels, and substituted others that were spurious in their room. This produced the gospels of Apelles, Basilides, Cerinthus, the Ebionites, and Gnostics. Others corrupted the true gospels, by suppressing whatever gave them any trouble, and inserting whatever might favour their erroneous doctrines. Thus the Nazarenes corrupted the original gospels the evangelist St Luke gives us this account of the birth of his great forerunner John the Baptist. ^a

While his father ^b Zacharias, who was a priest of the eighth course, namely, the course of Abia, was executing his office at Jerusalem, which was in the latter part of

of St Matthew, as the Marcionites did that of St Luke; while the Alogians rejected St John, as the Eblonites did St Matthew, and the Valentiniens only acknowledged St John, as the Cerinthians did St Mark. — Hammond's Annotations; M. Fabricius's Codex apocryphus N. Test.; and Cabinet's Dictionary, under the word Gospel.

^a There are two places in the prophets referred to, both by our Saviour and his evangelists, wherein the Baptist is described under this character. The former is in the prophet Isaiah, 'The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert an high way for our God,' chap. xl. 3; and the latter, which is more plain and express, is in Malachi, 'Behold I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me.' &c., chap. iii. 1. Both the passages allude to harbingers, and such other officers as, upon the journeys of princes, are employed to take care that the ways should be levelled and put in order, and all such obstructions removed as might hinder their passage, or render it less commodious; and the manner in which the Baptist thus prepared the way of the Lord was by his preaching and by his baptism. By his preaching he endeavoured to bring the Jews to a due sense of their sins; to abate their confidence in being of Abraham's seed, and punctual observers of the ceremonial law; and to forewarn all of the dreadful effects of God's anger, who did not bring forth fruits worthy of repentance; and by his baptism, when administered to such persons as were under the obligation of the law, he plainly showed, that he was therein admitting them to some privileges which they had not before, namely, the remission of their sins, upon their faith and obedience to him who was the messenger of the covenant. Since therefore the Baptist was born six months before our Saviour, and entered upon his ministry six months before our Saviour began his; and since no part of his doctrine terminated in himself, and his baptism referred every one to Christ for acceptance and salvation; he is very properly said to be his harbinger, 'a messenger sent to prepare his way before him,' or to set all things in readiness for his approach, by putting an end to the old, and making an entrance into the new dispensation, in which sense he is represented by the fathers as a kind of middle partition between the law and the gospel; of the law, as a thing now come to a period; and of the gospel, as commencing under him who was shortly to make his appearance. — Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. i.

^b Some of the fathers were of opinion that this Zacharias was, at this time, high priest, upon a false supposition that the offering of incense was reserved to the high priest only: but, besides the testimony of Josephus, who tells us expressly that Simon, the son of Boethus, was high priest this year; it appears from St Luke himself, that Zacharias was no more than an ordinary priest of the family or course of Abia, which, of the four and twenty courses appointed by David for the service of the temple, when it should be built, was the eighth, 1 Chron. xxiv. 10. For though it was the high priest's prerogative, on the great day of expiation, to enter into 'the holy of holies,' and there burn incense, which no ordinary priest might do, Lev. xvi. 12; yet, in the common service of the day, each priest whose lot it was, went every morning and evening into the sanctum, or holy of the temple, and there burnt the daily incense upon the altar, which was placed before the veil of the most holy place, Exod. xxx. 6, &c. For these, and several other reasons which annotators have produced, it seems plain that Zacharias could not possibly be high priest at this time; and, whatever credit may be given to the tradition, — That, by the order of Herod the Great, he was put to death between the porch and the altar, namely, in the inclosure that surrounded the altar of burnt-offerings; and that, when every one was ignorant of this murder, a certain priest, thinking that he staid too long, entered into the temple, and found him dead, and his blood congealed upon the ground, and, at the same time, hearing a voice that it should never be wiped out until his revenger came: — whatever credit, I say, may be given to this tradition, it was doubtless upon this foundation that many of the ancients thought, that Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, was that Zachariah, son of Barachiah, mention-the reign of Herod the Great, ^c it came to his lot ^d to go into the temple with his censer in his hand, in order to burn incense, while the people without were ^e offering up their supplications in the court that was called 'the court of Israel.' At the altar of incense ^f he was greatly surprised with the sight of an angel standing on the right side of it: but the angel soon dissipated his fears with the joyful news, that God intended to bless him with a son, whose name should be John, who would prove a person of uncommon merit, and be appointed to the office of harbinger to the Messiah, ^g who, in a short time, was to make his appearance.

ed by our Saviour in the gospel, whose blood was shed between the temple and the altar. — Poole's and Whilby's Annotations; and Cabinet's Dictionary.

^c St Luke, in particular, takes notice, that the time when our Lord's forerunner was to be conceived, was in the reign of Herod, son of Antipater, (for it was Herod Antipas that put him to death,) commonly called the Great, who, under the Romans, fought his way to the government of the Jews, and came to his throne by the slaughter of their sanhedrim, by which means he extinguished all the dominion which, till that time, they held in the tribe of Judah, not in a single person indeed, for that was extinguished in the Asmonean family, but in a select number out of that royal tribe, and so verified the prophecy of Jacob, (Gen. xlix. 10,) 'that the sceptre,' or government, 'was departed from Judah, and the lawgiver from between his feet,' which was a certain sign that Shiloh, that is, the Messiah, was shortly to come. — Poole's Annotations.

^d The several courses of the priests began on the sabbath day, and continued to serve till the sabbath following; but because they were now increased to a great number, (Josephus tells us there were no less than a thousand in each course,) there were several parts of the priestly office, whereof burning of incense was one, which the course that then ministered seems to have divided among themselves for the week that they were to attend by lot. — Poole's and Whilby's Annotations. See also Jennings's Jewish Antiquities, vol. i. p. 269.

^e A Jewish congregation, for the most part, consisted of all the priests of the course which was then in waiting, of the Levites, and of certain stationary men, as they called them, who represented the body of the people, besides some accidental worshippers; and when the priests went into the sanctuary, or within the first veil, to offer incense, notice was given by the sound of a bell, that it was then the time of prayer; whereupon every one present offered up his supplications to God silently: and though this silent prayer was not commanded, yet there seems a manifest allusion to it in those words of St John, where, 'at the offering of incense with the prayers of the saints,' it is said 'there was silence in heaven for half an hour,' (Rev. viii. 1, &c.) Nor is that passage in Ecclesiasticus, (chap. l. 19, 20,) any bad representation of this part of the Jewish worship, 'And the people besought the Lord, the Most High, by prayer before him that is merciful, till the solemnity of the Lord was ended; and then he went down,' namely, Simon the high priest, 'and lifted up his hands over the whole congregation of the children of Israel, to give the blessing of the Lord with his lips.' — Hammond's and Whilby's Annotations.

^f The Jews had a peculiar notion, that such like apparitions were always fatal to those that had them, and a sure token of their instantaneous death (Gen. xvi. 7; xxii. 11, 15; Exod. xx. 19, &c.); but if this were not, it is natural for men to be affrightened at sudden and unusual things, especially at any divine appearances, whether of God himself taking a visible shape, or authorizing an angel so to do. For though God does not make the appearances to affrighten us, yet such is the imbecility of our nature, that we cannot but be startled at them; and reason good there is that God, by this means, should both declare his own glory and majesty, and humble his poor creatures, in order to make them more susceptible of his divine revelations. — Poole's Annotations, and Cabinet's Dictionary.

^g This word is derived from the Hebrew mashach, to anoint, and is the very same with ἁγιασμός, the anointed, in Greek. It is a name sometimes given to the kings and high priests of the Hebrews, (1 Sam. xii. 5, &c., Ps. cv. 15.); but principally, and by way of eminence it belongs to that sovereign Deliverer who was

The sense of his own great age, as well as his wife's long sterility, made Zacharias "express a kind of diffidence in this promise, and for his farther satisfaction, desire some miracle in confirmation of it; whereupon the angel let him know, "That he was no less than Gabriel, a special attendant on God's throne, and despatched on purpose to inform him of this great happiness; but that, since he was so incredulous as to require a sign, he should have such an one as would be both a punishment of his unbelief, and a confirmation of his faith; for, until the birth of the child, he should be both deaf and dumb;"^b which accordingly came to pass: for, when he came out to the people, who waited to receive his benediction, he made signs, that he was not able to speak to them, and they thence inferred that he had seen some extraordinary vision within. After the time of his ministration, however, was over, he returned home, and it was not long before his wife Elizabeth perceived herself with child, though her modesty made her conceal it for the space of five months.

Six months after Elizabeth's conception the same angel Gabriel was sent to Nazareth, a city of Galilee, to a virgin named Mary, a near relation to Elizabeth, and of the house of David, who had lately been^d es-expected by the Jews, and whom they vainly expect even to this day, since he is already come at the appointed time, in the person of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. The Jews were used to anoint kings, high priests, and sometimes prophets. Saul, David, Solomon, and Joash, kings of Judah, received the royal unction. Aaron and his sons received the sacerdotal; and Elisha received the prophetic, at least God ordered Elijah to give it to him. But now, though Jesus Christ united in his own person all the offices of prophet, priest, and king, yet we no where find that he received any outward or sensible unction; and therefore the unction which the prophets and apostles speak of, with regard to him, is the spiritual and internal unction of grace in the Holy Ghost, of which the outward unction was no more than a figure and symbol.—Calmet's Dictionary.

^a The words of Zacharias to the angel are, 'Whereby shall I know this? For I am an old man, and my wife well stricken in years? (Luke i. 18) much of the same import with those of Abraham upon a like occasion, 'Whereby shall I know that I shall inherit the land of Canaan?' (Gen. xv. 8.) How then came it to pass that Abraham was gratified with a sign in the same request for which Zacharias was punished with dumbness? Now, though there may be a very great similitude in the words which are spoken by several persons, yet there may, at the same time, be a very considerable difference in the heart and habit of mind from whence they proceed, which, we must allow, God can see much better than we can perceive by words. In relation to Abraham, then, the Holy Spirit bears him testimony, that 'he staggered not at the promise through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God, being fully persuaded, that what he had promised, he was able to perform' (Rom. iv. 19, 20, &c.); and therefore if he asked a sign, it was not to beget, but to nourish and confirm this faith in him. But in Zacharias, the asking of a sign savoured of perfect infidelity, in that he believed not an angel appearing to him in the name of the Lord, and in a place where evil angels durst not come: an angel telling him his prayer was heard, which evil angels could not know; and acquainting him with things which tended to the glory of God, the completion of his promises, and the welfare of mankind, which evil angels would not do. His punishment therefore was the just result of his unbelief; but, (what shows the mercy of God in inflicting it,) it was a punishment of such a nature, as carried with it an answer to his desire, being no more than a privation of speech, until the words of the angel were fulfilled.—Poole's and Whitby's Annotations.

^b The words of the text are, 'Behold thou shalt be dumb and not able to speak,' (Luke i. 20.) "The affirmation of a thing, joined with the denial of its contrary, is an idiom peculiar to the Jewish language, and is used to express the strongest affirmation possible. The style of the evangelist John is remarkable for the frequency of this idiom, and many instances of it are to be found in the Old Testament.—Macknight. There is no authority whatever in the text for the author's assertion, that Zacharias was deprived of his hearing, as well as of the power of speech. In verse 62 it is indeed said that his friends made signs to him, how he would have his son called, and some have inferred from this that he was both deaf and dumb, because, if he had only been dumb, there was no necessity for making signs to him, or for not asking the question directly in words. "But it must be observed, that we often use signs and gestures to those who hear us very well. So John xiii. 24. And this is especially done towards those who have lost the faculty of speech. Nor are we told that the friends of Zacharias did not also use words, and it is very probable that they did so."—Bloomfield.—En.

^c Nazareth was a little town of Zebulun in Lower Galilee, west of Tabor, and east of Ptolemais, celebrated for having been the residence of Christ for the first thirty-three years of his life. It is situated upon the side of a barren rocky elevation, facing the east, and commanding a long valley of a round concave form, and encompassed with mountains.—Calmet. "It seems," says our writer, "as if fifteen mountains met to form an enclosure for this delightful spot: they rise round it like the edge of a shell to guard it from intrusion. It is a rich and beautiful field in the midst of barren hills." The place is shown where the house of the Virgin Mary stood! but the house itself, say the Catholics, was transported by angels to Loretto!! Dr E. D. Clarke, who describes Nazareth, mentions the village of Sephourg, in which is shown the house of St Anne, the mother of the Virgin Mary, five miles from the town; the fountain near Nazareth, called "the Virgin Mary's fountain;" the great church or convent, at that time the refuge of wretches afflicted with the plague, hoping for recovery from the sanctity of the place; Joseph's workshop converted into a chapel; the synagogue wherein Jesus is said to have preached, now a church; the precipice whence the inhabitants would have thrown our Lord, concerning which the words of the evangelist are remarkably explicit, and it is probably the precise spot alluded to in the text of St Luke's gospel. A stone that is said to have served as a table to Christ and his disciples is an object of worship to the superstitious of Galilee. Buckingham estimates the inhabitants of Nazareth at about 2000, and the houses at 250, which are built of stone, flat-roofed, and of one story, but sufficiently spacious and commodious for the accommodation of a large family. The streets are steep, from the inclination of the ground on which they stand, narrow from custom, and dirty from the looseness of the soil.—Ed.

^d Espousing or betrothing was nothing else but a solemn promise of marriage, made by two persons, each to other, at such a distance of time as they agreed upon. The manner of performing this espousal was either by a writing, or by a piece of silver given to the bride, or by cohabitation. The writing that was prepared on these occasions ran in this form—"On such a day, of such a month, in such a year, A, the son of A, has said to B, the daughter of B, 'Be thou my spouse according to the law of Moses and the Israelites, and I will give thee for the portion of thy virginity, the sum of two hundred zuzims, as it is ordained by the law.' And the said B has consented to become his spouse upon these conditions, which the said A has promised to perform upon the day of marriage. To this the said A obliges himself; and for this he engages all his goods, even as far as the cloak which he wears upon his shoulders. Moreover, he promises to perform all that is intended in contracts of marriage, in favour of the Israelitish women. Witnesses, A, B, C." The promise by a piece of silver, and without writing, was made before witnesses, when the young man said to his mistress, "Receive this piece of silver as a pledge that you shall become my spouse."—Poole's Annotations; Calmet's Dictionary.—The espousals by money, or a written instrument, were performed by the man and woman under a tent or canopy erected for that purpose. Into this chamber the bridegroom was accustomed to go with his bride, that he might talk with her more familiarly; which was considered as a ceremony of confirmation to the wedlock. While he was there no person was allowed to enter; his friends and attendants waited for him at the door, with torches and lamps in their hands; and when he came out he was received by all that were present with great joy and ac-poused to one Joseph, a person of the same pedigree indeed, but of no higher profession than that of a carpenter. The angel, approaching the pious maid, began to congratulate her with 'being highly in the favour of God, and blessed above all the rest of her sex; because she should have the happiness of bearing a son, called by the name of Jesus^a or Saviour, the long expected Messiah; to whom God would give the throne^b of his clamation. To this ancient custom the psalmist alludes in his magnificent description of the heavens: 'In them he set a tabernacle for the sun; which, as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, rejoices as a strong man to run a race.' A Jewish virgin legally betrothed, was considered as a lawful wife; and by consequence could not be put away without a bill of divorce. And if she proved unfaithful to her betrothed husband, she was punished as an adulteress; and her seducer incurred the same punishment as if he had polluted the wife of his neighbour. This is the reason that the angel addressed Joseph, the betrothed husband of Mary, in these terms: 'Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife; for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost.' The evangelist Luke gives her the same title: 'And Joseph also went up from Galilee unto Bethlehem, to be taxed, with Mary his espoused wife.' Ten or twelve months commonly intervened between the ceremony of espousals and the marriage; during this interval the espoused wife continued with her parents, that she might provide herself with nuptial ornaments suitable to her station. This custom serves to explain a circumstance in Samson's marriage, which is involved in some obscurity: 'He went down,' says the historian, 'and talked with the woman (whom he had seen at Timnath), and she pleased him well.' These words seem to refer to the ceremony of espousals; the following to the subsequent marriage, 'And after a time he returned to take her.' Hence, a considerable time intervened between the espousals and their actual union. From the time of the espousals, the bridegroom was at liberty to visit his espoused wife in the house of her father, yet neither of the parties left their own abode during eight days before the marriage, but persons of the same age visited the bridegroom and made merry with him. These circumstances are distinctly marked in the account which the sacred historian has given us of Samson's marriage: 'So his father went down unto the woman, and made there a feast; for so used the young men to do. And it came to pass when they saw him, that they brought thirty companions to be with him.' These companions were the children of the bridechamber, of whom our Lord speaks: 'Can the children of the bridechamber mourn as long as the bridegroom is with them?'—Paton's Illustrations of the Holy Scriptures, vol. iii. pp. 137, 138.—Ed.

a We read but of few instances in scripture, where men had names determined for them by particular appointment from heaven, and before the time of their birth; and, as such names appear to be very significant, so the persons distinguished by them were always remarkable for some extraordinary qualities or events which their respective names were designed to denote. Our Lord's name indeed, in sense and substance, is the same with Joshua, that famous leader heretofore, who, after the death of Moses, settled the Israelites in the promised land, and subdued the enemies that opposed their entrance into it. But, as that earthly was a figure of the heavenly Canaan, so was the captain of that eminent type of our salvation; and if he was worthy to be called a Saviour, much more is this Jesus what his name imports; for he delivers us from the heaviest of all bondage, and from the most formidable of all enemies, as he, and he only it is, who saves his people from their sins.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. 1.

b The prophets in their predictions are very full and express, that the Messiah should be a great king, and descend from the line of David; (see Ps. x. 16, Is. ix. 6, 7, Dan. vii. 14, and Ezek. xxxi. 7) and therefore the angel in his message to Mary characterizes him as a successor to that prince's throne, and seems to accommodate himself in some measure to the prejudices of the Jews, and perhaps of the virgin-mother herself, who, being bred up in the synagogue, might expect that the Messiah should be a temporal prince, as well as they; but our Lord's kingdom, as himself plainly declares, is not of this world, father David, and of whose sovereignty and dominion there should be no end.^c

Conscious of her own virtue, and yet surprised at this uncommon appearance and salutation, the holy virgin^d began to expostulate with the heavenly messenger the possibility of the thing, since she had all along lived in a strict state of virginity. But the angel, to satisfy her in this particular, told her "that this wonderful work was to be effected by the invisible power and operation of the Holy Ghost; e and, to show her that nothing was nor of the like nature with other empires upon earth. His reign is in the hearts and minds of men, and his dominion is in the church, against which 'the gates of hell shall not prevail,' and in which, 'of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end,' (Is. ix. 7) 'until the end cometh, when he shall deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father,' (1 Cor. xv. 24).—Cabnet's Commentary.

c So the prophet Isaiah, ch. ix. 6, 7, 'Unto us a child is born,' &c. 'Of the increase of his government and peace' there shall be 'no end.' The kingdom of Christ is twofold: 1. His spiritual kingdom, or the dominion of righteousness in the minds of men: 2. His temporal kingdom, or the outward dispensation of the gospel, together with an exercise of government over the world, by which all events are ordered, so as to promote the empire of righteousness in the hearts of men. This distinction removes the difficulty arising from 1 Cor. xv. 28, where we are told, that after the worlds are judged, Christ shall deliver up the kingdom to God the Father: compared with what Gabriel said to Mary on this occasion, and with the other passages of scripture, which affirm that our Lord's kingdom shall be everlasting. His temporal kingdom, or the gospel dispensation, will end with the world being of no farther use. At that period likewise he will deliver up to God the government of the world that was committed to him for the good of his church, after having accomplished the end of his coming, by putting down all rule, and all authority and power opposite to God's. But his spiritual kingdom, or the dominion of righteousness in the minds of reasonable beings, which he came down to establish, will continue with them to all eternity. Or we may suppose, that after the management of the world is delivered up to God, Jesus will still preside as head over the redeemed society in heaven, and perform such acts of government as their condition allows and circumstances require, though still in subordination to God. For the apostle says expressly, that 'then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all.' Or the epithet everlasting, when applied to Christ's kingdom, may be taken in a popular sense, for a duration to the end of time, in opposition to the short continuance of earthly kingdoms.—Macknight's Harmony of the Gospels.

d The words of her expostulation are, 'How shall this be, seeing I know not a man?' Which some look upon as no more than a reply of admiration, and a desire to be farther informed in what manner God intended to effect such a wonderful work; though others perceive in them some small indications of diffidence, but what might be more excusable, because there had been no such precedent of the divine power made in the world, as to cause a virgin to conceive, and bring forth a son.—Poole's Annotations.

e The words in the text are, 'the Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee;' wherein, according to the usual modesty of scripture language, is implied all that action of the Holy Ghost whereby the blessed virgin was enabled to become fruitful, and the place of ordinary generation was in this case supplied. Now, when this action is in scripture represented as entirely the work of God, and yet is attributed to the Holy Ghost in particular, we are not to understand it so peculiarly his, that the two other persons, subsisting in the Godhead should have no concern in it: for here that rule of the school takes place, that the entire union of the divine nature makes all such actions common to all the three as do not refer to the properties and relations by which they stand distinguished from each other. As therefore the Holy Spirit began the first creation by moving, or brooding, as it were, upon the face of the waters, so did he here begin the new creation, by conveying a principle, or power of fruitfulness impossible to the Almighty, gave her to understand that her cousin Elizabeth, notwithstanding her old age, and former sterility, had been now six months with child." Whereupon the holy Virgin humbly acquiesced in whatever God had determined to do with her; and, as soon as the angel was departed, made preparations for her journey to Hebron,^a where her cousin lived.

As soon as she arrived at Zacharias's house, Elizabeth, upon hearing her first salutation, perceived that the child^b sprang in her womb, and, being inspired with the Holy Ghost, she cried out, "Blessed art thou above thy sex! blessed is the fruit of thy body! and how vast is my felicity to be visited by the mother of my Lord!" And having, by the same prophetic spirit, assured Mary of the accomplishment of every thing that the angel had told her, she so transported the blessed virgin, that she broke out into a rapture of thanksgivings^c to God, where-ness, into a person otherwise incapable of it. And yet, as there, without the Father, and his divine Word or Son, 'not any thing was made that was made,' (John i. 3,) so did he here bring this second, 'this creation of a new thing,' (Jer. xxxi. 22,) to effect, by the same co-operation of the whole undivided Trinity, as he had done the former.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. i.

^a This very probably was the place where Zacharias and Elizabeth lived, and where John the Baptist was born; because it was not only one of the cities appointed for the priests to dwell in, (Josh. xx. 7.) but situated likewise in mountains, which running cross the middle of Judea from south to north, gave the tract which they run along, the name of the 'hill-country.' Hebron was ten leagues distant from Jerusalem, and about forty from Nazareth, which made it a long journey for the blessed virgin, had not her zeal to go and partake in her cousin's joy (more than to satisfy her curiosity, whether what the angel had told her was true) made her surmount all difficulties.—Hell's Geography of the New Testament; and Calmet's Commentary. [Mary and Elizabeth might be cousins, as the text affirms, although the former was a descendant of David, and the latter a daughter of Aaron; because the law (Num. xxxvi. 6.) forbidding women to marry out of their own tribes, related only to heiresses, and consequently did not include the tribe of Levi, which had no particular heritable possessions that could be alienated by such marriages. Accordingly (Lev. xxii. 12.) it is supposed, as a common case, that a priest's daughter might be married to a stranger.—Macknight's Harmony.—Ed.]

^b It is said indeed of the Baptist, that he 'should be filled with the Holy Ghost from his mother's womb;' and from hence some have thought that this extraordinary motion of the child in Elizabeth was an act of his own, and proceeded from a sensation of joy, which himself felt at the salutation of the blessed virgin: but, besides that being filled with the Holy Ghost from his mother's womb, means no more, than that the power of the Holy Ghost should be discerned to be upon him very early, it is certain that infants in the womb are not capable of any joy themselves, as having no apprehensions of good to be enjoyed, or evil to be avoided; but, as they are sensibly affected with the joy, or grief, or surprise of the parent, to whom they are united, the uncommon motion of the child, at this conjuncture, must have been occasioned by the joy which transported his mother.—Hammond's and Whitby's Annotations.

^c It was customary among the Jews, for pious and devout persons, when they found themselves inspired, upon great and solemn occasions, to celebrate the praises of God in songs made on purpose. Several of this kind we meet with in the Old Testament; but this of the blessed virgin is the first that occurs in the New, and, for the majesty of its style, the nobleness of its sentiments, and that spirit of piety which runs through the whole, is inferior to none.—Calmet's Commentary. [The song of the virgin is considered by many to be the first piece of poetry in the New Testament; but the address of the angel to Zacharias, (ver. 13—17.) is delivered in the same way; so is that to the virgin, (ver. 30—33,) and so is also Elizabeth's answer to Mary, (ver. 42—45.) All these portions are easily reducible to the Kemistich form, in which the Hebrew poetry in she recounted his mercies, and the promises which he had made to the people of Israel, and which, by making her the blessed instrument of them, he was now about to fulfil.

About three months Mary continued with her cousin Elizabeth, and then returned home. Elizabeth, not long after, was delivered of a son; but, on the eighth day,^d when the child was to be circumcised and named, his relations and friends were not a little surprised to hear that he was to be called John,^e since none of the family bore that name; but their surprise became much greater when they found that, upon this occasion, his father's speech was immediately restored to him,^f which he employed in the praises of Almighty God, who had wrought such prodigies among them.

The holy virgin, being returned to Nazareth, still concealed the mystery which God had wrought in her from her espoused husband; but her pregnant symptoms soon discovered it; and though her deportment had been extremely chaste and modest, yet he might be well assured that she was with child. This raised no little concern in his breast; but, being a merciful good man,^g and of the Old Testament is found in many MSS., and in which Dr Kennicott has arranged the psalms and other poetical parts of the sacred writings.—Dr A. Carke on Luke i. 46.]—Ed.

^d The Jews had a positive command in their law, that no child should be circumcised before the eighth day; because the mother for seven days was reputed unclean, and so was the child by touching her, (Lev. xii. 1, 2,) but the law appointed no certain place in which circumcision was to be done, nor any certain person that was to perform it; neither did it enjoin that the child should have his name given him at that time, only the custom prevailed of doing it then; because, when God instituted the rite, he changed the names of Abraham and Sarah.—Whitby's Annotations.

^e The Jews, from their first beginning, seem to have made it a point of religion, to give such names to their children as were significative either of God's mercy to them, or of their duty to God, and from the passage now before us, (though it was no ancient usage,) it seems to be a custom introduced, at least in the days of Zacharias, to call children by the name of their parents, or the nearest relations, as it is usual now among us, if there was no particular reason to the contrary.—Poole's Annotations; and Calmet's Commentary.

^f These extraordinary circumstances, I mean the appearing of the angel to Zacharias in the temple; Zacharias's dumbness; Elizabeth's pregnancy, when past the age of child-bearing; and the restoration of Zacharias's speech on the day of his son's circumcision, were all wisely ordered by Providence, to accompany the conception and birth of John, that he who was the Messiah's forerunner might not seem an obscure and ordinary man, but one that was the peculiar object of the decrees and counsels of Heaven. He was introduced into the world in this magnificent manner, that the attention of his countrymen being awakened, and high expectations of him raised, he might execute the duties of his ministry with greater advantage, and effectually prepare the people for receiving the Messiah himself, who was soon to appear in person.—Macknight's Harmony.—Ed.]

^g The words in the text, as we translate them, are—'Joseph her husband being a just man;' but, if he was a just man, and was satisfied that his intended wife had, some way or other, violated her chastity, (as he knew nothing to the contrary at that time,) instead of screening her crime, he ought to have brought her to punishment, (Deut. xxii. 20, 21.) Now, it is to be observed that, upon the discovery of his wife's pregnancy, Joseph had the choice of three things. 1st, either he might, notwithstanding this, have taken her to his house as his wife, because the law of divorce laid none under an obligation, but gave a permission only, in case of some discovered uncleanness, to put away the wife: or, 2dly, he might give her a bill of divorcement, either in public or in private, (for that was unwilling either to expose the honour of her family, which he thought she had stained, or to inflict public punishment upon her, according to the sentence of the law; he resolved upon a separation ^a with the utmost privacy: but before he came to put it in execution, an angel from heaven ^b appeared to him in a vision, in-left to his opinion,) either before two or three witnesses, or before a proper magistrate, and that without specifying any crime against her: or, Jilly, he might, according to the law, have brought her upon her trial, whether in the matter of her pregnancy she had suffered a rape, or was herself consenting, (Deut. xxii. 23, 24.) Had therefore Joseph done the first of these, he must have acted counter to his own honour, and have incurred the common reproach, that he who retaineth an adulteress is a fool. Had he done the last of these, he was not sure of convicting her, because, upon examination, it might appear that she had been forced; and, in that case, the man that did it was to die, (Deut. xxii. 25;) or she might have been with child before her betrothing, and, in that case, she was only obliged to marry the person that had abused her, (ver. 28, 29.) Upon the whole, therefore, Joseph thought it the best and justest way to proceed upon the foot of a divorce. Mary's being visibly with child was reason sufficient to authorize his parting with her; but he did not know for certain that she was guilty of adultery, or that consequently she deserved to die; and therefore he did not think it right, by bringing her upon her trial, to expose her.—Poole's Annotations; and Cabnet's Commentary; and Spanheim's Dub. Evang. part i. dub. 31. [Considerable diversity of opinion exists as to the interpretation of the text here quoted. Instead of 'a just man,' as in our version, Dr Campbell renders 'a worthy man,' and others, such as Grotius, Hammond, Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, 'a kind or humane man.' Dr Boothroyd's version is 'a righteous man,' which certainly expresses the usual sense of the original term δικαιος, and includes, as he remarks, "all that is essential in a truly good and pious character." Dr Bloomfield observes, that the term δικαιος in its usual acceptation denotes 'lover of justice,' and 'a man of uprightness and integrity.' Joseph being such, determined to put away his betrothed wife by law; and yet with that mercy which ever accompanies true justice, he waited not to make her a public example, but to put her away privately; that is, with only two witnesses required to attest the delivery of the bill of divorce; which did not necessarily state the reason, for the divorcement.]—Bloomfield's Greek New Testament—Ed.

^a The common way of separation among the Jews was, by the man's giving the woman a letter of divorce. This, in their language, is called Geth, and the substance of it is to this effect:—"On such a day, month, and year, and at such a place, I A divorce you voluntarily, put you away, and restore you to your liberty, even you B, who was heretofore my wife; and I permit you to marry whom you please." When the day of divorce comes, the rabbi that attends, having strictly examined both parties, and finding that they are resolved to part, bids the woman open her hands, and when she has received the deed, to close them both together, lest it should chance to fall to the ground. The man, when he gives her the parchment, (for on parchment the bill of divorce was to be written, in the presence of two rabbins, and with many other trifling circumstances,) tells her, "Here is thy divorce, I put thee away from me, and leave thee at liberty to marry whom thou pleasest;" and, when the woman has taken it, and the rabbi read it over once more, she is entirely free. There is in this ceremony, however, to be remarked, that they always endeavour to have ten or twelve persons at it, besides the two witnesses who sign the deed. When therefore Joseph intended to dismiss Mary privately, it could not be, by having no witnesses at all, but as few as the nature of the thing would bear, and by giving her the letter of divorce into her own hand, which she might suppress, if she thought fit, or by inserting no accusation against her in it, in case it came to be read before the company.—Cabnet's Dictionary under the word Divorce; Whitby and Beausobre's Annotations.

^b This vision was in a dream, and while he was asleep; and dreams, we know, were one way whereby God revealed his mind to the people formerly, (Job vii. 14,) whereby he made himself known to his prophets, (Num. xii. 6,) and not to prophets only, forming him, "that his wife's conception was the immediate work of the Holy Ghost, that she should bear a son, the same person ² whom the prophet had foretold under the name Emanuel, or God with us:" whereupon Joseph was not disobedient to the heavenly vision, but taking the holy virgin home to him, he lived with her, to all outward appearance, in conjugal love, though he certainly had no carnal knowledge of her, ^c till she was delivered of her first-born son, who, by a lineal descent, was true heir to the kingdom of Israel, as sprung from the house of David.

Some time before this, Augustus Cæsar had issued out a general edict, that all persons in the Roman empire, with their estates and conditions, should be registered at certain appointed places, according to their respective provinces, cities, and families. By virtue of this edict, Joseph and his wife Mary being both of the tribe of Judah, and family of David, were obliged to go but to pagan princes sometimes, as appears by the instances, both of Pharaoh and Nebuchadnezzar, (Gen. xli. 1.; Dan. ii. 1.) But how to distinguish divine from natural dreams, it is difficult to say, unless it be by the clear and distinct series of their representation, and the forcible impression which they leave upon men's spirits; whereas natural dreams, for the most part, are rambling and inconsistent, and 'whose regardeth them,' says the wise son of Sirach, 'is like him who catcheth at a shadow, or followeth after the wind,' (Eccles. xxxiv. 2.)—Poole's Annotations. Why God reveals himself by dreams, and in the nighttime; see Spanheim's Dub. Evang. part ii. dub. 59.

^c The word first-born in scripture admits of various significations. Sometimes, and most commonly indeed, it denotes the eldest of two or more children, as Eliab is called the first-born of Jesse, 1 Sam. xvii. 13; at others, the first that is born, without regard to any else, as when God says to Moses, 'sanctify me all the first-born,' Exod. xiii. 2. In some places it imports figuratively what is most dearly beloved by us; in which sense God frequently calls the Israelites his first-born; and in others, what is most remarkable for greatness or excellency, as God promises David, who was but a younger brother of the family, to 'make him the first-born of the kings of the earth,' Ps. lxxxix. 27. In any of these three last senses our Saviour might very properly be called his mother's first-born son, forasmuch as he was really her first child; her most and only beloved; and the most illustrious of his race: but then Joseph's not knowing his wife until she was delivered of her first-born son, seems to imply, that he knew her afterwards. Those who maintain the perpetual virginity of the blessed mother, tell us, that ως οτι, which we render until in several places of scripture, has relation only to the time which precedes, and not to that which follows any event; so that 'he knew her not until,' may be taken in the same sense as Samuel 'came not to see Saul till the day of his death,' 1 Sam. xv. 35, that is, he never came to see him; but, besides that most of the passages which are produced to this purpose, are far from coming up to the case in hand, since the angel commanded 'Joseph to take Mary as his wife,' without any intimation that he should not perform the duty of a husband to her, it is not easy to conceive why he should live twelve years with her, and all that while deny that duty which both the law and the canons of the Jews command the husband to pay his wife, Exod. xxi. 10. If we imagine, that our Saviour would have been dishonoured in any other's lying in the same bed after him, we seem to forget how much he humbled and debased himself in lying in that bed first, and then in a stable and a manger. But, leaving this question to those who affect to be curious beyond what is written, we may safely conclude with St Basil, "That though it was necessary for the completion of the prophecy, that the mother of our Lord should continue a virgin, until she had brought forth her first-born; yet what she was afterwards it is idle to discuss, because it is of no manner of concern to the mystery."—Howell's History in the notes; Poole's and Whitby's Annotations; and *Spanheim's Dub. as far as Bethlehem, ^a which was the mother city of their tribe, there to have their names and estates enrolled. ¹ The great conflux of people upon this occasion had already filled all the inns, ^b and houses of reception, so

^a Bethlehem, now called Beit-Lahim, was a celebrated city about six miles south-west from Jerusalem: it was formerly called Ephrath or Ephrata. (Gen. xxxv. 19.; xlviii. 7.; Mic. v. 2.) It was a city in the time of Boaz (Ruth iii. 11.; iv. 1.), and was fortified by Rehoboam. (2 Chron. xi. 6.) In Mat. ii. 1, 5, it is called Bethlehem of Judaea, to distinguish it from another town of the same name situated in Lower Galilee, and mentioned in Josh. xix. 15. In Luke ii. 4, it is called the 'city of David,' because David was born and educated there. (Compare John vii. 42.; and 1 Sam. xvi. 1, 18.) This city, though not considerable for its extent or riches, is of great dignity as the appointed birth-place of the Messiah (Mat. ii. 6.; Luke ii. 6.—15.); it is pleasantly situated on the brow of an eminence, in a very fertile soil, which only wants cultivation to render it what the name Bethlehem imports—a house of bread. Between the clefts of the rock, when the soil is cultivated, vines, figs, and olives, appear to grow in great luxuriance. Bethlehem is said to be nearly as large as Nazareth, and to contain from a thousand to fifteen hundred inhabitants, who are almost wholly Christians. On the north-eastern side of it is a deep valley, where tradition says that the angels appeared to the shepherds of Judaea, with the glad tidings of our Saviour's nativity (Luke ii. 8.—14.); and in this valley Dr Clarke halted at the identical fountain for whose delicious water David longed. (2 Sam. xxiii. 15.—18.) Of the various pretended holy places which are here shown to Christians, the cave of the nativity is the only spot verified by tradition from the earliest ages of Christianity. Between one and two miles from this place, on the road to Jerusalem, stood the site of Rachel's tomb, (Gen. xxxv. 19, 20.; 1 Sam. x. 2.) which is now covered by a small square Mohammedan building, surmounted by a dome, and resembling in its exterior the tombs of saints and sheiks in Arabia and Egypt." In the vicinity of Bethlehem are the pools of Solomon, which seem to have been connected with a scheme for supplying Jerusalem with water.—Horne's Introduction.—Ed.

^b There appear to be three descriptions of these buildings. Some are simply places of rest, by the side of a fountain, if possible, which being at proper distances on the road, are thus named, though they are mere naked walls; others have an attendant, who subsists either by some charitable donation, or the benevolence of passengers; and others are more considerable establishments, where families reside and take care of them, and furnish many necessary provisions. Conformably to these ideas, the scripture uses at least two words to express a caravanserai, though our translators have rendered both by the same term inn. Thus, Luke ii. 7. 'There was no room for them in the inn.' (καταλύματα,) 'the place of muting,' of beasts, &c., for rest. (Luke x. 34.) The good Samaritan 'brought him to the (πανδοχείου) inn,' (whose keeper is called in the next verse Πανδοχίδης,) a receptacle open to all comers. It may reasonably be supposed, that a caravanserai in a town should be better furnished than one in the country, in a retired place, and where few travellers pass; and Mr Taylor therefore inclines against Harmer, (Obs. vol. iii. p. 218,) to think that the inn, to which the good Samaritan is represented as conducting the wounded traveller, was intentionally described of an inferior kind. If so, we may reasonably take the other word, 'the muting place,' as denoting a larger edifice; and this accounts for the evangelist Luke's mention of there being no room (τοπος) in it: as if he had said, 'though it was large enough for such occasions as usually occurred in the town of Bethlehem, yet now every apartment in this receptacle was occupied; so that no privacy fit for a woman in the situation of Mary could be had:—' especially, as Colonel Campbell has informed us, 'they are continually attended by numbers of the very lowest of the people'—very unfit associates for Mary at any time, and certainly in her present condition! 'Caravanserais were originally intended for, and are now pretty generally applied to, the accommodation of strangers and travellers; though, like every other good institution, sometimes perverted to the purposes of private emolument, or public job. They are built at proper distances through the roads of the Turkish dominions, sad aloud to the indigent and weary traveller, an asylum from that no better place could be found for their lodging than a stable, where they had not been long before the blessed virgin was delivered of a son, whom (herself performing the office of a midwife) ^c she bound in swaddling clothes, and laid down to rest in a manger. But, notwithstanding this obscurity of our Saviour's birth, (God was pleased, that very night, by the message of an angel, with a radiant light surrounding him, to make a pompous revelation of it to certain poor shepherds who were attending their flocks on the plains of Bethlehem; and, after one angel had delivered the joyful tidings, an innumerable company of the same celestial choir broke out all together into this triumphant doxology, 'Glory be to God on high, peace on earth, and good will towards men.'²

the inclemency of the weather. They have commonly one story above the ground-floor, the lower of which is arched, and serves for warehouses to store goods, for lodgings, and for stables, while the upper is used merely for lodgings; besides which they are always accommodated with a fountain, and have cooks' shops and other conveniences to supply the wants of lodgers."—Campbell's Travels, part ii. p. 8. This description applies, of course, to the better sort of caravanserais. The nearest construction amongst us to a caravanserai, appears in some of our old inns, where galleries, with lodging rooms in them, run round a court, or yard; but then, as travellers in the east always carry with them their own bedding, &c., it is evident that our inns are better provided than the best Eastern caravanserais. It is necessary to keep this in mind; because we must not suppose that Joseph and Mary travelled without taking the necessary utensils with them; or that they could have procured, in this inn, any thing beyond provisions and lodging. Perhaps even they could not have procured provisions. But of the poverty of their eastern inns, we shall obtain a pretty distinct idea from the following extract: "There are no inns any where; but the cities, and commonly the villages, have a large building called a Khan, or Kervanseraï, which serves as an asylum for all travellers. These houses of reception are always built 'without the precincts of towns, and consist of four wings round a square court, which serves by way of enclosure for the beasts of burden. The lodgings are cells, where you find nothing but bare walls, dust, and sometimes scorpions. The keeper of this khan gives the traveller the key and a mat: and he provides himself with the rest. He must, therefore, carry with him his bed, his kitchen utensils, and even his provisions; for frequently not even bread is to be found in the villages. On this account the orientals contrive their equipage in the most simple and portable form. The baggage of a man who wishes to be completely provided, consists in a carpet, a mattress, a blanket, two saucapans with lids, contained within each other, two dishes, two plates, and a coffee-pot, all of copper well tinted; a small wooden box, for salt and pepper; a round leathern table, which he suspends from the saddle of his horse; small leathern bottles or bags for oil, melted butter, water, and brandy, if the traveller be a Christian; a pipe, a tinder-box, a cup of cocoa-nut, some rice, dried raisins, dates, Cyprus cheese, and above all, coffee-berries, with a roaster, and wooden mortar to pound them. I am thus particular, to prove that the Orientals are more advanced than we, in the art of dispensing with many things, an art which is not without its use. Our European merchants are not contented with such simple accommodations."—(Falconer's Travels, vol. ii. p. 419, Eng., edit.) The reader will bear this account in mind; for we shall find that he is not a poor man in the east, who possesses this quantity of utensils. One would hope that at Bethlehem, 'the house of bread,' it was not difficult to procure that necessary of life."—Calmet's Dictionary.—Ed.

^c Which she could not have done, to be sure, had she been delivered in the common manner of other women: but it was always the opinion of the church, from the days of Gregory Nazianzen until now, though before his days there were some opinions to the contrary, that, as there was no sin in the conception, so neither had the virgin any pains in the production; for to her alone the punishment of Eve, that 'in sorrow she should bring forth children,' did not extend; because, where nothing of sin was the ingredient, there nothing of misery could colohabit.—Taylor's Life of Christ.

A. M. 4001. A. C. 3; ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 5407. A. C. 4. FROM BEGIN. OF GOSP. TO MAT. IX. 8. MARK XI. 23. LUKE VI. 1.

No sooner was this heavenly concert ended, but the overjoyed shepherds, remembering the signs which the angel, before he disappeared, had given them, immediately hastened to Bethlehem, where they found the virgin-mother, and Joseph the supposed father, attending the Godlike babe, whom, in humble reverence they adored, and then returned, praising and extolling the mercies of God, and, to the great amazement of all that heard them, publishing in all places what they knew concerning this child.

As soon as the child was eight days old, his parents had him circumcised ^a according to the law; when, pursuant to the order which the angel had given before his conception, they called his name Jesus; and, as soon as he was forty days old, two other ceremonies were performed, namely, the purification ^b of his mother, and the presentation of her first-born. Though therefore her son's immaculate conception needed not that ceremony; yet the holy virgin went up with Joseph to Jeru-

^a Our blessed Lord, as he was the supreme lawgiver of the world, was not in strictness bound to the observation of his own law, nor did he stand in any need of circumcision, considered as a remedy against original sin; because, in his incarnation, he contracted no pollution; but, as he was 'made of a woman, made under the law,' and 'came (as himself testifies, Mat. iii. 15.) 'to fulfil all righteousness,' it became him to receive the character which distinguished the Jews from all other nations. Among the Jews, indeed, it was thought a reproach to keep company with persons that were not circumcised: 'thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and didst eat with them,' is the accusation which they brought against St Peter, Acts xi. 3; and therefore, as our Lord was sent chiefly to the lost sheep of Israel, he could not have been qualified for their acceptance and free conversation had he not submitted to this ordinance. Of him was that most glorious of all the promises made to Abraham intended, 'In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed,' Gal. iii. 16. And therefore fit it was that he should have the seal or testimony of circumcision, in order to show that he was truly and rightly descended of that ancestor: and, as he was come to be the Mediator of a new and better covenant, it was but decent that the former should recede with honour, and, that it might do so, himself should approve of a sacrament which was both of divine institution, and a means of admission into that former covenant.—Poole's Annotations; and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. i.

^b The law concerning the purification of women, we have in the twelfth chapter of Leviticus, wherein it is ordained that a woman, after bearing of children, should continue, for a certain number of days, in a state which the law termed unclean. For the first seven days, all conversation or contact polluted them that approached her, and for three and thirty days more, which in all amounted to forty, she was still, though in an inferior degree, reputed unclean: but, at the expiration of this term, if her child was a son, (for the time was double for a daughter,) she was commanded to bring a burnt-offering, and a sin-offering, which wiped out the stain which the law laid upon her, and restored her to all the purity and privileges she had before. Now, though the miraculous conception of the blessed virgin set her quite above any obligation to the law of impurity, yet, since her being a mother was sufficiently notorious, though the manner of her being so was a secret, it was fit that she should submit, as the known mother of a son, to the ceremonies expected from her. Her sin-offering was not indeed due in any sense; but she lay under the same legal incapacity in the eye of the world as other women did, and was to be restored to the temple by it. Her burnt-offering was not due as that of other parents is, to commemorate a deliverance from pangs and danger; but never sure were thanks so justly due for any son as this; never from any mother as from her, who had the honour to bring forth her own, and the world's Saviour, the blessing and expectation of all the earth. As therefore he was circumcised in his own person, though the mystical and moral part of circumcision had nothing to do with him; so his mother submitted to all the purifications of any other Israelitish woman, though she partook not in any degree of the infirmities and pollutions common to other births.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iv.

^c What the blessed virgin offered, we read, was a pair of turtles, which being the oblation appointed only for the meaner sort of people, Lev. xii. 6, 8, discovers the poverty of Joseph and Mary, that they could not reach to a lamb of the first year, the offering which they who had ability were obliged to make.—Hübly's Annotations.

^d The rite of redemption was instituted to perpetuate the memory of the divine mercy, which spared the first-born of Israel, when those of Egypt, men and beasts, were destroyed. Accordingly, by this title God claimed the whole first-born of Israel, in all succeeding generations, as his property; ordering the firstlings of clean beasts to be offered to him in sacrifice, and the first-born of men to be presented before him in the temple, as an acknowledgment of his right to them; but at the same time permitting their parents to redeem them; by paying to the priests five shekels in value about twelve shillings and sixpence of our money; a sum that was exacted for the redemption of every first-born son whatever, without regard to the condition of the family. Num. xviii. 15, 16.—Macknight's Harmony.—Ed.

After these legal performances and solemn testimonies in favour of the child, Joseph and Mary returned to Jerusalem, there to offer the sacrifice ^e prescribed by the law for her own purification, and there to present her son to the Lord, by delivering him into the priest's hands, and redeeming him again for five shekels. ^f But, while she was in the temple performing this, old Simeon ^g who had long waited for the redemption of Israel, and had been promised, by the mouth of heaven, that he should not leave this world, before he had seen the illustrious person who was to affect it, came in, and taking the blessed infant in his arms, in an heavenly ecstasy praised God for the completion of his promises, in letting him live to see the Saviour of the world, before he quitted it. ^h And no sooner had he ended his divine rapture, but an ancient widow of the tribe of Aser, whose name was Anna, and whose piety and devotion, severity of life, and constant frequentation of the public worship, were very remarkable, coming into the temple, and being herself likewise excited by a prophetic spirit, gave God thanks for his infinite mercies; testifying that this child was the true Messiah, and declaring the same to all such devout persons in Jerusalem as waited for his coming.

^e Some are of opinion, that this Simeon was the son and successor of Hillel, a very famous doctor in the Jewish church before our Saviour's time, and that he was either the father or master of Gamaliel, at whose feet St Paul was educated. But, besides that, we can hardly suppose, how a person of this note could make so public a declaration in favour of our Lord, and yet no more notice be taken of it, if we look into the several revelations which God at this time was pleased to give of his Son, we shall find that none of them were directed to any of the Pharisees, or principal doctors of the law, but that to Joseph a carpenter, to Zacharias an ordinary priest, and to a company of poor shepherds, such discoveries were made: and therefore it is much more reasonable to presume that this Simeon, to whom God had revealed the time of Christ's coming, was some honest plain man, more remarkable for his piety and devotion than any other quality or accomplishment.—Poole's Annotations; Cabinet's Commentary and Dictionary, under the word Simeon.

^f The words of the text are, 'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace according to thy word, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation,' Lu. ii. 29, 30. The sense of the passage is 'now Lord thou dost, by this sight, dismiss me to the grave as thou promisedst, in peace and tranquillity, because mine eyes have seen thy salvation;' that is, the author of it. The aged saint, by a beautiful figure, takes this sight of his Redeemer as a dismissal from the burden of life, a sort of go in peace.—Bloomfield's Greek Test.—Ed.

Bethlehem, ^a where, in a very short time, they were visited by certain strangers, coming from afar, of a rank and character somewhat extraordinary. For God, to notify the birth of his Son to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews, caused an uncommon star to arise in the east, which some wise men, or astronomers, in those parts observing, and understanding withal that this was to signify the birth of the Messiah promised to the Jews, travelled to the metropolis of Judea, there inquiring after this new-born prince, that they might testify their homage and adoration of him. Their public character and appearance, and their openly calling him the 'king of the Jews,' put Herod ^b into a great consternation, and the whole city indeed into no small commotion, as both fearing and hoping something extraordinary.

Herod however, being resolved to destroy this supposed rival in his kingdom, immediately assembled the whole body of the sanhedrim, and demanded of them the very place where the Messiah should be born. Bethlehem, in the land assigned to the tribe of Judah, they told him, was the very spot which the Holy Spirit, by the prophet Micah, had marked out for this great event; which when he understood, he dismissed the assembly; and sending for the above-mentioned astronomers, with the utmost secrecy he inquired of them the exact time of the star's first appearance, and then dismissed them to Bethlehem, with orders to make diligent search for the young prince, and, when they had discovered where he was, to bring him word to Jerusalem, that he, in like manner, might go and pay him his homage: but this pretence of worshipping was no more than a cloak to his intention of killing the child.

These persons, however, having received the king's instructions, ^c departed towards Bethlehem, and in their

^a The words in St Luke are, 'When they had performed all things according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee, to their own city Nazareth,' chap. ii. 39, which must be interpreted of some time at least after they had performed these things; for, upon supposition that the magians came to Bethlehem, after that Joseph and Mary had been at Jerusalem with the child, upon the child's return from thence, his parents must have taken Bethlehem in their way, and there made some small stay, in which time we suppose that the wise men came, before they departed to the place of their settled abode: because the other two suppositions, namely, that the wise men came to Bethlehem before the presentation of the child at Jerusalem, or that they came not till he was in the second year of his age, when his parents, upon some business or other, happened to be at Bethlehem, are attended with more difficulties than can be easily surmounted.—See Spanheim's Dub. Evang. part ii. dub. 25, 26.

^b Herod, who was naturally of a jealous and suspicious temper, knew very well that himself was hated by the Jews, and that the Jews were then in full expectation of the Messiah, a prince that was to subdue all other nations, to come and reign over them, and had therefore great reason to fear that this rumour of a king's being born among them, confirmed by such extraordinary means, as persons coming from a far country, and conducted to Jerusalem by the guidance of a wonderful star, might be a means to excite sedition among the people, and occasion perhaps a revolution in the government.—Calmel's Commentary.

^c Some upon this occasion are apt to wonder why none of the Jews should have the curiosity to attend the wise men in their journey to Bethlehem: and the reason that is commonly assigned for their omission in this respect, is the dread they might have of offending the tyrant under whom they lived: but, as it is highly probable that when the wise men came to Jerusalem, they made their immediate application to court as the most likely place where to gain intelligence of him that was born way were very agreeably surprised with a new sight of the same miraculous star they had seen in their own country, which went before them, and like the fiery pillar in the wilderness, directed them to the very house where Jesus and his mother abode. As soon as they entered in they fell prostrate on the ground, according to the eastern custom, and having in this manner adored the child ^d presented him with the richest products of their country, gold, and precious odours, more particularly frankincense and myrrh.

Having thus performed their homage and congratulations, these eastern strangers were thinking of nothing more than to return to Jerusalem, and acquaint Herod with the happy discovery they had made; but God, who knew the heart of that tyrant, prevented them by a vision that very night, which directed them into their own country another way; and, not long after, sent an angel to Joseph to acquaint him with Herod's intended cruelty against the child, and to order him to retire into Egypt with him and his mother, and there to continue till farther notice; which Joseph instantly obeyed, and, for fear of discovery, taking the advantage of the night, with all possible speed set forward for Egypt.

In the mean time Herod waited impatiently for the return of the eastern sages; but at length, finding himself deluded, and his most secret and subtle designs king of the Jews; and as it is much to be questioned whether Herod, when he convened the doctors of the law, made any mention of the wise men's coming, but nakedly propounded the question to them, 'Where Christ was to be born?' So there is great reason to presume that he sent them away so privately, that if any of the Jews had been courageous enough to have gone along with them, they possibly might not have had an opportunity. The greater wonder of the two therefore is, that Herod, should send none in whom he could confide to be present at the discovery of this rival prince, and to bring him word thereof, if not dispatch him; but in this the protection and providence of God was visible.—Poole's Annotations.

^d Some of the ancients are of opinion, that in the presents which these eastern sages made, they had a mystical meaning, and designed to signify their acknowledgment both of the divinity, royalty, and humanity of our blessed Saviour: for the incense, say they, was proper to be given to him as a God, the gold as a king, and the myrrh as a mortal man, whose body was to be embalmed therewith. But all this is no more than the sport of a luxuriant fancy. It is certain that the eastern people never came into the presence of their princes without some presents, and that their presents were usually of the most choice things that their country did afford. All that they meant, therefore, was to do homage to a new born prince of a neighbouring nation, in the best manner they could; and if what naturalists tell us be true, namely, that myrrh was only to be found in Arabia, and frankincense in Sabæa, which is part of Arabia, and that this country was not destitute of gold (2 Chron. ix. 14), and at the same time was famous for men conversant in astronomy, this makes a very probable argument, that the wise men came from thence. But of this we shall see more hereafter.—Poole's Annotations.—[The gold and frankincense which the wise men presented was a most seasonable and providential assistance to furnish Joseph and Mary for so long and expensive a journey as that into Egypt, a country where they were entirely strangers, and yet were able to abide there for some considerable time. I take it for granted that the magi had some divine or human instruction, which Joseph and Mary might indeed give them, that Jesus was to save his people from their sins, and was Emmanuel, God with us. Surely God would not have guided them in this extraordinary manner merely to pay a transient compliment to Jesus. Their prostration probably expressed religious adoration as well as civil respect; and it is not unlikely that their report might in due time make way for the reception of the gospel in the country from whence they came.—Doddridge's Expositor.—Ed.]

blasted, he fell into a most violent rage and fury; and, having resolved to effect by cruelty what he had been disappointed of doing by policy, he sent out his soldiers, and ^a made a bloody massacre of all the children in the city of Bethlehem, and the neighbouring towns, that were ^b two years of age and under, including herein the whole time, and more, that the wise men had told him, and not doubting, but that, in this general slaughter, he should dispatch the young prince whom he so much dreaded: but God had provided him with a safe retreat. The shrieks, however, of tender mothers for their innocent babes, and the groans of expiring infants, which on this occasion filled the skies, were inexpressible, and were one reason, doubtless, why the divine vengeance, not long after, overtook this tyrant, and ^c smote him with a

^a It is thought strange by some that Josephus, who writes the life of Herod in most of its circumstances, should make no manner of mention of the murder of these innocents: but, when it is considered that Josephus was only born in the first year of Caligula, and the thirty-seventh year of Christ, that he wrote his history of the Jewish wars, which he extracted from public records, in the fifty-sixth year of his age; and that it can scarce be supposed an action so inglorious to the memory of Herod as this massacre was, should be preserved in the Jewish records; it is not so very wonderful that he, who wrote above ninety-three years after the fact was committed, should make no mention of it; nor is it very material that he did not, since we find Macrobius, an heathen author, about the latter end of the fourth age, not forgetting to acquaint us, that, "Herod the king ordered to be slain in Syria, which, in Roman authors, is frequently set for Judea, some children, that were under two years old;" though he is mistaken in the circumstances of the story, when he makes Herod's own son to be one of them.—Saturn. b. ii. c. 4.—The massacre of the infants is likewise noticed in a rabbinical work called Toldoth Jeshu, in the following passage:—"And the king gave orders for putting to death every infant to be found in Bethlehem, and the king's messengers killed every infant according to the royal order."—Dr. G. Sharpe's first Defence of Christianity.—Ed.

^b Some will needs infer from hence, that this dreadful massacre was not committed until our Lord was almost two years old, because they were children of that age, and under, whom Herod ordered to be slain: but, besides that the word δυστης, may signify one who has lived one year only, and so the words ἀπὸ δυστοῦς καὶ κατωτέρω, may be translated, from a year old, and under; Herod might possibly think, that the star did not appear till some considerable time after the young king's birth, and so, to make sure work, might be induced to slay all born at Bethlehem a year before, and more even to the time of the star's appearing. For he who had the heart to slay three of his own sons would hardly be sparing of the blood of other people's children.—Whitby's Annotations.

^c The disease of which he died, and the misery which he suffered under it, plainly showed, that the hand of God was then, in a signal manner, upon him. For, not long after the murder of the infants at Bethlehem, his distemper, as Josephus informs us, daily increased, after an unheard of manner, and he himself laboured under the most loathsome and tormenting accidents that can be imagined. "He had a lingering and wasting fever, and grievous ulcers in his entrails and bowels; a violent cholick, an insatiable appetite, venomous swelling in his feet, convulsions in his nerves, a perpetual asthma, and stinking breath, rottenness in his joints and privy members, accompanied with prodigious itchings, crawling worms, and intolerable smells, so that he was a perfect hospital of incurable diseases." And thus he died in horrid pain and torment, being smitten by God for his many enormous iniquities. For, setting aside some appearances of generosity and greatness, there was never a more complete tyrant than he. He suppressed and changed the high priest's office as he thought fit, and even profaned the temple itself. He slew the legal king of the Jews, extirpated all the race of the Maccabees, destroyed the whole sanhedrim, and substituted others in their room; nor was his rage confined to the Jews, but descended to his own family and nearest relations, even to the executing strange and terrible distemper, which put an end to his wicked and brutal life.

his beloved wife Mariamne, and his own sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, upon slight and trivial occasions. So wicked a prince, as he was conscious he had been, could not, he knew, occasion any true lamentation at his death, but rather a great deal of gladness and rejoicing all the kingdom over; and therefore, to prevent this, he framed a project, which was one of the most horrid that ever entered into the mind of man. All the nobility, and most considerable men in every city, town, and village in Judea, upon pain of death, he summoned to come together to Jericho, where he was then lying sick, and when they were come, commanded his soldiers to shut them all up in a spacious place, called the Hippodrome: when having called his sister Salome and her husband Alexas, with some choice friends, he told them with tears, "that he was sensible of the Jews' hatred to his government and person, and that his death would be a high satisfaction to them; that his friends therefore ought to procure him some solace in the midst of his bitter anguish, which if they performed according to his order, the mournings and lamentations at his death would be as great and magnificent as ever any prince had; and this order was, that, on the same hour when he expired, the soldiers should surround the Hippodrome, and put all the enclosed persons to the sword, and then publish his death, which, as he said, would cause his exit to be doubly triumphant, first, for the posthumous execution of his commands; and secondly, for the quality and number of his mourners." But Salome and Alexas, not being wicked enough to do what they had been made solemnly to promise, chose rather to break their obligation, than make themselves the executioners of so bloody a design; and, therefore, as soon as Herod was dead, they opened the Hippodrome, and permitted all that were shut up in it to return to their respective homes.—Josephus on the Jewish War, b. i. c. 18. Prideaux's Connection, part ii; and Euclid's Ecclesiastical History, b. i.

^d This Antipas, his father Herod had once appointed to be his successor in his kingdom, but afterwards expunged him out of his will, and only made him tetrarch; but, not long after his brother's accession to the throne, he went to Rome, with a purpose to dispute the kingdom with him, on pretence that his father's former will, by which he was constituted king, ought to take place before the latter, which was made when his understanding was not so perfect. Both the brothers procured able orators to set forth their pretensions before the emperor, but the emperor nevertheless refused to decide any thing concerning their affair, nor did he at length give Archelaus the title of a king, but only of an ethnarch, with one moiety of the territories which his father enjoyed: but these, in a few years after, he, by his ill conduct, forfeited. Of all the sons of Herod, indeed, this Archelaus is said to have been of the most fierce and bloody temper. At his first accession to the government, under the pretence of a mutiny, he had killed near three thousand of his subjects; and therefore Joseph, hearing of this, might well dread to go and settle in any part of his dominions; but, as Antipas was a man of a more mild disposition, and the birth of Jesus not made so of his brother Herod Antipas, in Galilee, to his former habitation in Nazareth, where the strange occurrences of our Lord's birth were not so well known. ^a After this, we have no certain account either of him, or his parents, only that they annually repaired with him to Jerusalem at the passover; and that, as his body increased in stature, so, ^b more especially the faculties of his soul were enlarged, being highly replenished with wisdom, and the grace of God.

In the mean time, ¹ Archelaus, following the steps of his father, made himself so odious to the Jews, that the principal men among them, joining with those of Samaria, made a public complaint of him to Augustus, who, upon a full hearing both of his crimes and vindication, deprived him of his government, confiscated all his goods, banished him to Vienna, a city in Gaul, and reduced his dominions to the form of a Roman province, which, for ever after, was ruled by a governor sent from Rome, who was called by the name of procurator, but, in some cases, was subject to the president or governor of Syria.

When Palestine was reduced to this state, and our blessed Saviour now advanced to the twelfth year of his age, ^c he went up with his parents, according as their custom was, to Jerusalem at the time of the passover. His parents, after a stay of the whole seven days, having performed the usual ceremonies of the feast, were now returning, with great numbers of their neighbours and acquaintance, towards Galilee, and, never doubting but that Jesus had joined himself with some of the company, they travelled on patiently for a whole day's journey: but, when night came on, and, among their relations and particular friends they could hear no tidings of him, it is not easy to imagine the greatness of their fears and ^d apprehensions, which made them return to Jerusalem with the utmost speed, to make all possible inquiry for him.

^e At the end of three days, they found him in one of the rooms of the temple, probably in that of the grand sanhedrim, sitting among the learned doctors and masters of Israel, hearing them discourse, and propounding such questions to them as raised the admiration of all that heard him, and made them astonished at the ripeness of his understanding. Nor were his parents less surprised to find him in that place; but, when his mother told him, with what impatience they had sought him, and, in some measure, blamed him for putting them in such a fright, the excuse which he made for himself was, 'know ye not, that I must be employed in my Father's house?' ^f public in Galilee, and at Nazareth, as it was at Bethlehem, and even at Jerusalem, by the coming of the wise men, and what happened at the purification of the blessed virgin, it was thought more advisable to retreat into this village, than to set up his abode in any populous city.—Poole's Annotations.

^a N. B. That the vulgar Christian era, according to Dionysius Exiguus, which commences four years after the true time of Christ's birth, may begin to be computed much about this time, namely, from the beginning of the fourth year of Archelaus's, and the thirty-first of Augustus's reign, computing from his victory over Anthony and Cleopatra.

^b The words in the text are, 'Jesus increased in wisdom, and in stature, and in favour with God and man,' (Lu. ii. 52.) But if it be asked, how he, who was the eternal wisdom of the father, could be improved in any quality of his mind? the answer is, that all things in scripture, which are spoken of Christ, are not spoken with respect to his entire person, but only with respect to one or other of the natures that are united in that person. His divine nature was infinite, and, consequently, capable of no improvements, but his human was: and, therefore, though the divine λογος; was united to the human soul by its conception, yet might the divine nature communicate its powers to the human by distinct and gradual illuminations; and accordingly, we may observe, that all public manifestation of it to the world seems to have been industriously declined, till ripeness of years and judgment had carried him up to the perfections of a man. So little reason have we to suppose, that he, who condescended to be like us in body, should think it below him to be so too in that other no less essential, but much more noble part of us, our soul, without which, it was impossible for him to be man; so little reason to imagine, that the divine essence in him supplied the place and offices of intellectual faculties.—Whitby's Annotations; and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. ii.

^c It is commonly observed by those that are learned in the customs and institutions of the Jewish church, that, till a child was twelve years old, he was not obliged to go to Jerusalem at the time of the passover, and that though their youth were usually thirteen before they were brought before the masters of the synagogue to give an account of their proficiency in religion, which answers in a great measure to the Christian rite of confirmation, yet, since the season then appointed was accommodated to the capacities and attainments of children in general, without forbidding those of qualifications extraordinary, and whose genius, in the Jewish phrase, did run before the commandment, to appear sooner, our Saviour might offer himself to his examination a year before the common time; and this is the best reason that can be assigned for his staying behind his parents, when he could not but know, that they were departed from Jerusalem without him, and for his being found in one of the rooms adjoining to the temple, where the doctors of the law used to meet, not only to resolve the questions that were brought before them, but to examine likewise and confirm such of the youth as they found to be qualified for that ceremony, which, according to the same authors, was actually performed by devout prayers and solemn benedictions.—Grotius on Lu. ii. 45; Beausobre and Poole's Annotations; and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. ii.

^d It may seem a little strange, perhaps, that Mary and Joseph, who had been sufficiently instructed, one would think, in the great article of Christ's divinity, and therefore must certainly know, that, as he was the power and wisdom of God, he could neither fall into any danger, nor come to any harm, should so mightily afflict themselves, when they came to miss him. The reason which Origen (Hom. i. 9. in Luc.) seems to assign is, not that his parents supposed that he was lost or come to any mischance, but were apprehensive that he had withdrawn himself to some other place, and was possibly gone up to heaven, there to continue, till his eternal Father should think proper to send him down again: but the most easy and natural solution is, that without ever considering what they had sufficient reason to believe concerning his divinity and omnipotence, they suffered themselves to be carried away by their natural tenderness: and could not, without great concern, see themselves deprived of his company, uncertain of what had befallen him, or for what possible reason he should absent himself from theirs. It must not be denied, however, that though something may be allowed to a parent's fondness, yet it does not appear from their whole conduct, and especially from Mary's complaint, and our Saviour's reply, ver. 48, 49, that they had, as yet, a clear and perfect knowledge of his divine nature in union with the human: and therefore the evangelist has remarked upon them, 'that they understood not the saying which he spake unto them,' ver. 50.—Cabnet's Commentary; and Poole's Annotations.

^e The words in the text are, 'after three days they found him'; but we need not from thence infer, that they were three days a seeking him, but rather, that it was three days from the time they set out from Jerusalem; going on their journey the first day; returning to Jerusalem the second; and finding him in the temple on the third: for, since they found him in the temple, which, in all probability, was the first place they sought for him in, we can hardly imagine, that they should be three days in Jerusalem before they found him.—Poole's Annotations.

^f The words of the text (Lu. ii. 49.) 'wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business,' contain an ambiguity; that is, according to the original, our Saviour may either refer to the work which his Father had given him to do, or to the temple words which, though she at that time did not rightly understand, she took care nevertheless for ever after to register in her mind!

Being thus happily found by his parents, he returned with them to Nazareth, and there living in all dutiful subjection to them, wrought, very probably, with his reputed father in the trade of a carpenter; and, after his father's death, which is supposed to have happened about a year before the preaching of John the Baptist,¹ still continued in the same occupation: as indeed we can scarce help inferring, from the rude treatment of the Nazarenes his townsmen; as also from the total silence of the evangelists as to the intermediate actions of his life,^a that, though he 'grew in favour with God and man,' yet considering his excellences, he lived in a very obscure manner, and, till the time of his manifestation to Israel, showed no miraculous marks to distinguish him from the rest of mankind.

In the eighteenth year of our Saviour's life, died Augustus Caesar at Nola, in Campania, after a reign of near forty years, to the inexpressible grief of all his subjects, and was succeeded by Tiberius, the son of his wife where Joseph and Mary found him sitting with the doctors. Campbell, Boothroyd, Bloomfield, Doddridge, and many other eminent critics, both ancient and modern, follow the latter sense, and contend that the passage ought to be translated, 'wist, or knew ye not, that I must be in my Father's house.' Doddridge well observes that "though a general apprehension of our Saviour's being well employed might be a reason against the excessive anxiety of his parents, yet it could not, (as the words taken in connexion seem to imply) have directed them where to find him. It is to be remembered that this was the first visit Christ had ever made to the temple since he was a child in arms; and it is no wonder therefore that the delight he found there inclined him to prolong his visit."—Dodd. Fam. Expos.—Ed.

a It may possibly be made a question, why the evangelists have given us no account of our Saviour's life from the twelfth year of his age, till he began his ministry, which, according to the vulgar era, was about the thirtieth; because if, in this intermediate space, he did any thing worthy of remembrance, it ought in all reason to have been recorded. But when it is considered that the end of the sacred penmen was, not so much to gratify our curiosity, as to consult our profit, we cannot but admire the great wisdom of God, by whose inspiration they wrote, in passing by the less active parts of our Lord's life, which would certainly have swelled their gospels to immensurable volumes, fit for the perusal of none but the studious and such as had plenty of time at their command; whereas now, taking the four gospels together, they make but a small book, and separately, no more than little manuals that may be carried about with us wherever we go; may be soon read over, and easily remembered even by men of mean capacities and no great leisure; and yet they contain all the transactions of our Saviour's life which chiefly concern us to know; I mean such as relate to his mediatorial office, as that he came into the world to teach us; to die, and to rise again for us; to instruct us by his heavenly doctrine, as our prophet; to offer himself as a sacrifice upon the cross as our priest; and to loose the bands of death, and ascend triumphant into heaven, as our king. Therefore those periods, says the learned Spanheim, are notified, 'which are of chief concern to us, which were spent for our benefit, which seem to add to the security of our faith, which exhibit Christ either in the temple, or on the cross, or on the throne; for thus it has been demonstrated, that those things are only to be inquired after, and investigated in the character of the Messiah, which relate to the acts of his offices, both as prophet, priest, and king, for the sake of which alone he came to earth.' 'For there are also many other things,' says the evangelist, 'that Jesus did, which are not written in this book; but these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through his name, John xxi. 25; and xx. 31.—Spanheim's Dub. Evang. part ii. dub. 96.

Livia, by a former husband, but a prince of a quite contrary disposition to his predecessor. In the second year of his succession to the empire, he recalled Rufus from the government of Judea, and sent Valerius Gratus, who was the fourth governor in these parts since the banishment of Archelaus, to succeed him.³ Gratus having continued in Judea about eleven years, was at length recalled, and Pontius Pilate, a person too like his master Tiberius, of a fierce and irreconcilable spirit, and of a^b cruel and covetous disposition, was sent governor in his place. In the first year of his coming, which was the fifteenth year of Tiberius, from the time that he was admitted to reign in copartnership with Augustus,^c John the Baptist began to open his commission for the preparation of our Saviour's way before him,^d by preaching 'the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins.'

b Josephus has given several instances of Pilate's great cruelty in the course of his government, namely, that he caused the Roman soldiers to fall upon a great number of Galileans, very likely the followers of Judas Gaulonites, and to slaughter them like so many sheep in the temple, and on the very day appointed for the killing of the passover, and so 'mingled their blood with their sacrifices,' Luke xiii. 1. That when the people clamoured against his taking some of the sacred money out of the temple, he ordered the soldiers, upon a signal given, to fall upon them with large batons, so that many died of the blows which they received, and many were trodden to death in the throng; and that the Samaritans, as well as the Jews, felt the severity of his administration, when he destroyed great numbers of them near Tirathaba; and of those whom he took, that were of any interest or quality among them, struck off their heads.—Josephus's Jewish War, b. ii. c. 8; and Antiq. b. xviii. c. 5.

c [How John passed the former part of his life the scripture is silent; but there is surely no reason to suppose, with many fathers and interpreters, that he was in the desert from his infancy. It has been well observed by Basnage, that he retired thither at an age when he was sufficiently furnished with strength of body to provide food, and of mind to bear solitude. His retirement originated in two reasons: 1st. That by using no teachers, and frequenting no schools, his mind might not be corrupted by rabbinical errors, but be enlightened only by the Holy Spirit, so that he might appear to the Jews a teacher sent from God; 2dly, that, remote from all communication with Christ, he might avoid all suspicion of collusion with him, in announcing a new religion, and thereby add greater weight to the opinions he should offer, and the testimony he should bear, respecting Christ. Lightfoot supposes the desert in which John lived to have been some spot in the hill-country near Ziph and Maone (as in 1 Sam. xxiii. 14, 25.), not far from Hebron, where he was born. But it has not been satisfactorily determined where John was born. The period of his retirement is with probability supposed to have been at the age of puberty."—Bloomfield's Crit. Digest of Annotations on the New Testament. When he began his preaching it is also not well agreed. Lightfoot, and some others who believe that our Saviour was born in September, and that John was now beginning to be thirty years of age, are of opinion that he began his ministry about the passover; but Usher, and his followers, do, with more probability, suppose that his preaching began upon the tenth day of the seventh month, which answers to our nineteenth day of October, five days before the feast of tabernacles, upon the great day of expiation, when the high priest entered the holy of holies, and when so solemn a fast was enjoined, that whosoever did not afflict his soul at that time was to be cut off from the people.—Ed.

d The meaning of this phrase is, that John preached repentance, (Mat. iii. 2.) and baptized those that were penitent, in token of the remission of their sins, even as they, on their parts, received baptism in testimony of the sincerity of their repentance. Now, baptism, we know, was no new or strange thing among the Jews. It was acknowledged, and practised as an emblem of purification from past guilt, and a rite of entering solemnly into covenant with God. The expositors of their law agree, that this ceremony passed upon the whole congregation of Israel, just before the law was given at mount Sinai; and their custom, in all succeeding ages, has been to receive their heathen proselytes by baptism, as well as by sacrifice and circumcision. In conformity to this, therefore, John both administered and exhorted his followers to this ordinance of baptism, as an evidence of their penitence for past sins, and profession of better obedience for the future. But then as faith is a qualification for baptism as well as repentance, he pronounced our Lord for the object of faith to all who received this ordinance at his hands. 'For John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people that they should believe in him who should come after him,' that is, on Christ Jesus, (Acts xix. 4.) It is a great mistake therefore in some, to suppose that the baptism of John was, in substance, the same with what Christ did afterwards institute: for John neither did, nor could baptize his disciples in the 'name of the Holy Ghost,' as the apostle did, because the 'Holy Ghost was not yet given,' (John vii. 39): he did not baptize them in the name of Christ; for had he done so, there had been no occasion for the question, 'whether he himself were the Christ,' or not? (Luke iii. 15.) Herein therefore lay the imperfection of John's baptism, that though it prepared men to be Christians, yet it did not make them so; and therefore we find St Paul baptizing again some disciples at Ephesus, (who had before received the baptism of John,) in order to fit them for the reception of the Holy Ghost (Acts xix. 5, 6).—Whitby's Annotations; and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iv.

^a A wilderness among the Jews did not signify a place wholly void of inhabitants, but a place that was more mountainous, less fruitful, less peopled, and where the inhabitants were more dispersed, than in other parts of the country. For, as it is incongruous to suppose that the Baptist should preach the doctrine of repentance to stocks and stones, and wild beasts: the wilderness here must be understood in a comparative sense, and consequently the wilderness of Judea, where he preached and baptized must be that tract of land which lay on each side of the river Jordan on the confines of Enon and Salim.—Whitby's Annotations; Wells' Geography of the New Testament; and Spanheim's Dub. Evang. part ii. doh. 97.

^b The Jews were allowed to eat locusts; (Lev. xi. 22.) and when sprinkled with salt, and fried, they are not unlike our fresh water cray fish. The Acridophagi must have preferred them to almost every other species of food, since they derive their name from their eating locusts. We learn from the valuable work of Dr Russel, that the Arabs salt and eat them as a delicacy. Locusts were accordingly the common food of John, the precursor of Christ, while he remained in the wilderness. In feeding on that insect, the Baptist submitted to no uncommon privation, and practised no savage rigor, like many of the hermits who inhabited the deserts; but merely followed the abstemious mode of living, to which the people were accustomed, in the less frequented parts of the country. The food upon which he subsisted in the wilderness appears to be particularly mentioned, merely to show that he fared as the poorest of men, and that his manner of living corresponded with the meanness of his dress. Much unnecessary pains have been taken by some squeamish writers, to prove that the locusts which John used for food, were the fruit of a certain tree, and not the carcass of the insects distinguished by that name; but a little inquiry will fully clear up this matter, and show that, however disgusting the idea of that kind of meat may appear to us, the orientals entertain a different opinion. Many nations in the east, as the Indians of the Bashee islands, the Tonguinese, and the inhabitants of Madagascar, make no scruple to eat these insects, of which they have innumerable swarms, and prefer them to the finest fish. The ancients affirm that in Africa, Syria, Persia, and almost throughout Asia, the people commonly eat these creatures. Cienard, in a letter from Fez, in 1541, assures us, that he saw wagon loads of locusts brought into that city for food. Kirstenius, in his notes on Matthew, says, he was informed by his Arabic master, that he had often seen them on the river Jordan; that they were of the same form with ours, but larger; that the inhabitants pluck off their wings and feet, and hang the rest at their necks till they grow warm, and ferment; and then they eat them, and think them very good food. A monk, who had travelled into Egypt, asserts, that he had eaten of these locusts, and, that in the country they subsisted on them four months in the year. In Bushire, produced in these desert places, was the chief diet. he lived upon, and a loose coat made of camel's hair ^c and fastened with a leathern girdle, the only garb he wore; and therefore no person was so proper to inculcate the doctrines of repentance and reformation, as he who, by his free and resolute preaching, joined with this great severity of life, soon procured a vast auditory, and they are used by the lowest peasantry as food. The Arabs feed on them to this day, and prepare them for use in the following manner: They grind them to flour in their hand mills, or powder them in stone mortars. This flour they mix with water to the consistency of dough, and make thin cakes of it, which they bake like other bread on a heated girdle; and this, observes Hasselquist, serves instead of bread to support life for want of something better. At other times they boil them in water, and afterwards stew them with butter, and make a sort of fricassee, which has no bad taste. There is no reason for men to puzzle themselves about what this μίλι ἄγριον, or 'wild honey,' means, since every one knows that Judea was famed for plenty of honey, that, in several places of scripture, it is said to flow with honey; and from the instances of Samson, Judg. xiv. 8, and Jonathan, 1 Sam. xiv. 25, it must be concluded, that wild honey, such as either distilled from the boughs like dew, or was found in the cliffs of rocks, or hollow trunks of trees, was no uncommon thing in that country. But though these locusts and wild honey may very properly be taken in their natural and most obvious sense, yet it must not therefore be thought, that John never eat any thing else, but that, for the generality, he made use of such slender diet, and contented himself with what the desert place, which he chose for his habitation, could afford him.—Spanheim's Dub. Evang. part ii. doh. 99.

^c The raiment of John was not made of the fine hair of the camel, whereof an elegant kind of cloth is made, which is thence called camel, in imitation of which, though made of wool, is the English camel, but of the long and shaggy hair of camels, which is in the east manufactured into a coarse stuff anciently worn by monks and anchorites. It is only when understood in this way, that the words suit the description here given of John's manner of life.—Campbell's Translation of the Gospels, note. It is, indeed, sufficiently apparent, that the inhabitants of the wilderness, where John spent his days before he entered upon his ministry, and other thinly settled districts, manufactured a stuff, in colour and texture somewhat resembling our coarse hair-cloths, of the hair which fell from their camels, for their own immediate use, of which the raiment of that venerable prophet consisted. In the same manner, the Tartars of modern times, work up their camel's hair into a kind of felt, which serves as a covering to their tents, although their way of life is the very reverse of easy and pompous. Like the austere herald of the Saviour, the modern dervishes wear garments of the same texture, which they too gird about their loins with great leathern girdles. Elijah, the Tishbite, seems to have worn a habit of camel's hair, equally mean and coarse; for he is represented in our translation as a 'hairy man,' which perhaps ought to be referred to his dress, and not to his person. A garment of haircloth was, in those times, the costume of a prophet; and was assumed occasionally by impostors, to enable them with greater ease and success to deceive their credulous neighbours. 'And it shall come to pass in that day, that the prophets shall be ashamed every one of his vision, when he hath prophesied; neither shall they wear a rough, or hairy, garment to deceive.' The prophet Isaiah was clothed in the same stuff; for God required him to 'loose the sackcloth from off' his 'loins.' Sackcloth of hair was deemed a badge of humiliation and self-denial; and was probably, for this reason, selected as the most proper material for the official habiliments of an ancient prophet. Joel accordingly commands the priests and Levites; 'come, lie all night,' or constantly, 'in sackcloth, ye ministers of my God.' In allusion to the same mode of thinking, it is said, 'the sun became black as sackcloth of hair.' And Isaiah declares in the name of the Lord, 'I clothe the heavens with blackness, I make sackcloth their covering.' These statements throw light on that expression; 'my two witnesses shall prophesy, clothed in sackcloth;—arrayed in the official dress of ancient prophets, and like them humble and self-denied, but very jealous for the Lord God of hosts, and fearless in the discharge of their duty.—Paxton's Illustrations.—Ed.

numerous proselytes of all ranks and qualities, from Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region about Jordan, confessing their sins before God, and entering into this new institution by baptism.

Among the great multitudes that came to his preaching and baptism, there were Pharisees, ^a and Sadducees not a few, whose confidence and immorality he sharply re-proved; while, at the same time, he exhorted the common people to works of extensive charity; the publicans, ^b to avoid oppression and injustice; the soldiers, to abstain from plunder and violence; and every one, in short, to beware of those crimes to which their employments and manner of life did most expose them.

These solemn admonitions, pronounced with so much weight and authority, procured him a mighty veneration among the people, insomuch, that several began to look upon him as the promised and now expected Messiah; but, to remove all thoughts of this kind, he freely declared, "that he only baptized them with water to repentance, and a new life, but that there was one coming, and ready to appear among them, who would baptize them with the effusion of the Holy Ghost, and who so far exceeded him in power and excellency, that he was not worthy to do for him the meanest or most servile office."^c

^a We have already, in a separate dissertation, given a particular account of the rise and principles of the several sects among the Jews, and need only take notice here, that the Pharisees are thought to take their name from the word parash, which signifies separation, because they were separated from all others in their extraordinary pretences to sanctity, and some particular observances; and that the Sadducees, who were directly opposite to the Pharisees both in temper and principles, derived their name, either from Sadoc, who lived near 300 years before our Saviour's birth, and is supposed to be the founder of the sect, or, as some think, from sedek, which signifies justice, because they pretended to be the only exact distributors of justice, and were rigid indeed in the execution of it.—Eachard's Ecclesiastical History, in the introduction.

^b The publicans were persons of no particular sect, nor of any religious function among the Jews, but certain public officers whom the Romans employed to collect their tributes, tolls, and imposts. This office was once of great account among the Romans, and conferred upon none less than the equestrian order; but, when it came to fall into the hands of the Jews, who farmed it of the Romans, it soon became base and infamous, and more especially odious to the Jews upon these two accounts: 1st, because these tributes were looked upon as a standing instance of their slavery, which they, who made such boasts of their being a free-born people, and invested in that privilege by God himself, could least of all endure. And, 2dly, because these publicans, having farmed the customs of the Romans at high rates, did generally make use of all methods of extortion and oppression, to enable them both to pay their rents, and to raise some advantage to themselves. Upon these accounts, the publicans, as conspiring with the Romans both to impoverish and enslave their countrymen, became so universally abhorred by the Jewish nation, that they held it unlawful to do them any act of common courtesy, nay, even to eat or to drink with them, for which we find them so frequently blaming our Saviour.—Eachard's Ecclesiastical History, in the introduction, page 27.

^c 'Whose shoes,' says John, 'I am not worthy to bear.' The custom of loosing the sandals from off the feet of an eastern worshipper was ancient and indispensable. It is also commonly observed in visits to great men. The sandals or slippers are pulled off at the door, and either left there, or given to a servant to bear. The person to bear them means an inferior domestic, or attendant upon a man of high rank, to take care of, and return them to him again.—See Asiatic Researches, vol. i. p. 289; Plutarch, Sympos. b. vii. qu. 8. 712. This was the work of servants among the Jews; and it was reckoned so servile, that it was thought too mean for a scholar or a disciple to do. The Jews say, 'all services which a servant does for his master, a

These were the doctrines which John preached, and this the testimony which he gave of Jesus, even before he had the happiness to know him.

After John had continued in his ministry for several months, our Lord thought fit to remove from his private retirement at Nazareth, and, taking leave of his mother and his trade, passed over into Judea, to Bethabara, ^d on the banks of the river Jordan, where John was then baptizing.

He who was innocence and purity itself, had certainly no need of the baptism of repentance, but being minded to honour and sanctify the institution, ^e he offered himself to John, and when John, inspired with a prophetic spirit, ^f knew him, and thereupon endeavoured to decline disciple does for his master, except unloosing his shoes.' John thought it was too great an honour for him to do that for Christ, which was thought too mean for a disciple to do for a wise man. See Kypkins, in loc.; Braunius de Fest. Sac. Heb. p. 59; Pignorius de Serris, p. 206; Dentingi. Obs. s. iii. 26. 8; Bynæus de Calceis. Heb. c. 6; Elsner. Comment. Crit. Phil. in Mat. t. i. p. 84.—ED.

^d Bethabara does, in the Hebrew language, signify as much as a place of passage, and therefore, whereas we read, Jos. ii. 7, 23, that there was a fording place over Jordan not far from Jericho; and again, Jos. iii. 16, that the people passed over right against Jericho, it is probably conjectured, that hereabouts stood Bethabara, and was the place of reception and entertainment for passengers out of Judea into Petrea, or the country beyond Jordan; nay, it is imagined by some that, in the very same place of the river where the ark stood, while the Israelites passed over, our blessed Saviour, the ark of the covenant of grace, was baptized by John the Baptist.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament. Almost all the ancient manuscripts and versions instead of Bethabara here have Bethany, and this is doubtless the true reading. There was a Bethany about two miles east of Jerusalem, but there was also another in the tribe of Reuben, on the east side of the river Jordan, and in this place probably John was baptizing. It is about twelve miles above Jericho.—Barnes on the Gospels.

^e There are some other reasons which might induce our Lord to come to John's baptism, besides what himself alleges, namely, 'the performance of all righteousness,' or whatever had a tendency to the people's edification; as, that he might authorize this baptism of John by his public approbation; that by this rite he might be initiated to his prophetic office, and consecrated to the service of God; that hereby he might abolish the ceremony of the Jewish baptism, and more effectually recommend that of his own institution, to which this of the Baptist was an introduction; and more especially, that, in the presence of the Baptist, and all the company that had resorted to him, he might obtain the testimony of the Holy Ghost, and of his heavenly Father, to confirm John in the belief of his being the promised Messiah, and to induce the people, as soon as he began his ministry, to follow and attend to him.—Calmel's Commentary.

^f The words in the text are these, 'Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John to be baptized of him, but John forbade him,' (Mat. iii. 13, 14); but how could John forbid him, when he says of himself 'I knew him not, but he that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining on him, the same is he who baptizeth with the Holy Ghost,' (John i. 33). Now to this it may be answered, that since one part of John's ministry was 'to bear witness of that light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world,' it was highly necessary that our Saviour should be unknown to him in person before he came to his baptism, that the world might have no suspicion of any collusion, or that the Baptist testified of him by compact. Though, therefore, he had never seen the face of our Saviour, because they were bred up in different countries, yet, by a particular revelation, he knew that he was already come into the world, and was shortly to baptize with the Holy Ghost; and therefore, when our Saviour came, and presented himself to be baptized, he had immediately another revelation, that this was the great person of whom he had been told before; even as Samuei having been told the office, he gave him such reasons for the expediency of the thing, as made him no longer hesitate, but immediately baptized him. Jesus ^a was no sooner got out of the water, but, as he was making his addresses to heaven, the sky on a sudden was divided by a great radiancy, ^b and the Holy Ghost, in the manner of a ^c dove, de-by God, that, 'on the morrow a man should come to him to be the captain over his people Israel,' (1 Sam. ix. 16.) Upon Saul's appearing, had another inspiration resembling the Baptist's here, 'Behold the man of whom I spake to thee, (ver. 17.)—Whitby's Annotations.

^a The observation of the Greek church, in relation to this matter, is this, that he who ascended out of the water must first descend down into it; and consequently that baptism is to be performed, not by sprinkling but by washing the body. And indeed he must be strangely ignorant of the Jewish rites of baptism, who seems to doubt of this, since to the due performance of it, they required the immersion of the whole body to such a degree of nicety, that if any dirt was upon it that hindered the water from coming to that part, they thought the ceremony not rightly done. The Christians, no doubt, took this rite from the Jews, and followed them in their manner of performing it. Accordingly, several authors have shown, that we read no where in scripture of any one's being baptized, but by immersion, and, from the acts of councils and ancient rituals, have proved that this manner of immersion continued, as much as possible, to be used for thirteen hundred years after Christ. But it is much to be questioned, whether the prevalence of custom, and the overfondness of parents, will, in these cold climates especially, ever suffer it to be restored.—Whitby's Annotations.—There seems indeed to be no necessity for doing so. When Paul and Silas, in the middle of the night, baptized the jailor and his household in the common prison, (Acts xv. 33.) there is no reason to suppose that they had water sufficient for the purpose of baptizing the converts by immersion. It is as little likely that three thousand people could, in the midst of Jerusalem, be in one day baptized by immersion (Acts ii. 41.); for though this might have been done in the brook Kedron, is it supposable that the chief priests and rulers of the Jews would have permitted so great a multitude to go quietly out of the city for such a purpose?—Gleig.—Ed.

^b The words of St Matthew are:—'Lo, the heavens were opened;' in St Mark 'cloven or rent.' The common people of the Jews indeed were of opinion, that the heavens were firm and solid, and that the fire which fell from thence upon the face of the earth burst through this firmament, and made an opening in this vast concave that surrounds us; and therefore it is, that the evangelists express themselves in this manner, in accommodation to the prejudices and capacities of the vulgar. But by the phrase we need understand no more, than that a sudden beam of radiant light came darting from the skies, like a flash of lightning from the clouds, and made it seem as though the heavens had been opened or rent to let it out; because to the naked eye, the air at that time seems to divide, to make a clearer and fuller way for the light.—Calmet's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.—There is no doubt that the light spoken of was preternatural, and that it accompanied the divine Spirit—such a light as accompanied Jesus on being visibly revealed to St Paul at his conversion.—Bloomfield.—Ed.

^c The ancients were generally of opinion, that the Holy Ghost, in his descent upon our Saviour, assumed the real shape of a dove, which, at that time more especially, was a very proper representation of his dove-like nature (Isa. xlii. 2.) and of all such as were to receive the same Spirit, and are required to be as harmless as doves; but most of the moderns (though they allow that the blessed Spirit did, at this time, assume a visible shape, to render his descent manifest) do maintain that the ὄρα πτεροειδῆ relates not to the body or shape of a dove, but to the manner of a dove's descending and lighting on any thing; and thence they infer, that it was this body of light which issued from the skies that came down upon Christ, and, while he was praying, hung hovering over his head, just after the manner and motion of a dove, before it settles upon any thing. Whether of these opinions should prevail, it is idle to dispute, since neither of them is destitute of some countenance from scripture, neither of them injurious to the dignity of the Holy Ghost.—Calmet's Commentary; and Hammond's Annotations.—The dove, among the Jews, was squared upon his sacred head, with an audible voice from heaven, wherein God declared him 'his beloved Son, in whom he was well pleased.'

Our blessed Lord, being thus by baptism, and the unction of the Holy Ghost, prepared for his prophetic office, was, by the impulse of the divine Spirit, carried further into the wilderness of Judea, where, after he had fasted forty days and forty nights,^d as Moses did on Mount Sinai, and was now very hungry, the devil ^e assumed a bodily shape, and set upon him with a threefold temptation. 1st, From his hunger he took occasion to tempt him to despair, and distrust of his Father's care of him, who had abandoned him in that condition, and therefore, persuading him that he was not the Son of God, he put him upon the experiment of his being such, by making the stones become bread; but our Saviour soon answered him by a ¹ passage out of the scripture, intimating, that "God, when he pleased, could employ means extraordinary for the support and nourishment of men." 2dly, His next essay was, to try how far pride and presumption would affect him; and, therefore, carrying him through the air, and setting him upon the ^f highest part the symbol of purity or harmlessness (Mat. x. 16), and of softness (Ps. lv. 7.) The form chosen here was doubtless an emblem of the innocence, meekness, and tenderness of the Saviour. The gift of the Holy Spirit, in this manner, was the public approbation of Jesus (John i. 33), and a sign of his being set apart to the office of the Messiah. We are not to suppose that there was any change wrought in the moral character of Jesus, but only that he was publicly set apart to his work, and solemnly approved by God in the office to which he was appointed. The baptism of Jesus has usually been considered a striking manifestation of the doctrine of the Trinity, or the doctrine that there are three persons in the divine nature. 1. There is the person of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, baptized in the Jordan, elsewhere declared to be equal with God, (John x. 30.) 2. The Holy Spirit, descended in a bodily form upon the Saviour. The Holy Spirit is also equal with the Father, or is also God, (Acts v. 3, 4.) 3. The Father addressing the Son, and declaring that he was well pleased with him. It is impossible to explain this transaction consistently in any other way than by supposing that there are three equal persons in the divine nature, or essence, and that each of these sustains important parts in the work of redeeming men.—Barnes on the Gospels.—Ed.

^d Whoever considers the frailty of human nature, cannot but allow, that so great and so long an abstinence, without any sense of hunger, (for the evangelists tell us, that our Saviour was only hungry afterwards.) must be altogether miraculous, and so no duty to us; and, if he reflects withal, that the end of his fast was not to chastise, or subdue that body, which was never irregular, as the design of all our fasting is, he must allow, that our Saviour, in this particular, set no precedent to us; and therefore it is cruelty, or a superstitious folly at least, in a matter so supernatural, to enjoin men to follow his steps.—Whitby's Annotations.

^e This word, which answers exactly with the Hebrew Satan, signifies a calumniator or accuser; and, as it occurs in scripture always in the singular number, is supposed to denote that evil spirit who tempted our first parents, the chief of the rebel angels, and the avowed enemy of the saints, (1 Thess. iii. 5, and 1 Pet. v. 8, &c.)—Beausobre's Annotations.

^f According to the description that Josephus gives us of the temple which Herod built, we hear of no pinnacles or lofty turrets above the rest of the building; and therefore have reason to think, that the πτερόν which is rendered pinnacle, should rather signify the battlement, or that parapet-wall which was carried round the top of the temple, as well as private houses, (Deut. xxii. 8.) to keep men from falling from the roof; and, if we may be allowed to conjecture on what part of the battlement it was that the devil placed our Saviour, it seems very likely, that it was on the top of that gallery, whose building, according to the same author, was so prodigiously high, and the valley underneath it so prodigiof the temple, he put him upon the proof of his being the Son of God, by throwing himself off from thence, and flying in the air, alleging a text out of the Psalmist¹ to encourage him; but Jesus as soon answered him by another text, commanding men² not to tempt God or depend upon his providence for their conservation in dangers of their own seeking. 3dly, His last experiment was, to tempt him with the charms of ambition; and, therefore, transporting him again through the air, to the top^a of an exceeding high mountain, he there made a lively representation to him of all the kingdoms of the world, with all their dazzling glories, at one view, and then told him that “these, with all their pomp and splendour, were delivered to his disposal, and should be given to him, if he would but acknowledge his benefactor, and worship him;” but this was a boldness and blasphemy, such as provoked our Lord to exert his divine power, and to command him peremptorily to be gone, but with this memento out of the scripture likewise,³ “Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve;” whereupon the devil left him for that time, and angels, sent from heaven, came with refreshments for him, after his triumphant combat.

During our Saviour’s fasting and temptation in the wilderness, his faithful forerunner John the Baptist, being thus assured both by the descent of the Spirit, and the voice from heaven, that Jesus was the true and long expected Messiah, made full and open declarations of it to all the multitude that came to hear him; and when the sanhedrim at Jerusalem had sent a deputation of their priests and Levites, who were of the sect of the^b Pharisees, to demand of him, who he was? He very readily acknowledged that he was not the Messiah, whom they expected, nor Elias, who, as they imagined, would personally appear among them, nor any other prophet^c risen from the dead, but then he gave them to understand, that, though he was not Elias himself, yet he was the prophet whom Isaiah intended, when he called him ‘the voice of one^d crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord,’ that his baptism was only of water, but the efficacy of it depended upon one among them, whom they knew not; one, who succeeded him indeed in time, but so far surpassed him in dignity, that he was not worth so much as to be his servant.

The very next day, after the departure of the Pharisees, as our Saviour was returning from the wilderness to Bethabara, John pointed him out to the multitude ‘as the immaculate Lamb^e of God, which taketh away the easily deep, that it turned one’s eyes and head to look from the top to the bottom of it, and was indeed one of the most confounding spectacles under the sun.—Hammond’s Annotations; and Jewish Antiquities, b. xv. c. 14.—Scripture is silent as to the precise manner in which the tempter conveyed our Saviour to the top of the temple, but surely this might have been effected in an ordinary way. The phrase to take up in the original signifies to conduct one, to lead one; to attend or accompany one; or to induce one to go. It is used in many parts of scripture in such a sense. Here no more is meant by the evangelist than that Satan conducted Jesus, or accompanied him, and that this was not done contrary to the will of Jesus.—Barnes on the Gospels.—Ed.

^a The best account that we have, both of the wilderness and high mountain where our Lord was tempted, is in the travels of Mr Maimdrell, (for the ancients tell us very little of them,) who informs us, that in his journey from Jerusalem to Jordan, after he had passed over Mount Olivet, he proceeded in an intricate way, among hills and valleys interchangeably; and, after some hours’ travel in this sort of road, arrived at the mountainous desert, into which our blessed Saviour was led by the Spirit, to be tempted by the devil: “A miserable dry place,” says he, “it is, consisting of high rocky mountains so torn and disordered, as if the earth had here suffered some great convulsion, in which its very bowels had been turned outward. From the tops of these hills of desolation, we had, however, a delightful prospect of the mountains of Arabia, the Dead Sea, and the plains of Jericho, into which last we descended after about five hours’ march from Jerusalem. As soon as we entered the plain, we turned upon the left hand, and going about one hour that way, came to the foot of the Quarantania, so called from our Lord’s forty days’ fast, which, they say, is the mountain where the devil tempted him with the visionary scene of all the kingdoms and glories of the world. It is very high, and steep, and its ascent not only difficult but dangerous.” This is the account which our countryman gives us of the place where our Saviour was probably tempted; but it is not supposable, that, even from the highest mountain of the world, the devil could show all the kingdoms of it; and therefore the most rational account of this matter is, that, “as he was the prince of the power of the air, he formed an airy horizon,” as Dr Lightfoot expresses it, “before the eyes of Christ, which might carry such a pompous and glorious appearance of kingdoms, states, and royalties in the face of it, as if he had seen those very kingdoms and states in reality.” God, we are told, caused Moses to see the whole land of promise from the top of Nebo, as it is generally thought, by representing it to him in a large plan or map of it, in all the valleys round about him; and, in like manner, by divine permission, in all the valleys round about the high mountain on which our Lord stood, the devil might make a large draught of the stately edifices, the guards, and attendants of kings and princes, appearing in their splendour, visible to his eye, which he could not have seen so advantageously had he stood on a plain.—Wells’s Geography of the New Testament; Calmet’s Commentary; and Poole’s and Whitby’s Annotations.

^b The sanhedrim, whose business it was to take cognisance of the pretensions of all prophets when they began to appear in the world, and to inquire into their authority and mission, thought proper, out of their body, to depute such as were of this sect, because, as they were persons who believed the immortality of the soul, and the resurrection of the body, they were better qualified than the Sadducees, who believed neither, to inquire of John, Whether he was Elias? Being in this particular mere Pythagoreans, and fancying, that the soul of one great or good man might frequently pass into another’s body.—See Joseph. Antiq. b. xviii. c. 2; and Jewish War, b. ii. c. 8. And as they were the patrons of tradition, and exact in all the ordinary rules and customs that were to be observed, they were the properest persons to examine into this new rite of baptism, by way of preparation for the Messiah, of which their traditions were wholly silent; and therefore they ask him, Why baptizest thou? that is, “Why usurpest thou an authority which belongs to none but either to the Messiah, Elias, or some other prophet, by initiating us, who are already under the covenant into a new doctrine by baptism, which is usually administered to none but heathen proselytes?” And from hence it appears, that the Pharisees were the properest men to send to the Baptist upon this message.—Calmet’s Commentary; and Whitby’s and Beausobre’s Annotations.

^c It was a received tradition among the Jews, that at the coming of the Messiah, several of the ancient prophets should arise from the dead.—Beausobre’s Annotations.

^d It is the opinion of some, that John chose rather to preach and to fulfil his ministry in the wilderness than in the temple, in order to make a more illustrious difference between himself, who was but a messenger whose office it was to prepare his Lord’s way, and his Lord himself, of whom it was prophesied that he should frequently appear and teach in the temple, Mal. iii. 1.—Poole’s Annotations.

^e Under the Jewish law, when any sacrifice was offered for sin, he that brought it, laid his hand upon it, according to the commandment of God, Lev. i. 4; iii. 2; iv. 4, and by that rite, transferred his sins upon the victim, which, after such act, is said to take and to carry them away. Accordingly, in the daily sacrifice of the lamb, the stationary men, who were the representatives of the people, laid their hands upon the lambs that were to be offered, and when they were thus offered, they are sins of mankind; and then freely declared that he was the very person, of whose superiority, both in dignity and existence, he had spoken, and of whom, by certain tokens, he both knew and could bear record, that he was the Son of God.

To two of his own disciples, the next day, he gave the same testimony, inasmuch that they left their old master and followed Jesus; and when Andrew, ^a who was one of them, went and discovered the same thing to his elder brother Simon, he, in like manner, became one of his disciples, to whom, the day following, were adjoined Philip, an inhabitant of the city Bethsaida, ^b and an intimate friend of his ¹ named Nathaniel of Cana in Galilee, and supposed to be the same with the apostle Bartholomew.

This Nathaniel, at his very first coming, upon our Saviour's expressing some tokens of his omniscience, made a liberal confession of his being the Messiah, the Son of God; whereupon our Saviour assured him, that, in a short time he should have a fuller conviction of his divinity, when he should see the angels of heaven ^c ascending and descending, as they did once in a vision to Jacob, to attend the person, and execute the orders of the Son of Man. ^d said to make an atonement for their souls, Exod. xxx. 15, 16; and, in analogy thereunto, Christ is here called, by way of eminence, 'the Lamb of God,' because God intended to 'lay upon him, who was manifested to take away sin,' ¹ John iii. 5, and came to suffer in our stead, the punishments due to the iniquities of us all.—Whitby's and Beausobre's Annotations.

^a The other, in all probability, was John, the beloved apostle and evangelist, because he describes the circumstances of the time and conversation that passed so very punctually, John i. 40; but in this, and several other places of his gospel, according to his wonted modesty, he chooses to conceal his name.—Hannond's Annotations.

^b There is no mention of this place in the Old Testament, and the reason is, because, as Josephus tells us, it was but a very small village, till Philip the tetrarch built it up to the bulk and appearance of a very magnificent city, and gave it the name of Julius, out of respect to Julia, the daughter of Augustus Caesar. Its original name, in the Hebrew tongue, imports a place of fishing or else hunting, and for both these exercises it was very commodiously situated. As it belonged to the tribe of Naphtali, a country remarkable for its plenty of deer, Gen. xlix. 21, it was excellently fitted for the latter of these pastimes; and as it lay on the north end of the lake of Genezareth, just where the river Jordan runs into it, it was so commodious for the former, that two of the persons just now mentioned, namely, Peter and Andrew, were fishermen by trade.—Wells' Geography of the New Testament.

^c To ascend and descend, to come and go, according to the Hebrew manner of expression, denotes a free and familiar commerce: and such, no doubt, was the ministry of angels at our Saviour's temptation and agony, at his resurrection and ascension. The words however must be owned to be a plain allusion to Jacob's ladder, Gen. xxviii. 12, 13, on the top of which was the divine majesty, and the angels ascending to receive his commands, and descending to execute them; and therefore others have thought that Christ by these words intended to inform his apostles, "that the miracles which they should soon see him perform, would declare the divine majesty present with him, and giving him such commands as he was to execute in his prophetic office, as clearly and manifestly as if they had seen the angels of God ascending and descending upon him."—Whitby's Annotations.

^d It is observed by several, that only Ezekiel in the Old Testament, and our Saviour in the New, are called by this name; that our Saviour is never called so but by himself: and that that is the common appellation that he gives himself. Ezekiel was doubtless so called, to distinguish him from those spiritual beings,

With these five disciples, Jesus, ^e and his mother, were invited next day to a marriage-feast in Cana, ^f a small place in Galilee, not far from Nazareth. At this solemnity there happened to be a scarcity of wine, which when his mother understood, she made her application to him, in hopes that, by some means or other, he would not fail to supply the defect. In other instances, no doubt, she had been made sensible of his supernatural power; and therefore, though his answer to her seems to carry in it the appearance of a denial, she still expected something extraordinary from him; and therefore ordered the waiters to obey his commands with the utmost exactness. ^g with whom he so frequently conversed: and our Saviour took upon him that title not only to distinguish his human from his divine nature, but to express his humility likewise, and want of reputation, while he continued in the form of a servant. Chemitius, however, puts another construction upon this title. He thinks that, as the term Messiah, which is commonly called Christ, is taken out of Daniel, so that other of the Son of Man, is taken from thence likewise; for behold one, 'like the Son of Man,' says the prophet, 'came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of Days,' ^c vii. 13, and that therefore our Saviour did usually call himself so, in compliance to the prophecy, as well as to assert his humanity, and declare himself his Father's servant, according to the character given of him by Isaiah xlii. 1.—Pool's Annotations.

^e In all probability it was at some relation's house that this marriage was kept, because Mary was so solicitous for the supply of wine: and the opinion of the ancients is, that it was at the house of Alphaeus, otherwise named Cleophas, whose wife was Mary, the sister or cousin-german of the blessed virgin, and who, at this time, married his son Simon the Canaanite, Mat. x. 4: though others will have it, that the bridegroom was Nathaniel.—Cabnet's Commentary and Whitby's Annotations.

^f This is called Cana of Galilee, to distinguish it from another town of the same name, mentioned, Jos. xiv. 28, belonging to the tribe of Asher, not far from the city of Sidon, and so situated much more north than this Cana was.—Wells' Geography of the New Testament.—The village now bearing the name, and supposed to occupy the site of the ancient town, is pleasantly situated on the descent of a hill, about sixteen miles north-west of Tiberias, and six north-east of Nazareth. It is worthy of note, says Dr Clarke, that walking among the ruins of a church, he saw large massy stone pots, answering the description given of the vessels of the country: not preserved nor exhibited as relics, but lying about disregarded by the present inhabitants, as antiquities with whose original use they were unacquainted. From their appearance, and the number of them, it was quite evident, that a practice of keeping water in large stone pots, each holding from eighteen to twenty-seven gallons was once common in the country. Cana, or as it is now called Kessen, Kenna, or Cane Galit, contains about 300 inhabitants; who are chiefly Catholic Christians.—Ed.

^g John ii. 1.—11. Marriage is here sanctioned by our Lord as a holy and honourable institution. It is an ordinance of God, and, therefore, the duties of those who enter into its sacred engagements are particularly specified in the scriptures. 2. That convivial meetings, when conducted with decorum and temperance, may be attended by Christians. It is difficult to lay down any general rule on this subject: for whilst, on the other hand, the disciples of Christ are charged not to be present at meetings which ever approximate to the tenets of intemperance, it is evident, on the other hand, that they may, on certain occasions, cheerfully enjoy with their friends the bounties of providence. But in all cases our festivities should be conducted as if Jesus himself were present. 3. Our relations must not interfere with us in the discharge of the great duties we owe to God and religion. We are to receive their directions only in so far as they coincide with the revealed will of God. The language of the apostles on this subject after their conversion was; henceforth know we no man after the flesh. 4. Let us deserve and imitate the example of kindness and condescension which the Saviour has here set before us. If he wrought a miracle to supply the wants of his people, let us also minister to the necessities of our

The custom of the Jews, in all their entertainments, was to use frequent washings; and for this purpose there were, in a certain private room, six water-cisterns, containing each about twenty gallons of our measure. These our Saviour commanded the servants to fill up to the brim, and when they had so done, to carry the liquor to the governor of the feast, for him to distribute to the rest of the company, as the manner then was. But when the governor had tasted it, he was not a little surprised; and calling to the bridegroom, told him, with a pleasant air, that, at most entertainments like this, it was an usual thing for people to bring out their best wine at first, and worse, when the guests had drunk plentifully; but that he, contrary to the common custom, had reserved his best to the latter end of the feast.

This was the first miracle our Saviour did in any public manner, which proved both a manifestation of his own divinity, and a confirmation of his disciples' faith. From Cana he went down to ^a Capernaum, the place where he usually afterwards resided; but his stay at this time was not long there, because his purpose was to go to Jerusalem, at the approaching feast of the passover. ^b brethren. 5. Without being fanciful in our use of scripture, it may be here worthy of our notice, that Jesus began his ministry by changing water into wine,—teaching us that he came not to destroy men's lives but to save them, and he confers on his people the blessings of joy and salvation. Moses, on the other hand, began his ministry by changing water into blood,—a fit emblem of that ministry of death which was entrusted to him,—but to Jesus and his apostles was committed the ministry of reconciliation, that God is in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto them the word of reconciliation. 6. The manner in which this marriage-feast was conducted is a fit emblem of the way in which God deals with his people. They are, whilst on earth, but enjoying the foretastes of those blessings which God has reserved for them. They will be put in possession of his greatest and his best gifts when they sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to the marriage supper of the Lamb.—Ed.

^a This city is no where mentioned in the Old Testament, either under this, or any name like it; and therefore it is not improbable, that it was one of those towns which the Jews built after their return from the Babylonish captivity. It stood on the sea-coast, that is, 'on the coast of the sea of Galilee, in the borders of Zebulun and Naphtali,' Mat. iv. 15, 16, and consequently towards the upper part thereof. It took its name, no doubt, from an adjacent spring of great repute for its clear and limpid waters, and which, according to Josephus, is by the natives called Capernaum. As this spring might be some inducement for the building of the town in the place where it stood, so its being a convenient waiting place from Galilee to any parts on the other side of the sea, might be some motive to our Lord for his moving from Nazareth, and making this the place of his most constant residence. Upon this account Capernaum was highly honoured, and is said by our Lord himself to be exalted unto heaven; but because it made no right use of this signal favour, it drew from him the severe denunciation, that it should be brought down to hell.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.—Buckingham, Barckhardt, and some other writers, believe it to have been the place now called Talhewm, or Tel Hoom, which is upon the edge of the sea, from nine to twelve miles N. N. E. of Tiberias, and where there are ruins indicative of a considerable place at some former period. Dr Richardson, however, in passing through the plain of Gennesareth, inquired of the natives whether they knew such a place as Capernaum? to which they replied, "Cavernahum wa Chonasi, they are quite near, but in ruins." This should, perhaps, induce us to fix the site of Capernaum further south; but our Saviour's denunciation against it seems to have been literally accomplished; and it has been cast down into the grave, for hitherto no satisfactory evidence has been found of the place on which it stood, Mat. xi. 23.—Cabnet's Dictionary, art. Capernaum.—Ed.

^b This feast is so well known, and has been so fully explained the at time of its first institution, Exod. xii. that we need only remind our reader, that, from the word pasach, which signifies

As soon as our Saviour came to Jerusalem, the first thing he did was to reform the public abuse and profanation of the temple, occasioned by the shops which money-changers had set up, and the beasts which the dealers therein used to bring into the courts of the Gentiles. ^c This our Lord's zeal for his Father's honour could not well brook; and therefore, with a scourge made of cords, he drove all the sellers ^d and barterers from the sacred ground, overturned the tables ^e of the money-changers, and commanded those who dealt in doves or pigeons, to take away their goods, and make his Father's house no longer a house of merchandise.

to leap or skip over, the Jews gave the name of pascha, or Passover to that great festival, which was annually appointed, in commemoration of their coming forth out of Egypt; because the night before their departure the destroying angel, who slew the first-born of the Egyptians, passed over the houses of the Israelites, which were marked with the blood of the lamb, killed the evening before, and for this reason called the paschal lamb. The feast itself began on the fourteenth day of Nisan, which is, the first month in their sacred, but the seventh in the civil years, and answers in part to our March and April; but as the Jews began their days at six in the evening, this feast was to continue seven days complete, and so ended on the one and twentieth day in the evening.—Cabnet's Dictionary, under the word.

^c There were three courts belonging to the temple. The court of the priests, where the altar of incense stood: the court of the Israelites, where the Jews that were clean, and the proselytes of justice, that is, those who had embraced circumcision, and the whole law of Moses, met at their devotions; and the court of the Gentiles, where the unclean Jew, and the Gentile, who owned the true God, without professing Judaism, were permitted to come and worship. Now, under the same pretext of having the sacrifices near at hand, as well as out of a contempt of that court, where the Gentile worshippers were permitted to enter, the priests, for their sordid gain, had permitted beasts and poultry to be brought within this court, and graziers and hucksters, whose business properly was in the markets of Jerusalem, to mix with people at their devotions, which was an abuse notoriously scandalous.—Whitby's Annotations; and Eachard's Ecclesiastical History, c. iii.

^d It may possibly be asked, how our blessed Lord, with nothing but a whip in his hand, should be able to execute this heroic act upon a multitude of people, who might suttler damage in their wares, and consequently be in a disposition to resist him? Now, whoever considers that our Saviour had done enough already to prove himself a prophet sent from God, and that the general concession was, that the prophet thus sent had sufficient authority to rectify disorders; if he remembers, at the same time, the great reverence that was constantly paid to the temple, and what titles of honour and respect were given it by God himself, cannot but allow that the present abuse of it was abominable, our Saviour's zeal in redressing it commendable, and that, from all thinking and disinterested persons, it would consequently meet with countenance and approbation. Nor is it to be doubted but that a consciousness of guilt in the profaners themselves might, in some measure, contribute to their submission and acquiescence, even in the same manner as his enemies were struck backwards with a sense of their own guilt, as well as the majesty of his appearance, and fell down to the ground, when they came to apprehend him in the garden, John xviii. 6.—Poole's Annotations, and Bishop Smallbrook's Vindication, p. 146.

^e It was an appointment of the law that every man, from twenty years old and upwards, should annually pay into the treasury of the temple, in order to defray the expense of the daily sacrifices, the sum of half a shekel, Exod. xxx. 12. 15. This, and the voluntary oblations of people of all ranks occasioned a necessity of changing greater coin into less, and very often of foreign coin into that which was current in the nation. Under the pretence, therefore, of having things near at hand, the priests took this opportunity to gratify their covetousness, by letting out places to money-changers, who, to make up their rent, which very likely was exorbitant, might extort from those that came to them, or, as Origen imagines, give them ἀργύριον ἀδίκου, base money, instead of good, and so made the temple a den of thieves.—Whitby's Annotations on Mat. xxi. 13.

A. M. 4031, A. D. 30; ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 5439. A. D. 28. FROM BEGIN. OF GOSP. TO MAT. ix. 8. MARK ii. 23 LUKE vi. 1.

This extraordinary procedure incensed the Jews to such a degree, that they came and demanded of him by what ^a authority he did these things, and to give them some evidence of his having a commission so to do: but to this he made no other reply, than by foretelling his own resurrection, expressed in the metaphor of the temple, which they understood of the temple at Jerusalem, that had been ^b six and forty years a-building, but he, of the temple ^c of his own body, which in three days after they had slain it, he promised to revive. Though therefore at this time he refused to work any miracle at the instigation of the Jews, yet, shortly after, we find him working many, which surprised the whole city, and excited the curiosity of one person in particular, whose name was Nicodemus, a considerable man in the sanhedrim, and of the sect of the Pharisees, to repair to him, but privately, and in the night-time, for fear of being known, and to declare freely to him, “that he verily believed he was come immediately from heaven, because the miracles ^d which he wrought were a demonstration of it.”

^a Whether it were the priests, the magistrates, or the common people, that put this question to our Saviour, it is certain, that they do not in the least pretend to justify the profanation which he had thus reformed; and therefore their principle seems to have been, “that, let the corruptions and abuses in a church be never so great, yet they were not to be reformed, but either by the ordinary authority of the magistrate, or by an extraordinary authority from God. Such an authority they were ready to acknowledge in prophets; but then they expected that those who pretended to this, and to have their mission from God, should be able to prove that mission by some miraculous operations.” But how they came to put this question to our Lord, after they had seen his miracles, and knew that he claimed a divine commission, and had told them, ‘that the works he had done in his Father’s name bore witness of him,’ (John v. 36.) can be imputed to nothing but their perverseness, and obstinate infidelity.—Poole’s Annotations.

^b From Herod’s beginning to rebuild the temple, to this first passover after our Saviour’s baptism, it is agreed, that the time was exactly six and forty years; but then Josephus (Antiq. b. xv. c. 14.) tells us, that the whole was finished in nine years and a half. But this is to be understood of the general building only, since, according to the same author, (b. xx. c. 8.) several new works and decorations were still carrying on, and near eighteen thousand men employed therein, even to the time that young Agrippa was made king of Judea, which was about the sixtieth year of the Christian era.—Calmel’s Commentary; and Beausobre’s Annotations.

^c The Jews had a maxim, or proverbial speech among them, that ‘the sanctuary of sanctuaries was the Messiah,’ and therefore there could be no impropriety in our Saviour’s calling his body a temple; for if the apostle calls our bodies, ‘the temple of God,’ as he does, 1 Cor. iii. 16, and 2 Cor. vi. 16, how much more does that title belong to the body of Christ, in which the fulness of the Godhead dwelt always, and inseparably.—Poole’s and Beausobre’s Annotations.

^d But are miracles alone a demonstration of a person’s being sent by God? Nicodemus was not ignorant of the caution which Moses had given the Jews against false prophets, Deut. xii. 1, &c.: nor does he here speak of miracles in general, but of those particular ones which Jesus had done in the time of the passover, and these were so great in their nature, so solid in their proof, so beneficial in their effects, and in their end so well designed to confirm a doctrine every way suitable to the divine attributes, and to fulfil the prophecies concerning the Messiah, the Sun of Righteousness, who was to rise with healing in his wings, (Mal. iv. 2.) that there was the greatest assurance that none, without an omnipotent hand, could do them. Not to say that Nicodemus might have both examined the doctrine, and inquired into the life of Jesus, before he made that inference from his miracles.—Poole’s Annotations; and Calmel’s Commentary.

^e Some have imagined, from the seeming abruptness of the

him know, that this belief was not the only qualification requisite to become his disciple, and then proceeded to instruct him in the great mystery of regeneration, telling him, “That, as no production could transcend the nature and condition of its parent, flesh, for instance, though never so much diversified, could still produce no more than flesh; so this formation of a new creature was to be effected by different principles, namely, by the water of baptism ^f washing away sins, and by the Holy Spirit, giving a power and efficacy to men’s endeavours to do well; which Spirit bloweth where it listeth, and is, as the wind, certain and notorious in its effects, but secret in the principle and manner of its production.”

This doctrine of regeneration, which to Nicodemus ^g answer which our Lord gives Nicodemus, that Nicodemus might have put some previous question to him, not recorded by the evangelist, concerning the means of attaining the kingdom of God, that is, eternal happiness, or of qualifying himself to be a disciple of the Messiah; for in that sense the kingdom of God is likewise taken. But, besides that the term answered does not always, in the New Testament, signify a reply to a question already propounded, but very frequently no more than the beginning of a new speech, the connexion between the complement which Nicodemus makes our Lord, and our Lord’s reply to it, will not be amiss, if we can but suppose in the words this implication:—“Thy acknowledgment of my divine mission and authority, free and generous though it be, will not be sufficient to render thee a member of that kingdom which I am going to set up; for, except a man be born again, that is, renewed in his mind, will, and affections, by the operation of the Holy Ghost, and so become a new creature, he cannot see the kingdom of God, that is, he cannot be a Christian here, or a saint hereafter.”

—Poole’s, Whitby’s, and Hammond’s Annotations.

^f Those who make the water and the Spirit, here mentioned by our Saviour, one and the same thing, (which to every common reader, must, at first sight, appear to be distinct,) would do well to consider, that the question between Christ and Nicodemus was about what was requisite to prepare a man for the kingdom, that is, God’s church, and make him partaker of the gospel blessing. Certain it is, that baptism by water was not only the common method of receiving proselytes into the Jewish church, but it is declared likewise by our Lord himself to be the ordinary way of entering into his kingdom; ‘for he that believeth, and is baptized,’ says he, ‘shall be saved,’ (Mark xvi. 16); and therefore he gave commission to his apostles to make disciples in all nations by baptizing them. (Mat. xxviii. 19.) Nay, so far are the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit from superseding the necessity of this ordinance, that, in the apostolic age, we find them rather esteemed a proper predisposition for it: for, when the Holy Ghost fell upon Cornelius and his company, in the same manner that it fell upon the apostles on the day of Pentecost, (Acts ii. 1.) what is St Peter’s inference from these miraculous gifts? Is it that the persons on whom they rested had no need of baptism? No; but rather that these extraordinary gifts were a full evidence, that they were the proper objects of it; for, ‘can any one,’ says he, ‘forbid water, that these should not be baptized?’ So far is the baptism of the Spirit, even where it is undeniable, from excluding the baptism of water, and so strong a proof is the instance before us, that the graces of the Spirit may be the foundation of a just claim to baptism, but never, where the sacrament can be had, a lawful dispensation to any man for the refusal or neglect of it.—Whitby’s Annotations; and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iii.

^g Our blessed Saviour might well wonder at Nicodemus’s ignorance in the point of regeneration, when this was the common notion of proselytism among the Jews, that he who was washed and circumcised, was looked upon as an infant new-born; and where there were so many passages in the law and the prophets, relating to this very doctrine; for what else can the meaning be of the circumcision of the heart, commanded by Moses, (Deut. x. 16.) of the renewal of a clean and right spirit, prayed for by David, (Ps. li. 10.) of the putting God’s law in the inward parts, mentioned by Jeremiah, chap. xxxi. 33, and the giving his people a new heart, and a new spirit, promised by God, (Ezek. xxxvi. 26)? These, and many more, were intimations of seemed so very abstruse, "our Saviour proceeds to tell him no more, in respect of other mysteries of the gospel, than the earth is in comparison of the heavens; and so goes on to acquaint him with matters of a more sublime nature; with his descent from heaven, his death, his ascension, and the blessing of that redemption which he came into the world to accomplish. He instructs them in the love of the Father, the mission of the Son, the rewards of faith, and the glories of eternity. He upbraids the unbelieving and impenitent, and declares the difference between a pure and corrupt conscience, the shame and fears of the one, and the confidence and serenity of the other."

This is the substance of our Saviour's discourse to Nicodemus, who afterwards became a convert; and no sooner was the passover ended, but our Lord, in company with many of his disciples, who, by his miraculous works, were convinced of his divinity, went about the province of Judea, ^a making proselytes wherever he came, and causing them to be baptized by the hands of his disciples, because himself was employed in greater affairs, namely, in teaching the people, and relieving their necessities.

John the Baptist had, at this time, removed his station from Bethabara to Ænon, a place remarkable, as its name imports, for springs and waters, and therefore of great conveniency for baptizing. While he was there, a dispute happened to arise between his disciples and certain Jews, who were present, which of the baptisms, that of John, or that of Jesus, was preferable? And when his disciples, by way of appeal to John, came and acquainted him that the person of whom he had given such honourable testimony, received proselytes, and that in vast numbers, by the same ceremony of baptism as he did, John repeated the same testimony again, and reminded his disciples how frequently he had told them, "That the person of whom they spake, was the Messiah whom God had sent into the world for the salvation of mankind, and himself no more than his herald; and that his ministry therefore was now going to decline, even as, upon the approach of the sun, the glory of the morning star decreases." And having said many things of the like nature, to prove Jesus to be the Son of God, and co-equal with the Father, he closed up his commission with these important words, "He that believes on the Son, hath everlasting life; but he that believeth not on the Son, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him."

John was at this time in the territories of Herod Antipas, ^b and, as he was a man of great freedom of speech upon all occasions, he was not afraid, when he came to Herod's court, to reprove him for his many enormities, and particularly for his cohabiting with Herodias, ^c the wife of his brother Philip, who was still living. This exasperated the woman against him to such a degree, that, though Herod at first had some esteem and reverence for him, yet, by her malicious instigations, ^d she prevailed with him to cast him into prison, with a purpose to have him destroyed whenever he could find out a proper opportunity.

About the time of John's imprisonment, our Lord, who, by the hands of his apostles, ^e had been baptizing for near seven or eight months in Judea, understanding named Cleopatra, a native of Jerusalem. In his first will, his father, as was said before, named him successor to his kingdom: but afterwards he changed his mind, made his son Archelaus king of Judea, and gave to Antipas the title only of tetrarch of Galilee and Petraa, which made him appeal to Augustus at Rome, in order to have his father's former will confirmed, and the latter reversed; but he did not obtain his end.—Joseph. Antiq.

^c This woman was the daughter of Aristobulus and Bernice, sister to king Agrippa, and grand-daughter to Herod the Great. She was at first married to her uncle Philip, son of the same Herod by Mariamne, by whom she had a daughter named Salome, the same who pleased Herod so well in her dancing; and how she came to run from one brother to live with another, Josephus has thus related the story:—"Antipas, in his passage to Rome, made some stay with his brother Philip, where he fell so passionately in love with his wife Herodias, that he could not forbear expressing it to her, and promised her withal, that, at his return from Rome he would put away his own wife, and marry her. Upon these conditions Herodias accepted of the offer, and, as soon as Antipas was returned, and his wife gone, (for she, having notice of the engagement between her husband and Herodias, made her escape to her father Areta, king of Petraa,) she, with her daughter Salome, left her husband Philip, and coming directly to Antipas, for ever after lived with him in a state of incest, Lev. xviii. 15. Nor was her ambition much less criminal than her lust: for, growing uneasy to see her brother Agrippa promoted to the title of a king while her new husband Antipas had no more than that of a tetrarch, she pressed him so much that he determined to make a journey to Rome, with an intention to ask the like dignity of Caligula the emperor; but the emperor, being prejudiced by several letters, which Agrippa had written against Antipas, instead of advancing him, deprived him of his tetrarchy, and condemned him to perpetual banishment." The emperor, however, understanding that Herodias was Agrippa's sister, showed an inclination to pardon her; but she chose rather to follow her husband in the calamity she had brought upon him, than to owe any thing to her brother's fortune, so that they were both confiscated, and banished together, first into France, and afterwards into Spain, where they died.—Jewish Antiq. b. 8. c. 9.

^d The evangelists have assigned the true reason for the Baptist's imprisonment. But since the Pharisees, very probably, represented him as the author of a new sect, a promoter of seditions and rebellions, and a person dangerous to the government, by reason of the multitude of his followers, Antipas craftily made that his pretence, as appears from Josephus, (b. xviii. c. 7.) for confining him; and the better to remove him from the people, sent him bound out of Galilee, into Petraa, to a strong castle, called Macharus, near the Dead sea, and towards the borders of Arabia, where he continued above a year in prison.—Eachard's Ecclesiastical History, c. 3.

^e Several reasons may be assigned why our Saviour delegated the office of baptizing to his apostles. 1. Because it was nowise proper for him to baptize in his own name. 2. Because the baptism that was peculiarly his was the baptism of the Holy Ghost, Acts xi. 16. 3. Because it was an office of more importance, to preach the gospel than to baptize, 1 Cor. i. 17. And, 4. Because Christ's baptizing of any might possibly have occasioned disgusts and jealousies among the disciples, in the same manner as, in the early ages of the church, we find people valuing themselves and despising others, upon their being baptized by such or such an eminent apostle, 1 Cor. i. 12.—Beausobre's Annotations.

the doctrine of regeneration; but the Pharisees were so taken up with their rites and traditions, that they gave small attention to the spiritual things of nearer and much greater concernment to their souls.—Poole's and Beausobre's Annotations.

^a The evangelist no where mentions the particular place where our Saviour began his baptism; but there is reason to presume, that it was somewhere about Jericho, because there it was that John the Baptist first entered upon his ministry: because it seems expedient, that he should open the first scene of his office where his faithful forerunner had given such glorious and advantageous testimonies of him, and, in one and the same place, complete John's baptism of repentance for sins, which was preparatory to his coming, by the baptism of remission of sins, which he alone had proper power to give.—Cabnet's Commentary.

^b This Antipas, or Antipater, for they are words of the same signification, was the son of Herod the Great, by one of his wives, that the Pharisees began to be envious at him for the great multitudes of people that resorted to him, resolved to leave that province, and pass into ^a Galilee, in order to enter upon the more solemn part of his ministerial function. In this journey it was necessary for him to pass through Samaria; ^b and, as he travelled on foot, and the weather was hot, when he came within a little of ^c Sychar, he sent his disciples in to the city to buy provisions, and sat himself down by the side of a famous well, called Jacob's well. ^d

A. M. 4031. A. C. 30; ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 5439. A. D. 28. FROM BEGIN. OF GOSP. TO MAT. ix. 8. MARK ii. 23. LUKE vi. 1.

While he was sitting there, a woman of a loose life and conversation came out of the city to draw water, and when he requested some of her to drink, she, perceiving that he was a Jew, took the freedom to ask him, how he could offer any such request to a Samaritan, since there were so great feuds, and so little dealings ^e between

^a It is a province of Palestine, which extends itself chiefly into the northern parts thereof. The tribes which it contains, are Issachar, Zebulun, Naphtali, and Asher, with part, as some say, of Dan, and Persea, beyond the Jordan. On the north, it is bounded by Lebanon and Syria; on the west, by Phœnicia; on the south, by Samaria; and on the east mostly by the river Jordan, and the sea of Galilee. It is generally divided into two parts, the Upper and the Lower Galilee, whereof the former is called 'Galilee of the Gentiles,' (Mat. iv. 15.) either because it was chiefly possessed by the Gentiles, with Jews interspersed among them, or rather because it bordered upon Gentile nations, such as the Phœnicians, Syrians, and Arabians. The whole country, according to Josephus, was fruitful, and well cultivated, and the people laborious and industrious. The number of its towns and villages was prodigiously great, and so well inhabited, that the least of them did not contain less than fifteen thousand souls. The natives were a bold intrepid race of men, who defended themselves bravely against the foreign nations that surrounded them; but then their wealth and prowess made them seditious, and very apt to rebel against the Romans, for which they sometimes suffered very much.—Wright's Alphabetical Table.—"Galilee," says Chateaubriand, "would be a paradise were it inhabited by an industrious people under an enlightened government. Vine stocks are to be seen here a foot and a half in diameter, forming, by their twining branches, vast arches and extensive ceilings of verdure. A cluster of grapes, two or three feet in length, will give an abundant supper to a whole family. The plains of Esdraeton are occupied by Arab tribes, around whose brown tents the sheep and lambs gambol to the sound of the reed, which at night-fall calls them home. For some years this fine country has groaned and bled under the malignant genius of Turkish despotism; the fields are left without cultivation, and the towns and villages are reduced to beggary: late events encourage us to hope that a milder administration will soon change the aspect of affairs, and bestow on the Syrian provinces at large some of the benefits which the more liberal policy of Mohammed Ali has conferred upon the pashalic of Egypt."—Ed.

^b It is a province of Palestine, so called from its city of the same name, that was once the capital of the kingdom of Israel, which lies exactly between Judea to the south, and Galilee to the north, and extends itself from the Mediterranean sea westward, to the river Jordan eastward, taking up the most considerable part of what formerly belonged to the tribe of Ephraim, and the half tribe of Manasseh, on the west side of Jordan.—Wells' Geography of the New Testament.

^c Sychar is only a corrupt pronunciation of Sychem, or Shechem, which is the capital of the country that was once called Samaria. At present it is called Naplosa, and stands in a narrow valley, between Mount Gerizim on the south, at the foot of which it is situate, and Ebal on the north. On Mount Gerizim they had once a temple, which seemed to rival that of Jerusalem; but in the time of the Maccabees, it was destroyed by Hyrcanus, and what they have now is only a little place of worship, to which, at certain seasons, they nevertheless repair for the performance of the rites of their religion; but what those rites are, it is not easy to say.—Wells' Geography of the New Testament.—The ancient Shechem is one of the most prosperous towns in the holy land, being still the metropolis of a rich and extensive country, and abounding in agricultural wealth. Nor is there any thing finer than its appearance when viewed from the heights by which it is surrounded. It strikes the eye of the traveller who advances from the north, as being embosomed in the most delightful and fragrant bowers, half concealed by rich gardens and stately trees, collected into groves all round the beautiful valley in which it stands. There is a considerable trade, as well as a flourishing manufacture of soap; and the population has been reckoned as high as ten thousand,—an estimate, however, which Mr Buckingham thinks somewhat overrated. Within the town are six mosques, five baths, one Christian church, an excellent covered bazar for fine goods, and an open one for provisions, besides numerous cotton-cloth manufactories, and shops of every description. The inhabitants are chiefly Mohammedans. The Jews, inheriting their ancient enmity towards the Samaritans, avoid the country which the latter formerly possessed; while the Christians, alienated by the suspicion of heresy among their brethren at Nablous, prefer the more orthodox assemblies at Jerusalem and Nazareth. The Samaritans themselves do not exceed forty in number. They have a synagogue in the town where they perform divine service every Saturday. Four times a year they go in solemn procession to the old temple on Mount Gerizim; on which occasion they meet before sunrise, and continue reading the law till noon. On one of these days they kill six or seven rams. They have but one school in Nablous where their language is taught, though they take much pride in preserving ancient manuscripts of their Pentateuch in the original character. Mr Connor saw a copy which is reported to be three thousand five hundred years old, but was not allowed to examine nor even to touch it. If any thing connected with the memory of past ages be calculated to awaken local enthusiasm, the land around this city is eminently entitled to that distinction. The sacred record of events transacted in the fields of Shechem is from our earliest years remembered with delight. "Along the valley," observes a late traveller, "we beheld a company of Ishmaelites coming from Gilead, as in the days of Reuben and Judah, with their camels, bearing spicery, and balm, and myrrh; who would gladly have purchased another Joseph of his brethren, and conveyed him as a slave to some Potiphar in Egypt. Upon the hills around flocks and herds were feeding as of old; nor in the simple garb of the shepherds of Samaria was there any thing to contradict the notions we may entertain of the appearance formerly exhibited by the sons of Jacob."—Ed. Cob. Lib.—En.

^d It is much to be questioned, whether the well that is at present shown to travellers as Jacob's well, be that where our Saviour discoursed with the Samaritan woman, because it seems to be too remote from the town for women to come thither to draw water: unless we may suppose that the city did formerly extend itself farther than that way than it does now. However this be, the well is at present covered with a small vault, into which you get down by a very strait hole, and then removing a broad flat stone, you discover the mouth of the well itself. It is dug in a firm rock, about three yards in diameter, and thirty-five in depth; and to confute the story, which is commonly told to travellers, namely, that it is all the year dry, except on the anniversary when our Saviour sat upon it, but that then it bubbles up with abundance of water, Mr Maudrell tells us, that when they came to sound it, they found no less than five yards of water in it.—Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem; and Wells' Geography of the New Testament.

^e The chief reasons of the Jewish hatred against the Samaritans were these three: 1. the foreign extraction of the Samaritans, they being most of them descendants from the Cutheans, whom Salmanazar sent to Samaria, when he carried away the ten tribes into captivity, (2 Kings xviii. 9.) 2. the difference of their religion and worship, inasmuch as that of the Samaritans was a kind of mixture of Jewish and Pagan rites together; and, 3. the rival temple, which the Samaritans had built on Mount Gerizim, and consecrated to Jupiter Olympus, in order to avoid the persecution of Antiochus.—Joseph. Antiq. b. xii. c. 2. These were the chief causes of the animosities between them. The Jews, however, did not carry their resentment so high, but that, in some cases, they would traffic or buy any thing of them; but then the Pharisees came in with a tradition, that they were not to borrow any thing of them, or receive any kindness from them, nor drink of their water, nor eat of their morsels. This, however, our Lord despised, as having no foundation either in the law of God or equity, and as tending to impair the law of them and the Jews? Little did the woman know the excellency of the person who asked her so small a favour; but in some measure to convince her, our Lord took occasion from hence, under the metaphor of water, to discourse to her of spiritual blessings; and to make her sensible of his omniscience, he reminded her of some passages of her life, particularly of the a five times she had been divorced for her adulteries, and of the state of fornication wherein she then lived.

Convinced by this discovery that he was a prophet, she propounded to him the great question so much controverted between the Jews and Samaritans, namely, Which was the proper place of public worship, Gerizim or Jerusalem? To which our Saviour, in his answer, gives manifestly the preference to the Jewish form and place of worship; but makes it a question of no great moment, since the time was approaching when all sacrifices and ceremonial rites should cease, and when God, who is a spirit, expected to be worshipped in a more b rational and spiritual manner than hitherto he had been.

common friendship and humanity; and therefore we find him asking to drink with the Samaritan woman, and afterwards going into the city and eating with the Sechemites.—Beausobre and Whitley's Annotations.

a The words of the text are, 'thou hast had five husbands;' but whether five successively, and after the death of one another or five from whom she had been divorced for adultery, is not agreed. The most modern interpreters, however, judge that she had been married to five several men, but so behaved herself towards them, that for her adultery, or some other froward behaviour, they had given her a bill of divorce. This seems more likely to be the true sense, than that, after the death of five legal husbands, she should live in whoredom with a sixth person.—Poole's Annotations.

b The Jews gave out that the Samaritans worshipped God in the image of a dove; but this seems to be a mere forgery on them. 1. Because among all the idols which they worshipped when they came from Assyria, there is not the least hint of the image of a dove. 2. Because Josephus, who, in several places of his history, inveighs against them bitterly, does no where charge them with this crime. And, 3. Because it is a thing utterly inconsistent with the law of Moses, which they embraced; for, as it forbids all images, so it requires men to sacrifice the dove to God; and surely nothing can be more absurd, than to worship that which we are bound to sacrifice. It is very likely, therefore, that the Samaritans had no false objects of worship among them, and yet they, as well as the Jews, might not be furnished with right apprehensions of the true one. They both were to blame, no doubt, in confining the worship of God to any particular place, and thinking that he could not be rightly adored, but either at Gerizim, according to the one, or at Jerusalem, according to the other, when his presence is certainly every where, and in every nation, 'he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him,' Acts x. 35. They, as well as the Jews, might think that God was pleased with outward ordinances, with sacrifices and expiations, which sanctified only to the purifying of the flesh; but perhaps they never supposed that these things were but types and figures of what was to succeed, and therefore to be of no longer continuance, than until the substance of the things themselves were come. They doubtless both had some expectations of a Messiah: but perhaps it never entered into their heads that he should be the angel of the covenant, who, with the incense of his blood, 'should offer up the prayers of all the saints upon the altar that is before the throne,' Rev. viii. 3. So that our Saviour, by this part of his discourse with the woman, plainly intimates, that, after his resurrection, and the promulgation of his gospel, not only the Jews and Samaritans, but the people of all nations whatever, should have right notions of God, the only object of religious worship, of the extent and universality of his church, of the qualifications requisite in true worshippers, and of the Mediator appointed by God to introduce and enforce their prayers.—Whitley's Annotations and Calmet's Commentary.

Our Saviour, before he had done talking with the woman, and just as his disciples were returned from the city, had informed her, that himself was the ¹ Messiah whom she spoke of; whereupon, leaving her water-pots, she ran into the city, proclaiming aloud that she had met with a person who had told her all the secrets of her life, and who could be no other than that great prophet who was to come into the world; so that the inhabitants waited on him at the well, invited him into their city, received him with great civility; and though some believed on him from the testimony of the woman, many more did so, from their own conviction, on hearing his sermons and divine discourses.

After two days' stay in the city, our Lord proceeded to Cana, where he had changed the water into wine, and where the Galileans, who at the passover had seen the miracles which he did at Jerusalem, received him with great kindness and respect. Higher it was that an officer belonging to the court came, and addressed himself to him with great humility and reverence, desiring him that he would come and cure his son, who was just at the point of death; and when, with more importunity, he renewed his request, and our Lord, to show the excellency of his power, that could cure in absence as well as presence, dismissed him with this assurance, that his son was restored to health, the believing father joyfully returning home, was by the way congratulated with the welcome news of his son's recovery; and inquiring of his servants the hour when the child began to amend, by the account which they gave him he perceived that it was at the very instant that Jesus declared to him, 'thy son is well;' whereupon both he and his whole family, being convinced of our Saviour's divinity, were converted to the Christian faith.

The imprisonment of John had put an end to his ministry; and therefore, to supply that loss, our Saviour himself began to preach the sum and substance of the gospel, faith, hope, and repentance, in the province of Galilee; and this he did in such an extraordinary manner, that he was admired by all, and his fame spread through the whole country. Coming however to Nazareth, the place of his education, he went into the synagogue ^c on the sabbath-day, and when he stood up,

^c That the synagogue worship was, at this time, loaded with rites and ceremonies of human invention, that the priests were very defective in the discharge of their functions, and the manners of those who met there very much corrupted, no one can doubt, who is at all acquainted with the scriptures and the Jewish history; and yet we find that our Saviour and his disciples, as members of the church of Nazareth, went constantly every sabbath-day to these synagogues, preserving thereby 'the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace,' and not upon slight pretences 'forsaking the assembling of themselves together, as the manner of some is,' Heb. x. 25.—Whitley's Annotations. The scribes ordinarily taught in the synagogues, but it was not confined to them, as it appears that Christ did the same. It has been questioned by what right Christ and his apostles, who had no public character among the Jews, taught in their synagogues. In answer to this Dr Lightfoot observes, "That though this liberty was not allowed to any illiterate person or mechanic, but to the learned only, they granted it to prophets and workers of miracles; and such as set up for heads and leaders of new sects, in order that they might inform themselves of their dogmata, and not condemn them unheard and unknown. Under this character Christ and his apostles were admitted to this privilege."

and read, ^a as the custom for laymen was at that time, a passage in the prophet Isaiah, beginning with these words, ¹ 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor,' &c. which he applied to himself, but in general terms, and spake thereupon with so much gracefulness, that the eyes of the whole congregation were turned upon him, admiring his discourse; many who had known him in the disadvantages of his education, began to have abject thoughts of him upon the meanness of his extract, as if he had been no more than a carpenter's son; so that his taking an occasion to upbraid them with their ingratitude and insensibility, so far provoked the whole assembly, that they hurried him out of the city, and brought him to the brow of the hill on which it was built, with a design to have ^b cast him down from thence, and destroyed him, had not he, by a miraculous power, ^c withdrawn himself from the fury of these wretched people, and left their city.

This barbarous treatment of the Nazarenes made our Saviour remove from them, and settle his habitation in Capernaum, which was the metropolis of Galilee, and by

^a What the nature and design of synagogues were, and at what time, and upon what occasion they were at first erected by the Jews, we have, in a particular dissertation, already discussed, and need only take notice that, though every synagogue had a settled reader, to whom was allowed an annual stipend, yet, when any grave and learned person came in, especially if he was a stranger, it was customary to make him the compliment of reading the portion of scripture appointed for the day, (Acts xiii. 15.) which he always did in a standing posture. For, as the law was given with reverence, say the Jews, so it is to be handled with reverence: and, when he had read what he thought fit, he might, if he was so disposed and qualified, expound and comment upon it. The character which John the Baptist had given of our Saviour, and the miracles which he had lately done in Cana and Capernaum, might possibly excite the curiosity of the master of the synagogue to hear him read and expound; read in Hebrew, and expound in Chaldee, as Ezra had introduced the custom. In reading the law, people were confined to the lesson of the day; but the rabbins have observed, that, in reading the prophets, there was a greater license allowed; and therefore, though our Saviour might read just where the book opened, yet there seems to be a good deal of the hand of God in directing him to a place which related to himself, and gave him so fair an opportunity of declaring the purpose of his coming into the world, namely, to publish redemption and liberty, pardon and reconciliation with God.

^b Such kinds of popular executions were sometimes tolerated, and, under pretence of zeal for the law, several were put to death, especially in times of public calamity, and when the Jews were in their greatest distress, (Josephus on the Jewish War, b. 5.) without the formality of justice. But what made the Nazarenes so exceedingly outrageous against our Saviour was, his declaring them unworthy of the miracles he had done at Capernaum, his equalizing himself to some of the greatest of the ancient prophets, and, by the instances of the Sidonian woman, and Naaman the Syrian, plainly intimating that his gospel should chiefly be received by the Gentiles.—Calnet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^c How he got out of their hands, when they had laid hold of him, the scripture does not tell us; nor is it our concern to be curious to inquire. We know very well that it was an easy thing for him, who was God as well as man, to quit himself of any mortal enemies; but how he did it, whether it was by blinding them for the present, or making himself invisible, or merely by allaying their rage and changing their wills, it is impossible to determine. Which way soever he did it, it was certainly something miraculous, and therefore deprived the Nazarenes of the liberty of complaining that he had done no miracles among them.—Poole's Annotations, and Calnet's Commentary.

reason of the lake ² which was near it, a place highly convenient for his designs. He had not long been here before great multitudes flocked to him; and as he was walking one day by the side of the lake, with a crowd of people pressing upon him, he saw two fishing vessels, ^a one belonging to Peter and Andrew, and the other to James and John, who were all partners and companions in that business, and stepping into Peter's ship, he desired him to put a little from the shore, that from thence he might preach to the people.

Peter and his companions had been hard at work all night, but without any manner of success; and, therefore, when sermon was ended, and our Saviour ordered Peter to launch out further, and to let down his nets for a draught, he modestly told him of their unsuccessful toiling all night, but, nevertheless, in obedience to him, he was willing: nor had he cause to repent; for, upon letting down the nets, they inclosed such a multitude of fishes, that their tackle began to break, so that they were forced to call to their partners in the other ships, to come to their assistance, because the draught was such that it loaded both the vessels so very deep, that they were in some danger of sinking before they got to shore.

Amazed at this marvellous sight, and dreading the visible appearance of so great and so divine a power just by him, Peter threw himself down at our Saviour's feet, desiring him to ^e depart from him, because he was a person no ways worthy of his presence. But our Saviour

^d St Matthew and St Mark, in their relations of this transaction, are pretty uniform: but St Luke differs from them so widely, that interpreters have been at some pains to reconcile them. For, whereas the two former tell us, that these fishermen were casting a net into the sea. St Luke informs us, that they were gone out of their ships, and had washed their nets, besides some other variation in the manner of the call of the four apostles. But not to enter into a minute examination of particulars, we ought to consider, that some allowances are reasonable, and necessary to be made for the variation of circumstances in one historian, who makes it his business to recount matters distinctly, and at large, and in another, whose intention it is, only to declare facts in general, without entering into the series and order of each action. Now, this is the case of the two former evangelists, they designed no more than a summary account of these four apostles' call, and their compliance with it; and therefore they contented themselves with setting down a part, so much first, as relates to Andrew and Peter, and afterwards what related to James and John. But St Luke, who proposes to show the manner and whole process of the call, records the miracle at large, and interweaves several remarkable passages, which were not needful to be mentioned in the brief account of St Matthew and St Mark, but highly conducive to St Luke's purpose of undertaking to describe the miraculous draught of fishes, (Luke v. 10.) which, upon our Lord's command to make a fresh experiment, was taken.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iii.

^e We have several instances, both in the Old and New Testament, of persons struck with dreadful apprehensions at the presence of the divine majesty, or even of some angel or a prophet delivering a message from him. And therefore Grotius supposes that Peter's case was much the same with that of the widow of Sarepta, when she complained to Elijah, 'What have I to do with thee, O thou man of God, art thou come unto me to call my sin to remembrance?' (1 Kings xvii. 18.) But others more justly think that Peter's words are expressive, rather of his high sentiments of our Lord, and the consciousness of his own unworthiness to be found in such a person's company, and that therefore they do not a little resemble that glorious declaration of the centurion in the gospel, 'Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof, but speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed,' (Mat. viii. 8.)—Calnet's Commentary; and Poole's Annotations.

bid him be of good comfort, and from the present incident, took occasion to inform him that he had a nobler work and employment for him, even the a gaining of men's souls to salvation, if he would aljoin himself to him; and having given the like invitation to the other three, Andrew, James, and John, they all obeyed his call, and leaving their vessels, nets, relations, and employments, b became ever after his constant and inseparable disciples.

After the choice of these four disciples, our Saviour returned with them into the city; and, on the next sabbath day went into the chief synagogue, and there preached to the people, with so much force and authority, and in a manner so widely different from their usual teachers the scribes, c that all were astonished at him; and to increase their admiration, one in the congregation, whose body was possessed with an unclean spirit, d cried out in a hideous manner, 'Let us alone, what have we to do with thee, thou Jesus of Nazareth? Art thou come to destroy us?' e I know thee who thou art; the Holy One of God.' But Jesus, who wanted the testimony of no such confessors, commanded his silence, and departure out of the poor man's body; which immediately was done, to the great surprize and amazement of all the spectators.

From the synagogue our Lord retired to Peter's house, where his wife's mother lay sick of a fever; but, upon his approaching the bedside, and taking her by the hand, he commanded the fever f to depart, and that moa The words in our translation are, 'From henceforth thou shalt catch men,' but in the Greek ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν ἀβραμωσὺς ἔσθαι ζωγγῶν, there is something very remarkable. For it does not say that Peter should catch men, as people generally do wild beasts or fishes, in order to kill them, and eat them; but that he should take them alive, as such fish and wild creatures are taken that are designed to be put in stews and parks; and therefore the sense of the word is, 'Thou shalt be a fisher of men,' but such a fisher, as shall preserve them alive; as shall retrieve them, in short, from error and ignorance, and death; and conduct them to truth and knowledge, and eternal life.—Hammond's Paraphrase; and Calmet's Commentary.

b Towards the conclusion of the first chapter of St John's gospel, we meet with a call of some five of our Lord's disciples about a year prior to this; but, by the account of the other evangelists, it appears that they did not, at this time, become our Saviour's constant attendants, because it is presumable, that though he took this opportunity to make himself known to them, yet he had not as yet any immediate occasion for them, and therefore remitted them to their respective trades. Only Philip is supposed to have retained to him from the very first, because he seems to have called him in a formal manner, as he did not, at that time, the rest, (John i. 43.); and because we find no further interview between him and Philip upon this score, as there was between him and three, at least, of the rest, (Luke v. 10, 11.) These three disciples, therefore, namely, Andrew, Peter, and John, were twice called; but the former calling was rather a warning to hold themselves in readiness for it, than an actual engaging them in his service; but now in Philip we meet with no other call than what he had at first; and, therefore, though the fathers, and some ancient writers, have given the honour to St Andrew, of being the first disciple; yet that prerogative is evidently St Philip's. For, though Andrew and Peter were the first that came and conversed with our Lord, yet we find them returning to their trades again, and not ordained to their discipleship, till after the time that the Baptist was cast into prison.—Beausobre's Annotations, and Calmet's Commentary; and Howell's History, b. ii. in the notes.

c There are several opinions wherein the excellency of Christ's preaching, above that of the Jewish doctors, did consist. Some think that his teaching was not so much in the manner of an instructor, as a legislator, and one who, in his own name, had power to propound the terms of life and death. But though this, in relation to Christ's divinity, be certainly true, yet it is not so agreeable, either to his prophetic office, or his frequent declarations, 'that the doctrine which he taught was not his own, but his who sent him; and that he spake not of himself, but as his Father had commanded him,' (John vii. 16. and xi. 51.) Others imagine, that the excellency of Christ's preaching consisted in the miracles wherewith he confirmed his doctrine: for so the evangelist represents the matter: 'They all marvelled, saying, What new doctrine is this? For with authority he commanded the unclean spirits, and they obey him,' (Mark i. 27.) But because another evangelist tells us, that it was his doctrine, without his miracles, that astonished the people, (Mat. vii. 29.) Others are of opinion, that his excellency lay in the graceful and lively manner of his delivery, not like the teachers of the Jews, who read their lectures of the law so coldly, so perfunctorily, as never to affect the hearts of their hearers; and that, in short, he spake as a prophet, who had a full commission from God to deliver his message to them; not as the scribes, who pretended only

d Those who are minded to depreciate our Saviour's miracles will needs persuade us that the Jews, having a notion that the diseases whose symptoms they could not account for were inflicted by devils, whom God might employ to chastise mankind, did therefore give the name of evil spirits to several distempers which proceeded merely from natural causes: that, of these distempers, such as had any thing loathsome or nauseous attending them, they generally called by the name of 'an unclean spirit;' and that, because sepulchres, of all other places, were reputed the most polluted; therefore whenever any crazy or melancholic people took it in their heads to frequent such places, they were always said to be possessed with such spirits; see Beausobre's Annotations on Mat. iv. 24. and x. 1. But how groundless this whole hypothesis is, we shall take occasion to show at large, in our answer to the objections belonging to this chapter.

e It may justly be made a question, whether the devil, who possessed this man, did actually know our Saviour to be the Son of God, as he pretended? There are two evangelists who relate this miracle, and, in the conclusion of it, both tell us that our Saviour 'suffered not the devils to speak, because they knew him to be Christ,' (Mark i. 34; Luke iv. 41.) But, notwithstanding this, some interpreters do not scruple to affirm the contrary, namely, that the devil had no perfect perception of our Lord's divinity, until his resurrection from the dead. The state of humiliation which he chose, the obscurity in which he lived, and the persecutions which he suffered, without ever employing his power to redress them; the care which he took to conceal his most renowned actions, and to refer the glory of them all to God alone, deceived the devil, and kept him in suspense. For, had he known Jesus, say they, he would never have put it into the heart of Judas to betray, or of the Jews to crucify him, since this was the proper way to accomplish man's redemption. But the answer to this is obvious. That though the devil did know Jesus to be the Messiah, yet he did not know the mystery of man's redemption. When he first essayed our Lord in his temptations, he spake indeed in a different manner, 'If thou be the Son of God;' but by his defeat he soon perceived that his antagonist was more than man. Though, therefore, he perfectly knew him to be the Son of God, yet seeing him invested with our nature, he might, very likely, be so far infatuated as to think that, by destroying his humanity, he might possibly defeat God's great design. For how sublime soever we may suppose his intellectual faculties to be, yet the wonderful work of man's salvation by the death of Christ, the apostle plainly tells us, is what no finite understanding could comprehend, until 'God was pleased to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, to the intent that now, unto principalities and powers in heavenly places, might be known by the church, the manifold wisdom of God, according to the eternal purpose, which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord,' Eph. iii. 9, &c.—Calmet's Commentary.

f Fevers are common distempers, and very often cured by ordinary means, so that the nature of this miracle did not lie in the cure of an incurable disease, but in the manner of the cure, which was with a touch; the suddenness of it; her fever immediately left her; and the perfectness of it, in that she was able to rise and wait on the company. This is said to be Peter's wife's mother; and from hence it may be presumed, that Peter, who was himself of Bethsaida, had married a woman of Capernaum, ment restored her to such perfect health, that immediately she arose, and, as if she had never been sick, waited on the company. This, and the other miracle in the synagogue, as soon as the sun was set, and the sabbath ended, gathered all the city together about Peter's house, bringing demoniacs, ^a and diseased people of all kinds, and begging the relief of this heavenly physician, who very readily cured them all, by a touch only, or the imposition of his hand.

The next morning he retired very early into a private place, that, being free from the noise and importunities of the multitude, he might have an opportunity to pray; but even in his solitude he was found out; and therefore, to disengage himself from such a crowd of attendants, he told his disciples that the purport of his mission was to preach the gospel in other neighbouring cities; and, therefore, leaving Capernaum, he made a progress into Galilee, preaching in their public synagogues, curing all kinds of distempers, and dispossessing all demoniacs that were brought to him.

In his progress through Galilee, he met with a man overspread with a foul leprosy, ^b whom, upon his humble and there lived with his mother-in-law.—Poole and Beausobre's Annotations.

^a This plainly shows, that the curing of diseases, and the casting out of devils, were two distinct things, and consequently the error of those who, in their annotations upon the very texts where they are mentioned separately, endeavour to persuade us that the devils cast out were only diseases.—Whitby's Annotations.

^b No disease with which the human family has been afflicted, has been more dreadful than that which is often mentioned in the Bible as the leprosy. It first exhibits itself on the surface of the skin. The appearance is not always the same, but it commonly resembles the spot made by the puncture of a pin, or the pustules of a ring worm. The spots generally make their appearance very suddenly. Perhaps its appearance might be hastened by any sudden passion, as fear or anger. (See Num. xii. 10; 2 Chron. xxvi. 19.) The spots commonly exhibit themselves, at first, on the face, about the nose and eyes, and increase in size a number of years, till they become as large as a pea or a bean. There are three kinds of leprosy, distinguished by the appearance of the spots: the white, the black, and the red leprosy. These spots, though few at first, gradually spread till they cover the whole body. But though the appearance of the disease is at first in the skin, yet it is deeply seated in the bones, and marrow, and joints of the body. We have reason to suppose that it is concealed in the system for a number of years, in children, till they arrive at the age of puberty; and in adults, for three or four years, till at last it gives fearful indications on the skin of its having gained a well rooted and permanent existence. A leprosy person may live twenty, or thirty, or even fifty years, if he received the disease at his birth, but they will be years of indescribable misery. The bones and marrow are pervaded with the disease. The malady advances from one stage to another with slow and certain ruin. 'Life still lingers amidst the desolation,' the joints, and hands, and feet, lose their power; and the body collapses, or falls together, in a form hideous and awful. There is a form of the disease in which it commences at the extremities; the joints separate; the fingers, toes, and other members one by one fall off; and the malady thus gradually approaches the seat of life. The wretched victim is thus doomed to see himself dying piecemeal, assured that no human power can arrest for a moment the silent and steady march of this foe to the seat of life. This disease is contagious and hereditary. It is easily communicated from one to another, and is transmitted to the third and fourth generation. The last generation that is afflicted with it commonly exhibits the symptoms by decayed teeth, and fetid breath, and diseased complexion. Moses gave particular directions by which the real leprosy was to be distinguished from other diseases. (See Lev. xiii.) The leprosy person was, in order to avoid contagion, very properly separated from the congregation. The inspection of the disease was committed to the priest; and a declaration on his part that the person was healed, was sufficient evidence to repetition, with one touch ^c he immediately healed, but at the same time ^d gave him direct charge not to discover it to any one, until he ^e had presented himself before the store the afflicted man to the congregation. It was required also that the leprosy person should bring an offering to the priest of two birds, commonly doves, one of which was slain, and the other dismissed, (see Lev. xiv.) In compliance with the laws of the land, Jesus directed the man that he had healed to make the customary offering, and to obtain the testimony of the priest that he was healed.—Barnes on the Gospels.—Ed.

^c But how came our Saviour to run the hazard of making himself unclean, (Lev. v. 3,) by touching one that was manifestly so? No, whatever the law concerning the leper's uncleanness might be, it seems as if the priest that officiated about him was not affected by it, because we find him directed, to make so near an examination and inspection into his distemper, (Lev. xiii. 14, &c.) Aaron, we may observe, though he officiated about his sister Miriam in her leprosy, is not said to have contracted any pollution by it; and therefore well might a much greater high priest than Aaron, in virtue of his office, claim the same immunity. But then, in virtue of his divinity, it was impossible for him to incur any legal uncleanness. As therefore the effect wrought upon this leper was a plain demonstration, that the finger of God was in it, and he consequently approved of the action; so the Jews make it a received rule, that a prophet might vary from, and even change, the ritual law; and from hence we may infer, that as Elijah and Elisha both might touch the dead children whom they raised to life again, without imputation of uncleanness, (1 Kings xvii. 19, and 2 Kings iv. 34,) so might our Saviour touch this leper; though the opinion of some is, that he did not properly touch him as a leper, because the moment that he stretched out his hand, the leprosy was cured: but if it were not, the observation of Theophylact, on Luke vii. 13, still stands good, namely, "That our Lord might touch the leper, in order to show that it was not necessary to observe those lesser matters of the law; that touching an unclean person did not defile one that was pure himself; and that the only thing indeed that did defile was the leprosy of the soul." Calmet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^d If it be asked, why our Saviour should so often command the concealing his miracles? we may assign for reasons, not only his modesty and great humility, that there might be no appearance of ostentation in him, and that the Jews might have no pretence to accuse him of seeking his own glory, (Mat. xii. 16,) but because at this time it was not proper to irritate the scribes and Pharisees, who had already made him quit Judea, too much. He knew that in such a determinate space, they would bring about what God in his counsel had decreed. In the mean time, he was to 'work the works of him that sent him, while it was day,' (John ix. 4,) and to propagate his gospel, as much as possibly he could, both among the Jews and the Gentiles, which could not have been so conveniently done, if the greatness of his miracles had once provoked the malice and envy of his enemies to make their utmost opposition against him. He knew likewise the mad and capricious humour of the multitude, and had reason to apprehend that they might 'come and take him away by force, and make him a king,' (John vi. 15,) if all his miracles had been blazed abroad, before he had sufficiently instructed them in the spiritual nature of his kingdom. As therefore he was far from being a friend to popularity or sedition, he desired that several of his miracles might be suppressed, lest any bad consequences should attend the publication of them, until his own resurrection from the dead should be an undeniable proof and confirmation of all the rest. And this I take to be the reason of his referring the Pharisees, when they came to demand a sign of him, to that of the prophet Jonah, (Mat. xii. 39,) whereby he implied that he would use no more means for their conviction, until, by the miracle of his resurrection, his divine power, and the completion of the ancient types and prophecies should be so dilucridly manifested, as to leave them without any excuse.—Calmet's Commentary; Beausobre and Hammond's Annotations.

^e The priesthood, at this time, was much degenerated from its primitive institution, and many human rites and ordinances were added to God's law concerning the priest's examination of the leper who pretended to be clean; and yet our Lord sent this leper to submit to all these newly invented ceremonies, as know-priest, and offered the sacrifice that was appointed for a testimony ^a of his cure: but the poor man, out of the abundance of his joy, could not refrain from publishing it abroad wherever he came, which still increased our Saviour's fame, so that he avoided returning openly to Capernaum, lest the multitude of his followers should give some umbrage to the state; and therefore, having finished his progress through Galilee, which lasted for almost three months, he retired into a desert place, and there employed some part of his time in prayer.

Upon leaving his retirement, he went privately into Capernaum, but it was not long before he was discovered; and as soon as he was, such vast crowds were gathered together to hear his sermons, and to bring their diseased for cure, that the house where he was, and all the court-yard about it, were not sufficient to contain them. In the house were many great persons, Pharisees and doctors of the law from Jerusalem and Judea, as well as Galilee, who, led thither by their curiosity, sat hearing his discourses, and observing his miracles, when four men came bearing a paralytic ^b on ing that though they did indeed corrupt, yet they did not extinguish the divine institution. The divine institution was no more than this,—That when a leper was cured he was to appear at the city gate, and the priest was to examine whether he was truly healed or no; that if he was, the priest received him into the city, and by degrees into the temple, whither he should bring two clean birds of any kind, the marginal note says sparrows, and, having made a bunch of cedar and hyssop mixed together, should tie them with a scarlet riband made of wool; that to this bunch of cedar and hyssop one of these birds should be fastened alive, and the other killed by the leper that was cured, and its blood received in a vessel, filled with water; that when this was done, the priest should take the bunch with the live bird, and having dipped both in the water, tinged with the blood of the other bird, should seven times sprinkle the leper with it; and that, after this, the live bird should be let loose to fly where it would, and the person, thus healed and purified, should again be admitted to the society of the healthy, and a communion in religious offices. (Lev. xiv. 1, &c.)—Whitby's and Hammond's Annotations.

^a Various are the senses of the words, 'a testimony to them;' for they may signify, that the gift or oblation which the leper was to carry, would be a means to evince the perfection of his cure, when the priests had examined and admitted it as such; that this would likewise be an evidence to the people, who stood by at that time and saw him cured, when they should hear that the priests had pronounced him clean; a proof to the priests, that himself was an observer of the law, by requiring his patient to comply with the ceremonies of it; and a full demonstration that he was a prophet come from God, since they themselves owned, that a leprosy could only be cured by the finger of God.—Beausobre's, Hammond's, and Whitby's Annotations.

^b The palsy of the New Testament is a disease of very wide import, and the Greek word, which is so translated, comprehended not fewer than five different maladies, namely, (1.) Apoplexy, a paralytic shock, which affected the whole body;—(2.) Hemiplegy, which affects and paralyzes only one side of the body; the case mentioned in Mat. ix. 2, appears to have been of this sort;—(3.) Paraplegy, which paralyzes all the part of the system below the neck;—(4.) Catalepsy, which is caused by a contraction of the muscles in the whole or part of the body; the hands, for instance. This is a very dangerous disease; and the effects upon the parts seized are very violent and deadly. Thus, when a person is struck with it, if his hand happens to be extended, he is unable to draw it back; if the hand be not extended, when he is so struck, he is unable to extend it. It seems to be diminished in size, and dried up in appearance; whence the Hebrews were accustomed to call it a 'withered hand.' The impious Jeroboam was struck with catalepsy (1 Kings xiii. 4—6.); the prophet Zechariah, among the judgments he was commissioned to denounce against the 'idol shepherd that leaveth the flock,' threatens that 'his arm shall be dried up.' (Zech. xi.

his bed; but finding it impossible to pass through the throng, they adventured to uncover the house, ^c and to let down the sick man, bed and all, into the very room where he was sitting.

Our Blessed Saviour, being not a little pleased with such an instance ^d of their faith, and reliance on his mercy, was resolved to cure the man; and accordingly, in the first place, he gave him an absolution ^e from his 17.) Other instances of this malady occur in Mat. xii. 10, and John v. 3. 5.—(5.) The Cramp. This, in oriental countries, is a fearful malady, and by no means unfrequent. It originates from the chills of the night; the limbs, when seized with it, remain immovable, sometimes turned in, and sometimes out, in the very same position as when they were first seized. The person afflicted resembles a man undergoing the torture, βασανισμοῦ, and experiences nearly the same sufferings. Death follows this disease in a few days. Alcimus was struck with it (1 Mac. ix. 55—58.) as also was the centurion's servant. (Mat. viii. 6.)—Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. pp. 516, 517.—Ed.

^c But how could they possibly uncover the house, when they could not so much as get to it, much less get upon it, by reason of the throng that was before the door? Now, to have a right notion of this matter, we must observe, that the houses in Judea were, for the most part, even as they are to this day, (Sandys's Travels, p. 36.) low built, and flat roofed, and surrounded with a battlement about a breast high, according to God's own injunction, Deut. xxii. 8; so that, to go up to the top of their houses, the Jews had two ways; one by a pair of stairs within the house, leading up to the trap-door, which lay even with the roof; and the other on the outside of the house, by a ladder, or pair of stairs rather, either fixed or movable, by which they could ascend to the roof when they pleased, without ever going into the house itself. Since this then was the general fashion of Jewish houses, we need not doubt but that this at Capernaum was of the same figure and make; and therefore the bearers of the paralytic, finding that they could not come at the door by reason of the crowd, bethought themselves of another expedient. They went round about a private way, and coming to the stairs which stood on the outside of the house, up these they carry him, and presently gain the top. But finding the trap-door, or way of the roof, as the Jews call it, shut against them, immediately they go to work, and forcing it open, which St Mark calls 'uncovering or breaking up the roof,' (chap. ii. 4.) because the door, which lay even with the roof, when let down and shut, was reputed a part of it, they conveyed him down that way, which St Luke calls letting him down through the tiling, that is, through the roof, which, except where the door was, was all paved with large tiles, and by this means they found it no difficult matter to place him in the midst before Jesus.—Cabnet's Commentary; and Pearce's Indication of our Saviour's Miracles; see on this subject Cabnet's Dictionary, art. House; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. pp. 385, 386; Paxton's Illustrations, vol. ii. pp. 537—540.—Ed.

^d Some have supposed that, because the history makes no mention of any faith, but that of the friends and bearers of this impotent man, therefore the patient himself had no part in that virtuous disposition which inclined our Saviour to compassionate him; and thence they infer how far a man may be benefited by the faith and intercessions of others in his behalf. But it is a mistake to think that the words 'their faith' exclude that of the sick person: for had he not been persuaded that Christ was able to cure him, he would never have suffered himself to be presented to him, in a method so troublesome to his weak condition. We read indeed of no petition he made to our Lord, but the violence of his distemper might possibly have deprived him of the use of speech; or, if it had not, the very spectacle of a body so debilitated, the manner of the action, and the fatigue which he must have undergone in it, all spake for him, and carried a more moving eloquence than it was possible for any tongue to utter.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iii.

^e The Jews were of this persuasion,—That every disease of the body, those especially which were of a grievous nature, were sent upon men for the punishment of their sins; and though they might carry this maxim too far (John ix. 3.), yet sure it is, that the scriptures represent most of the calamities of life as the natural effect of men's iniquities. And therefore some have sins. This provoked the indignation of the scribes and Pharisees, as deeming him guilty of blasphemy ^a because none, as they imagined, could forgive sins, but God alone. But he, knowing their secret thoughts, first reprov'd their censoriousness; and then, by curing the patient before them, plainly demonstrated what authority he had to forgive sins. For though the power of healing be much inferior to that of forgiving sins; yet, because it is not so easy to impose a cure upon the world, where men's senses are witnesses, as remission of sins, which is a secret and invisible operation; therefore all the people, who were convinced by their eyes of the efficacy of Christ's last words, 'Rise and walk,' were satisfied of the truth of the former, 'Thy sins are forgiven thee.' And accordingly they glorified the Almighty, who had manifested such power on earth, and being filled with reverential fear declared that 'they had seen strange and wonderful things that day.'

While our Lord continued at Capernaum, he went out one day, as frequently he did, to the lake-side, and finding one Matthew, ^b otherwise named Levi, the observed, that as the word sins is frequently put for the punishment of sins, our Saviour's forgiving the man's sins was no more than a declaration of his intention to cure his distemper. Instead of 'thy sins be forgiven thee' (Mat. ix. 5), it is better to render 'thy sins are forgiven thee,' affirmatively; for, had it been a prayer, the Jews would not have objected to it. If nothing more was meant by our Saviour's words, than the removal of the temporal punishment of sin, the scribes could not have charged Christ with blasphemy. There would be no blasphemy in a miraculous cure. It is plain therefore that they understood our Lord as remitting the eternal punishment of the paralytic's sins, and that he does assume this power appears from ver. 5, 'Whether is it easier to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee, or to say, Arise and walk,' which shows that Christ makes a distinction between the forgiveness of sins and the cure of diseases; and in the next verse he lays claim to the former, and performs the miraculous cure as a proof that he 'had power on earth to forgive sins'—a proof of Christ's Deity, as God only can forgive sins.—Holden's Christian Expositor.—ED.

^a This word, in heathen writers, signifies no more than slander, calumny, or opprobrious language of any kind, such as tends to impair a man's good name; but in the sacred style it means unworthy and injurious talk concerning God's nature or attributes; as when we ascribe unto him such qualities as belong not to him, or rob him of those that do; to him, the infirmities of man; or to man, the perfections of God. This is the nature of the sin; and the punishment of it, under the law, was 'stoning without the gates of the city,' Lev. xxiv. 15, 16.—Calnet's Commentary.

^b Grotius, and those that follow him, are of opinion, that the Levi mentioned, Luke v. 27, is not the same with Matthew, in Mat. ix. 9, because Matthew never calls himself Levi, nor does Mark or Luke ever call Levi Matthew. But the answer to this has long since been given by St Jerome, in Mat. ix. 9, namely, that the other two evangelists, as their charity and good nature became them, endeavour to cover the infamy of their brother's former way of life, and therefore never call him the publican, lest they should seem to reproach him with the remembrance of his former conversation, but speak of him under his other name: though he, out of his great humility, in the gospel written by himself, does not only take the more commonly known name of Matthew, but adds that odious title likewise of Matthew the publican. Since then the custom of having more names than one, is known to have prevailed among the Jews; and as St Mark calls him Levi, the son of Alphaeus; so Matthew, in all church history, is said to be the son of one of the same name; and since the history of the person called Levi in Mark and Luke, agrees so exactly with what is said of him, who, in the other evangelist, is called Matthew, that there is not one circumstantial difference to be perceived, we cannot but conclude that this Matthew and Levi were one and the same person.—Whitby's Annotations, and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iv.

son of Alphaeus, a rich publican, sitting in his office, ^c he asked him to be one of his disciples, who immediately ^d forsook his gainful employment, and afterwards became both an apostle and evangelist. Within a few days after his conversion, Matthew invited our Saviour and his disciples, and, among others, some of the profession which he had forsook, to a feast. The scribes and Pharisees, who accounted all in a manner sinners, besides themselves, but more especially these ^e publicans, began to expostulate with these disciples, how it came to pass that their Master, who set himself up for a preacher of righteousness, and a reformer of others, came to be so intimate with these lewd and lost wretches, as to sit and eat with them at the same table: but, when our Saviour undertook the argument, he gavé so fair an account of the reasons for his conversing with these people, as made the very objection ^f become his apo-

^c 'Sitting at the receipt of custom.' The publicans had houses or booths built for them at the foot of bridges, at the mouth of rivers, and by the sea shore, where they took toll of passengers that went to and fro. Hence we read of the tickets or seals of the publicans, which when a man had paid toll on one side of a river, were given him by the publican to show to him that sat on the other side, that it might appear he had paid. On these were written two great letters, larger than those in common use.—ED.

^d The old enemies of our religion, Julian and Porphyry, accused Matthew of folly and inconsiderateness, in following a man whom he knew nothing of. But St Jerome's reply is,—That he could not want a sufficient knowledge both of our Saviour's doctrines and miracles before his call. The publicans, we find, were great frequenters of the synagogues and other places where our Saviour taught, and, of all others, expressed the greatest eagerness to be instructed by him; and therefore, if Matthew was of the same disposition, he could not want opportunities of being acquainted with our Saviour's preaching, and of the wonderful works which he did every where, but more especially at Capernaum. It is very probable, therefore, that Matthew, upon such conviction, was inclinable to become one of our Saviour's disciples, even before he asked him: but if he was not, the lustre and majesty of the divinity hid under the manhood, but shining conspicuously in the face of Jesus Christ, was enough to attract every one that he cast his eyes upon; at least, that powerful impulse which he, to whom all hearts are open, knew how to inject into Matthew's breast, could not fail to do it: and from this supernatural movement doubtless it chiefly was, that so readily, and without the least hesitation, he left all, and followed Christ.—Calnet's Commentary.

^e Nor was it only among the Jews, but among the heathens likewise, that the name of a publican was infamous. For, according to their writers, they were accounted no better than thieves and cheats: free violence, and unpunished rapine, and shameless covetousness, were their public profession. Πάντες πικρῶναι πάντας εἰς τὴν ἁρπαγὴν, was the saying of the poet; and it is said of Theocritus, that being asked, which was the most cruel among the beasts? his reply was, "That, of those in the mountains, the bear and the lion; but of those in the city, the publicans and sycophants."—Whitby's and Hammond's Annotations.

^f The arguments which our Saviour uses to the Pharisees for his keeping company with publicans and sinners, are these three:—1st. 'They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick,' Mat. ix. 12; by which he intimates to them, that, in conversing with such sort of persons, he was about the discharge of his proper business; and that as a physician's profession did sometimes call him among patients that had the most virulent distempers; so he, whose office it was to heal souls, ought not to refuse his assistance to those whose circumstances most of all wanted his help and advice. 2d. God's saying, in the prophet Hosea, (chap. vi. 6.) 'that he would have mercy,' meaning thereby all the kind offences whereby we promote our neighbour's advantage, 'rather than sacrifice,' that is, the rites and ordinances of the ceremonial law; whereby he taught them, that though these latter might, in their due place logy. But all this would not content the Pharisees; and therefore, joining with some of John's disciples, that were then present, they came and demanded of him, why it was that his disciples observed no fasts, when ^a they, and John's disciples, were known to keep many, to which he replied, 'that it was not the proper season for the ^b friends of the bridegroom to fast and afflict themselves, ^c while they had the bridegroom's company, and season, be acceptable to God, yet charity to the souls of men (which was the highest act of mercy, and that wherein he was then employing himself) was much more esteemed by him. 3d. That 'he came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance;' or that the great design of his appearance in the world was, to change the corrupt manners and dispositions of men; a change, which the righteous standing less in need of, should no more grudge the opportunities of it to sinners, than the healthful ought to think themselves disparaged, when the physician forbears the visits to them which he makes to the sick. Some commentators however have observed in this last argument a severe irony, and thus they expound it; "I am not come to cure those that think themselves well, nor to save those that account themselves righteous, as you Pharisees seem to do; but I am come to cure those who find themselves sick, and are sensible of the burden of their manifold iniquities, as these publicans seem to be."—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iv; and Calnet's Commentary.

^a Besides the public fasts appointed by the church, the Pharisees in general did fast two days every week, and those of more strictness than ordinary, four. The disciples of John too, who was himself a man of such abstinence, that our Saviour says of him, 'he came' comparatively, 'neither eating nor drinking,' (Mat. xi. 18.) did, no doubt, in a great measure follow the example of their Master; and, now that he was confined in prison, might, very probably, double their fasts and their prayers to God for his deliverance. And if they and the Pharisees were able to do this, why should the disciples of Christ be deemed insufficient? Now, to this it may be answered, that among the Jews there were not only the sects of the Essenes and Pharisees, who led an austere life, but also schools of the prophets, many of whom were Nazarites, and consecrated to the service of God; and that, besides these, the Jews had likewise academical and private schools, from whence might come disciples to John, and the Pharisees, already trained up to fasting and penance, and other severe duties of religion. But now it is certain, that the disciples of our Lord were chosen from their fishing trade, and so came to him wholly unacquainted with, and unfitted for these austerities, which to impose upon them now was not necessary, because his continuance among them was not to be long, and after his departure they would have occasion more than enough, to exercise these, and many more painful duties, in the propagation of the gospel, and the persecutions which should attend it.—Whitby's Annotations.

^b The Baptist, in his discourse to his disciples, had compared our Saviour to a bridegroom, and himself to his friend, or chief guest, John iii. 29; and therefore, as our Saviour designedly makes use of the same allusion, his argument runs thus,—"I am the bridegroom, and my church is my bride; as long as I am here, lasts the marriage-feast, and my disciples are the children or friends of the bridegroom, and so are not to mourn, but to rejoice with me while this time lasts; but, at my death and departure, this bridegroom shall be taken from them, and then it will be time for them to fast and mourn."—Whitby's Annotations.

^c 'Children of the bride chamber.' Great mirth and cheerfulness accompanied the celebration of nuptials among the Jews. The children of the bride-chamber were the friends and acquaintances of the parties, and assisted in those rejoicings. But to set some bounds to their exultations, a singular ceremony was introduced, according to the rabbins:—a glass vessel was brought in amongst the company, and broke to pieces, that they might by this action restrain their joy, and not run to excess. The Gemara produces some instances of this sort. Mar, the son of Rabbena, made wedding feasts for his son, and invited the rabbins; and when he saw that their mirth exceeded its bounds, he brought forth a glass cup, worth four hundred zuzes, and broke it before them, whereupon they became sad. The reason which they assign for this action is, because it is forbidden a man to fill but when they were deprived of it; and that it would be as imprudent and preposterous a thing, to impose rigorous austerities upon his disciples, who were but novices in religion, and inured to another way of life, as it would be to sew a piece of new cloth upon a rotten garment, which, upon any stress, would make the rent worse; or to put new wine ^d into old leathern bottles; which, upon the least fermentation, would both burst the bottles and destroy the liquor; for see the prevalence of custom, and how difficult it is to change an inveterate habit, forasmuch as ¹ 'none having drank old wine desireth new; for he saith the old is better.'

THAT the evangelists were persons of too much probity to deal in lies, and cunningly devised fables, is evident from their writings; wherein we find, not only the strictest prohibitions against guile and dissimulation, both in words and deeds, but such evident tokens of their simplicity and godly sincerity, as show that they would not be prevailed upon to conceal truth, even though it might tend to their lasting dishonour. For let any one tell me, how they can be supposed capable of forging any thing for the advancement of their cause, ² who have not been wanting to record the obscurity of their Master's birth and life, the poverty and reproaches he endured in his ministry, the ignominy of his passion and death, and the terrors and agonies of his mind upon the approach of them; nay, who have not dissembled their own faults and failings, their mean extraction and employments, their ignorance and mistakes, their cowardly desertion of their Lord, and many unsuccessful attempts to convert others by their preaching? Men that were thus frank and open in their proceedings, could never designedly palm any falsehoods upon the world; and if they were mistaken in some passages, it must be esteemed their misfortune, not their crime.

They were indeed illiterate men all, except St Luke, and brought up in mean employments; so very mean, that we cannot suppose them capable of writing a regular history of any kind, had they not been directed in it by the Spirit of Truth; but then to frame such an excellent system of morality as is contained in the gospels; to give such an extraordinary account of the satisfaction for sin, and of the nature and office of a mediator; to feign the life and actions of a Messiah, which should agree so exactly with the predictions of the prophets, and the types and prefigurations of the Mosaic law; this they were no more able to do, without the assistance of the same Divine Spirit, than they were to create a world: and yet, notwithstanding the great variety and difficulty of this province, it is wonderful to observe how all the four evangelists, who wrote at different times, and in distant places, agree, not only in the main topics, but sometimes in the most minute circumstances, ¹ inso-much that whenever they seem to disagree, which chiefly arises from them not confining themselves to the same words, or the same order of time, it looks as if the Spirit of God designed on purpose that it should be so, not only that they might be distinct witnesses of the same things, but that all succeeding ages of the Christian world might see with their eyes, that they had neither transcribed from one another, nor combined together like crafty knaves.

^d The bottles which were in use in the east, and at this time are very common in other countries, were not made of glass, as ours are, but were certain bags made of goats' skins, being well pitched and sewed together. They are very good vessels to preserve wine, oil, or any other liquor in; and in this respect, more especially, very convenient to carry from place to place, because, fall they ever so often, they will not break, unless they be very old or decayed. In which sense our Saviour compares his disciples, before the descent of the Holy Spirit upon them, to old bottles, because they were not capable either of comprehending or practising all that perfection which he came into the world to teach mankind.—Calnet's Commentary.

² The truth is, though the evangelists no where contradict themselves, or one another, yet they were not so solicitous to prevent their being suspected of doing so by injudicious and rash men, as they would have been had they recorded any thing but truth; because it is suitable to the simplicity of truth, not to be over nice and curious about any punctilio, and smaller circumstance, as the manner of falsehood is, but to speak fully and intelligibly, and then leave it to men whether they will believe or not. Instead of criticising, therefore, upon some difficult parts of the evangelical writers, we ought to consider their whole design, method, and contrivance; and if in these we find them rational and uniform, the common candour of mankind will hinder us from thinking them capable of any gross mistakes or inconsistencies, and where we perceive the appearance of any such, put us upon the charitable office of adjusting and reconciling them.

There is, indeed, a great and uncommon difference between St Matthew and St Luke, in their genealogies of our Saviour; but to accommodate this, we may observe, 1st. That these two evangelists were men of different nations, and in that respect had different designs. For ³ St Matthew was by birth a Jew, wrote his gospel for the benefit of the Jewish converts; and wrote it, very probably, in their language: and as he adhered to the received custom of the Jews in this matter of genealogy, he began his deduction no higher than Abraham, the father of the Hebrews; but St Luke was a Gentile, and may truly be called the evangelist, as St Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles; and, therefore, when he comes to relate the pedigree of Jesus, he takes a different method, and carries it up as far as Adam, the father of all mankind.

2d, We may observe, likewise, that St Matthew ⁴ intends only to set down our Lord's a political or royal pedigree, by which he had a right to the crown of the Jews, but St Luke shows his natural descent through the several successions of those from whom he took flesh and blood: and, to this purpose, we find St Matthew, as we said just now, beginning his reckoning only from Abraham, ⁵ to whom the first promise of the kingdom was made; whereas St Luke runs his line up to Adam, the first head and fountain of human nature; which plainly shows, that the one deduced only his title to the crown, and the other the natural descent of his humanity.

3d. We may observe farther, that as David had several sons by former wives, so by Bathsheba likewise he had three besides Solomon, whereof the eldest, next to him, was Nathan, and that Christ descended naturally from David, not by Solomon, but by Nathan: for, though it be frequently said in scripture, that the Messiah should spring from David, it is never said that he should descend from Solomon; for which reason St Luke only deduces Nathan's line, which came into the possession of the throne, upon Jeconiah's captivity, and want of issue, in the person of Salathiel.

4th. We may observe again, that the crown of Judah, being now come into the line of Nathan in the person of Salathiel, and after him, in the great and renowned Zorobabel, forasmuch as the two evangelists agree from Jeconiah to Zorobabel, and after him divide, each ascribing to him a different successor, namely, the former Abiud, and the latter Rhesa, we may rationally suppose that these two were the sons of Zorobabel, and that from Abiud, the elder brother, lineally descended Joseph, according to the computation of St Matthew, and from Rhesa, the younger brother, descended Mary, of whom Jesus was born, according to the description of St Luke.

5th. Once more we may observe, that it was a custom of the Jews, not to reckon the woman by name in her pedigree, but to reckon the husband in right of his wife, for which reason, we are not to think it strange, that we find Joseph twice reckoned, first in his own right by St Matthew, and then in his wife Mary's right by St Luke; for it is certain, that Mary was properly the daughter of Eli, and that Joseph, who, in the account succeeds him, is so reckoned, not as his natural son, but as his son-in-law, instead of his wife Mary, as the manner of the Jews was: and accordingly it is remarked by some learned men, that St Luke ⁶ does not say of Joseph, that he was the son of Eli, but only τῷ Ἠλὶ, he was of Eli, namely, related to him, and belonging to his family, as his son-in-law. Fit however it was, that the genealogy of Jesus should be deduced from Joseph, because it was so generally received by the Jews, that Jesus ⁷ was the son of the carpenter, ⁸ the son of Joseph; so that if Joseph had not been acknowledged to have been of the tribe of Judah, and of the family of David, ⁹ since, according a That St Matthew used the word begat only in a political sense, is clear from hence,—That he applies it to him who had no child, even to Jeconiah, of whom is expressly said, (Jer. xxiii. 30.) that God wrote him childless; whereupon, being deposed by the king of Babylon, Zedekiah his uncle was made king, and afterwards upon the removal of him likewise, there remaining no more of the line of Solomon, Salathiel, being next of kin, was declared king of the Jews; which Salathiel, upon that account, is said by Matthew (chap. i. 12.) to have been begotten by Jeconiah, not because he was naturally his son, but only legally or politically so, as succeeding in the kingdom during Jeconiah's captivity.—South's Sermons, vol. iii.

to the received rule of the Jews, "the family of the mother is not called a family," they would not have failed to have objected this as a just prejudice against all our Lord's pretences of being the Messiah.

The sum of these observations, in short, is this—That the royal line of David by Solomon being extinct in Jechoniah, the crown and kingdom passed into the next younger line of Nathan, another son of David, in Salathiel and Zorobabel, which Zorobabel having two sons, Abiud and Rhesa, the royal dignity descended of right upon the line of Abiud, of which Joseph was the last; and he marrying the Virgin Mary, who sprung from the line of Rhesa, the younger son of Zorobabel, and, as some imagine, having no issue himself, his right passed into the line of Mary, being next of kin, and, by that means, upon Jesus her son; so that he was both naturally the son of David, and also legally the king of the Jews, the latter of which is accounted to us by St Matthew, as the former is by St Luke.

This seems to be a pretty clear deduction of our Saviour's pedigree, and is capable of giving a fair solution to a great many of those objections, which arise from the different names, or the unequal numbers in the names, or the unequal distances from each other, which are discernible in the two genealogies. But perhaps interpreters might save themselves the trouble of giving a reason for several difficulties occurring therein, by saying that St Matthew,² concerning whom the main dispute is, recites his account as he found it in the authentic copies of the Jews, who doubtless in every family had preserved some known and approved genealogy of their descent from Abraham, the father of their nation, in whom they so much gloried, and from whose loins they expected the promised Messiah.^a

That even in our Saviour's time, the Jews³ had genealogical tables, wherein they kept an account of their families and tribes, is evident from what Josephus says, namely,⁴ That he gave the succession of his family, as he found it written in the public books; nor need we question but that the like, or greater, care was employed to preserve the stems of the royal family of David. Since then the Jews, who lived in the time when the gospels were published, though exactly curious in things of this nature, and withal maliciously bent against Christ and Christianity, never once endeavoured to invalidate the account which these evangelists give us; this seems to be a sufficient proof, that these genealogies, when first they came abroad, were neither thought erroneous, nor inconsistent, but agreeable to the public records then in use; and if any difficulties now arise in them, they are not to be attributed to any real and intrinsic cause, but accidentally to the ignorance of interpreters, for want of proper helps, at this distance of time, whereby to explain them.

It may seem a little incongruous, perhaps, that the Baptist should deny what our Saviour confirms concerning him, namely, that he was the Elias who was to be sent before, to make preparations for his coming; but in this there will be no manner of contradiction, if it does but appear that the affirmation of the one, and the negation of the other, proceed upon different considerations. Now the state of the matter is this,—The Jews at this time were in full expectation of the Messiah; but then it was an universal belief among them, that Elias should appear before him, and that his appearance should be a certain token of his coming: this belief they founded on the prophecy of Malachi, 'Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord;' but then they imagined, either that the body of Elijah was preserved in paradise, and should again appear upon earth at this season appointed for it, or that his body being dissolved, God would infuse the spirit of Elijah into a new one, created for that purpose. When therefore the great council of Jerusalem sent to inquire of the Baptist, whether he was either the Christ or Elias, now returned from heaven, as they imagined he was to do upon Christ's appearance, to this their sense of the question he replies, in express terms, that he was neither the one nor the other. But this does not at all interfere with our Lord's affirming, that he was the person foretold under the name and character of Elias, in the true signification of Malachi's prophecy. He was not indeed the very Elias, who had lived in king Ahab's time, of whose second coming into the world the sanhedrim now inquired, according to their misconception of that prophecy; but, according to the true construction thereof, he was the person who came in the spirit and power of Elias, of

^a Dr Hales has the following observations on the genealogies of Christ, which appear very satisfactory, and remove at once every difficulty, in so natural and consistent a manner, that his interpretation can hardly be rejected. "There are," says he, "two distinct genealogies given in the introductions of St Matthew's and St Luke's gospels; the former, principally designed for the Jews, traces Christ's pedigree as the promised seed, down from Abraham to David, and from him through Solomon's line, to Jacob the father of Joseph, who was the reputed or legal father of Christ, (St Mat. i. 1—16.) The latter, designed for the Gentiles, also traces it upwards from Heli the father of Mary, to David, through his son Nathan's line, and from David to Abraham, concurring with the former, and from Abraham up to Adam, who was the immediate 'son of God.' (St Luke iii. 23—38.) That Luke gives the pedigree of Mary, the real mother of Christ, may be collected from the following reasons:—1. The angel Gabriel, at the annunciation, told the Virgin, that 'God would give her divine Son the throne of his father David (St Luke i. 32); and this was necessary to be proved by her genealogy afterwards. 2. Mary is called by the Jews 'the daughter of Eli' (Lightfoot on Luke iii. 23); and by the early Christian writers, the daughter of Joakim and Anna. But Joakim and Eliakim (as being derived from the names of God יהוה and אל Jahoh and Eli) are sometimes interchanged, as in whom Elias was a type, and whose temper and manner of life Elias much resembled.

(2 Chron. xxxvi. 4.) Eli therefore, or Heli, is the abridgment of Eliakim; nor is it of any consequence that the rabbins call him אלי , instead of אליה , the aspirate aleph and ain being frequently interchanged. 3. A similar case in point occurs elsewhere in the genealogy. After the Babylonish captivity, the two lines of Solomon and Nathan—the sons of David—unite in the generations of Salathiel and Zorobabel, and thence diverge again in the sons of the latter, Abiud and Rhesa. Hence, as Salathiel in St Matthew was the son of Jechoniah or Jehoiachin, who was carried away into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar, so, in St Luke, Salathiel must have been the grandson of Neri, by his mother's side. 4. The evangelist has himself critically distinguished the real from the legal genealogy, by a parenthetical remark: 'Ἰησοῦς—ὡν (ὡς ἐνομιζέσθαι) υἱὸς; 'κωσήφ [ἄλλ' ὄντως] υἱὸς τοῦ 'Ἠλῆ. 'Jesus being, as was reputed, the son of Joseph, [but in reality] the son or grandson of Heli,' by the mother's side; for so should the ellipsis involved in the parenthesis be supplied.—Hales' Analysis, vol. iii. pp. 42, 43, second edition.—Ed.

How usual a thing it is for persons, who resemble others in qualities, offices, or actions, to be described by the names ^a of those whom they resemble, no one can be ignorant, who is the least acquainted either with the phrase of scripture, or with the common forms of speech. Thus the Messiah is promised by the name of David, because he was to be a king; ¹ Zadock the high priest, and his sons, are recorded by the name of Aaron, and his sons, by reason of their office; and, among us, it is no uncommon thing to call the rich man, a Cæsus; the wise man, a Solomon; the warrior, a Cæsar, an Alexander, or the like; and where then, I pray, can be the misapplication, in our Saviour's calling the Baptist by the name of Elias, when, in the severity of his life, his zeal for God's glory, his suffering persecution, his bold rebuking of vice, his reproofs of Herod, and the hatred of his incestuous queen, answerable to the prophet's chidings of Ahab, and the malice of Jezebel, he so nearly resembled the Tishbite? ² He was not indeed the real Tishbite; but, by the answer which he returns to these delegates from the sanhedrim, ³ 'I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, make straight the way of the Lord,' &c., he plainly intimates that he was the very messenger promised in Malachi, and came to discharge the office assigned to him in that prophet. So far is John's answer from contradicting what our Lord asserts of him, that it is indeed a confirmation of it.

The better to understand the nature of that taxation which St Luke ⁴ refers us to, we must observe, that every fifth year, it was a customary thing to take an account of the citizens of Rome, for which purpose there were proper officers appointed, who were called censors; ⁵ that their business was to make a registration of all the Roman citizens, their wives and children, with the age, qualities, trades, offices, and estates, both real and personal of them all; that Augustus Cæsar was the first that extended this to the provinces, and three times in his reign, first in the twenty-eighth year before the Christian era; secondly, in the eighth before it; and thirdly, in the fourteenth year after it, caused the like description to be made of all the provinces belonging to the Roman empire, and that this second enrolment, which was in the eighth year of the vulgar Christian era, that is, three years before that in which Christ was born, was the description to which Luke refers us.

Now, supposing the execution of Cæsar's decree, in every province of the Roman empire, to be committed to the governor of it; the carrying this work through all the countries that made up the province of Syria, namely, through Syria, Cœlo-Syria, Phœnicia, and Judea, could not well take up less than the space of three years; for if Joab ⁶ was nine months and twenty days in taking an account only ⁷ of the ten tribes of Israel, and in them only of such persons as were able to bear arms, we cannot think it unreasonable that the execution of the survey, which extended to all manner of persons, their possessions, qualities, circumstances, should in so large a province take up less than three years.

It is to be observed farther, that though the registration was made at this time, yet the taxes thereupon were not paid till Judea was made a Roman province, and Publius Sulpicius Quirinus, who in Greek is called Cyrenius, was made governor of Syria: for, before Archelaus was deposed, the Jews paid their taxes to their princes, and their princes paid their tributes to the Roman emperors; but, when Archelaus was deposed, and Judea made a Roman province, the tax was levied according to the valuation that was made eleven years before.

Upon the whole therefore it appears, that in this affair there were two distinct particular actions, done at two distinct particular times, namely, first, the making of the survey, and then the levying the tax thereupon; so that, if what is said in Luke ii. 1, be understood of the former of these, and what he said in verse 2, only of the latter, this will remove all difficulties, and reconcile that evangelist with Josephus; and that it is to be thus understood we have the opinion of many learned interpreters.

The truth is, ⁸ this levy of the tax, which was settled eleven years before, in the time when Cyrenius was procurator of Syria, ^a was attended with so many commotions and seditious tumults, that the evangelist thought he could not make mention of its being decreed, without giving some hint of the manner of its being executed: and therefore he puts it in, by way of parenthesis, that ⁹ 'this taxing was first made,' that is, first put in execution, 'when Cyrenius was governor of Syria.' ^b

^a The account which Josephus gives us of this matter is this:—"Cyrenius, at this time," says he, "was sent governor by Cæsar into Syria. He was a man of eminent fame, a Roman senator, and one that had passed through all the degrees and offices of honour up to the dignity of a consul. Coponius, who commanded the horse, went along with him as governor of Judea; but Judea being already annexed to Syria, it was Cyrenius's province to tax and cuss the Jews, and to make seizure of the monies and movables of Archelaus. The Jews grumbled at this way of assessing at first, but through the persuasion and authority of the high priest Joazar, the son of Boethus, they were persuaded to submit and comply without any further trouble, until one Judas, a Gaulonite, of the city of Gamala, together with one Sadducus a Pharisee, inveigled the people into a revolt. Taxes, they said, were only marks of slavery, and therefore the whole nation should do well to stand up for an universal liberty; and one lucky hit would make them free and easy for ever, and advance them in their reputation, as well as secure them in their possessions. This was enough to put the multitude in tune for any sort of mischief; nor is it to be expressed the havoc these turbulent incendiaries made in the nation, and what murders, robberies, and depredations, without distinction of friend or foe, they committed, under the pretence of advancing the common good of liberty and property, when nothing but passion and private interest was at the bottom."—Antiq. b. xviii. c. 4.

A. M. 4634. A. D. 30; ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 5349. A. D. 28. FROM BEGIN. OF GOSP. TO MAT. ix. 8, MARK ii. 23, LUKE vii.

St Matthew applies to the birth of Jesus, yet, according to the context, it seems at first sight to have a more immediate reference to another event; but let us examine the history from whence it is taken. In the days of Ahaz, king of Judah, and probably in the second or third year of his reign, Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, united their forces to come against Jerusalem, which put the king and his people in such consternation, 'that their hearts were moved,' according to the scripture expression, 'as the trees of the wood are moved by the wind.' Hereupon Isaiah is commanded to take his little son Shear-jashub with him, and to go and meet Ahaz, in order to assure him, that the design formed against him by the two confederate kings should not prosper: but finding no credence with the king, the prophet undertakes to perform whatever miracle he should ask, in confirmation of the truth of what he had promised him. Ahaz however still refusing, out of a specious pretence of not being willing to tempt God, the prophet turns from him, and addressing himself to the nobles of the royal blood, 'Hear ye now, O house of David,' says he, 'the Lord himself shall give you a sign. Behold a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel.'

Now, not to insist upon the original word Alma, a which, as³ learned men have observed, signifies almost always a virgin untainted by man, and which the Greek translators before Christ, who were not interested in the controversy, and yet knew the signification of Hebrew words much better than any moderns can pretend to, have so rendered this place; and, not to insist upon the tradition which prevailed among the Jews, not long before our Saviour's appearing, namely, that the Messiah should come into the world in such an extraordinary manner, that 'no man should know whence he was,' and, as the Talmud expresses it, 'that his birth should be like the dew of the Lord, as drops from the grass, expecting a Alma comes from the Hebrew word, which signifies to hide, and very fitly agrees with the customs of the eastern countries, who were wont to keep their daughters, while they were in their virginity, from all company and public conversation, and interviews. Thus, it is said, upon a public and extraordinary consternation, 'the virgins, who were kept in, ran, some to the gates, and some to the walls, and others looked out of the windows,' 2. Mac. iii. 19. But there is another, and more proper signification, which, from the same word, that signifies to hide or cover, this Alma will bear, namely, as it denotes one who has not known man, or, according to the scripture phrase, one whose nakedness has not been uncovered. The knowledge of a woman is expressed in the law of Moses by 'uncovering her nakedness,' and, agreeably hereunto, Alma is a most proper word for a virgin, who is covered, and whose nakedness was never uncovered, or revealed by the knowledge of man. This account is perfectly agreeable to the Hebrew manner of speech, and to the style of the law of Moses. But this is not all; as several learned men have shown, that there is a great affinity between the Hebrew and Punic language, this makes the words of St Jerome more remarkable: "In the Punic language, which is said to be derived from the Hebrew, she who is properly a virgin is called Alma," in Isaiah c. vii. especially considering that St Matthew renders it by the word παρθένος, which signifies a virgin, properly so called, the very same word that the Seventy interpreters made use of, about three hundred years before St Matthew wrote his gospel, and consequently long enough before this controversy arose between Jews and Christians.—Bishop Kidder's Messiah, part ii. c. 5.

not the labour,' or action of men; not to insist on these things, I say, though they make very much for Christ's title to the prophecy,⁴ how can we imagine, that, after so pompous an introduction, and so important a name, the prophet should mean no more at last, by a virgin's conceiving, than that a young woman should be with child? What, does Isaiah offer Ahaz a miracle, either in the depth or in the height above? and when he seems to tell the house of David, that God, of his own accord, would perform a greater work than they could ask, does he sink to a sign that nature produces every day? Is that to be called a wonder, which word implies an uncommon, surprising, and supernatural event, which happens constantly by the ordinary laws of generation? How little does such a birth answer the solemn apparatus which the prophet uses, to raise their expectation of some great matter? 'Hear ye, O house of David,—Behold, the Lord himself will give you a sign,' worthy of himself, and what is it? why, a young married woman shall be with child. How ridiculous must such a discovery make the prophet, and how highly must it enrage the audience to hear a man, at such a juncture as this, begin an idle and impertinent tale, which seems to banter and insult their misery, rather than administer any consolation under it.

⁵But of what use or consolation could the future birth of the Messiah be to the house of David at that time? Of very great use, without all doubt; for it assured them of the truth of God's promise, in that he would not suffer them to be destroyed, nor, 'the sceptre to depart from Judah,' until the Messiah came. It assured them of his almighty power, in that he could create a new thing in the earth, by making a virgin conceive, and thereby show himself able to deliver them from their most potent enemies; and it assured them likewise of his peculiar favour, in that he had decreed the Messiah should descend from their family; so that the people to whom he had vouchsafed so high a dignity, might depend upon his protection, and, under the shadow of his wings, think themselves secure. ⁷In short, God had promised the Messiah should spring from the tribe of Judah, and from the family of David, even while that tribe, and that family, continued a polity undestroyed; and therefore, since that promise was not yet absolved, nor the Messiah as yet come, there was no fear of the extinction of Judah, and the house of David, at that time, whatever their present distress might be; but as God's promises were immutable, they had all manner of reason to believe, that the enemies now combined against them would, by some turn of Providence or other, be disappointed in their design.

Thus one great prophecy at least in the Old, as well as sundry promises in the New Testament, made it a thing necessary that when the Son of God came to be incarnate, he should be born of a pure and immaculate virgin; and it is impious to dispute the possibility of the thing, when God Almighty was the agent of it: but why this virgin should be⁸ married, rather than a single woman, is the other question we are to resolve. And in order to do this, we must observe, that by this means Mary's genealogy, not only by her father's side, which

St Luke has recorded, but by her husband's likewise, which St Matthew has done, came to be deduced; and so we have a double testimony, that she sprang from the seed of David, and, according to the promises of old, was the true mother of the Messiah; and by this means we have the testimony of her husband Joseph concerning her virginity, who was not a little uneasy in his mind, before he had satisfaction given him by the angel, and might possibly have been the first that would have blasted her reputation, had he not been fully convinced of her innocence and modesty; that by this means our Lord's birth was secured against all imputation of spuriousness, and his mother's character protected from the persecution of opprobrious tongues, which she must have endured, if not the censure of the law, and brought withal a perpetual scandal upon her family, had not her pregnancy, by the operation of the Holy Ghost, been concealed under the umbrage of a common husband; and that by this means our Lord was provided with a guardian in his childhood and minority, and his mother with a companion in her journey she was shortly to take, from Nazareth to Bethany, and from thence into Egypt, and both of them with a supporter, who, by honest labour in his proper occupation, might provide them with the necessaries of life.

These, and several other reasons, might be assigned for our Lord's choosing to be born of a virgin that went under the notion of being married; but how came he to be a man of poverty and affliction, to live meanly, and die ignominiously, when, had he been the true Messiah, he must, according to the representations made of him in the prophets, have appeared as one of the greatest monarchs in the world. This is the grand objection of the Jews; and therefore, to give it a proper solution, it ought to be considered that the ¹ Messiah, in order to accomplish the prophecies concerning him, was to sustain three different characters; for he was to be a prophet and a priest, as well as a king. The predictions indeed which refer to his kingly office, are more in number, and enlarged upon more copiously, than either of the other; yet both the other are so essential to the character of the Messiah, that had any one of these been wanting in him, the scheme of man's redemption had been broken and imperfect: and yet it is certain, that these three offices require operations, not only distinct and peculiar to each, but such as could not equally be exercised at one and the same time, by one and the same person.

As a prophet, the Messiah was not only to teach and instruct his people, but to undergo the common fate of prophets, in being despised, contradicted, persecuted, and in bearing testimony of the truth of his doctrine, by the example of his sufferings for it. As a priest, he was to make sacrifice for the sins of his people, which in this case could not be otherwise done than by offering his own blood, and consequently dying in their stead. Now, both these, in the course of things appointed by God, were to go before the entrance upon his kingly office, because the prophecies mentioned this last as a recompence for the faithful discharge of the other two. This is a matter that both the ² royal and ³ evangelical prophet express so very plainly, that St Paul in effect does but expound these passages, when he tells the Hebrews, ⁴ that Jesus, 'for the suffering of death, was crowned with glory and honour:' and the Philippians, ⁵ that 'for his taking upon him the form of a servant, and becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross, God had highly exalted him, and given him a name, which is above every name,' &c. Since, therefore, his regal office was not to commence till after he had accomplished his other two, to complain, that his kingly power was not exercised at his first coming, is to misunderstand the prophecies, and confound the order of events: it is to expect a full accomplishment of predictions within a very narrow space, that strictly belong to an office still in exercise, and to which, the scripture says, ⁶ 'there shall be no end.'

2. It is to be observed farther, that the style and manner of the prophets, especially when they treat of subjects uncommon, sublime, and spiritual, abound with figurative schemes of speech, and such pompous and bold metaphors and descriptions, taken from sensible objects, as awaken in our minds the most lofty imaginations we are capable of. This the Jews themselves make no difficulty to allow, and ⁷ some of their greatest doctors have laid it down for a rule, in the interpretation of the prophets, that in many places they are not literally to be understood, by reason of those metaphorical expressions, whose true intent is to represent things, according to our capacity, by images familiar to our senses. If, therefore, most of these great and pompous things that are said in the prophets concerning the glorious reign of the Messiah, may be understood of the spiritual benefits which we have received by his coming; such as, the grace of our regeneration and sanctification, the wisdom of his laws, the comforts of his ordinances, the holy and peaceable temper which his gospel inspires, the large extent of its propagation, and the blessed effects which in all places where it is sincerely believed and practised it produces: if things be reduced to this sense, I say, I cannot see but that the character of a powerful prince has been fulfilled in our Saviour already; for what king was ever so prosperous as he, who by the propagation of his gospel has enlarged his dominions so wonderfully over the most distant regions of the habitable world? Or what conquest was ever so glorious as that which he hath gained over errors and prejudices, the lusts and passions of wicked and mistaken men, nay, even over all the powers of darkness, and sin, and death, and hell?

But be it granted, as it seems indeed very probable, that several passages in the prophets relate to the temporal greatness, prosperity, and peace, that shall attend the government of the Messiah: yet we are to consider,

3. That, before the consummation of all things, there will be an enlargement of Christ's kingdom, even here upon earth. For, though he have all power both in heaven and earth, already vested in the human nature, united with his own divine person, yet is not that power so visibly and fully executed, as it shall one day be; nor are all these glorious effects as yet accomplished, which the prophets foretold, when describing the victorious and peaceable, the unlimited and everlasting, dominion of the Messiah. The enlightening of the Jews and Gentiles, by bringing such multitudes of the one and so many nations of the other sort, to the acknowledgment of the truth, is already a partial completion of the prophecies; but there is still a nobler in reserve, when the fulness of both shall come in. He reigns now actually in the hearts of men, and subdues the most formidable of our enemies, by the holiness of his laws, and the mighty operations of his grace; but that dominion and conquest will be much more absolute, when the time comes for every enemy to be utterly destroyed. Though therefore the whole be not, yet abundantly enough has already been fulfilled, to make us acquiesce in a steadfast assurance, that what is still behind will most certainly come to pass. For sure, how meanly soever they that consider things imperfectly, may think of a despised and crucified man; yet there is nothing so gloriously great that may not most reasonably be expected from that very man when ¹ declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead.²

It is made a strong objection by the Socinians, against our Saviour's being the Son of God, that, at the time of his baptism, the Holy Ghost descended upon him, for which there had been no manner of occasion, say they, had the Divinity, which was certainly no less powerful than the Holy Ghost, been personally united to him. While our blessed Saviour was discoursing concerning his approaching death, and a voice from heaven was heard speaking unto him, he told the people, who seemed to be divided in their opinions of it, ² 'This voice came not because of me,' that is, to satisfy me of the divine favour, or to comfort me against the agonies of death, 'but for your sake,' that ye might believe in me: and, in like manner, it might be a sufficient answer to this objection, that this visible descent of the Holy Ghost upon our Saviour was not for his sake, or to convey any virtue or power, that he was not equally possessed of by the divine nature that resided in him, but for the sake of the Baptist, and those that were then present with him, even to inform them of the excellency of his person, and divine mission: for though the voice, which immediately follows the prodigy, ³ 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased:' ⁴ 'Hear him ye him,' plainly shows that this whole transaction was designed for the instruction of all the company. Our Saviour indeed was now entering upon his prophetic office, and fit it was that the world should have some previous notice of it, before he came to open his commission. When he came to offer himself to John for baptism, John indeed, by some sudden inspiration, knew him; but he had not, as yet, made any public declaration of that knowledge; and therefore God took care to give the company this glorious manifestation of his being his Son, and a person sanctified by this descent of the Holy Ghost upon him to declare his will to the world, according to the prophecy ⁵ concerning him, and whose words and doctrine it therefore concerned all men to hear and obey. Our blessed Saviour indeed, as he was God, had no need of this unction of the Holy Spirit, but as he was to execute the prophetic office, it was expedient for him to have it: for, as a prophet is not to speak in his own name, but in the name of God, and what he has suggested to him by the Spirit of God; so this prophetic office was to be performed, not by the divine nature of our Lord, but by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. "We must therefore," with a great divine ⁶ of our church, "distinguish between the excellencies and perfections of Christ, which flowed from the hypostatical union of the two natures, and those which flowed from the donation and anointing of the Holy Spirit. From the hypostatical union of the natures flowed the infinite dignity of his person, his impeccability, his self-sufficiency to fulfil the law, and satisfy the divine justice; as from the anointing of the Spirit flowed his knowledge of all evangelical mysteries, the doctrines and precepts which he delivered in his Father's name, and the miraculous works which he did in confirmation of his mission and doctrine." For this is plain to every one that looks into the gospels, that almost in every page our Saviour ⁷ owns his mission from God; that the doctrines which he taught were not his own, but God's; that they were all dictated by the Spirit of God; and that the miracles which he exhibited, in testimony of these, proceeded from the same Spirit of God. Upon the whole, therefore, we may conclude, that Jesus Christ being now in a state of humiliation, and emptied of the form of God, acted, in things relating immediately to his prophetic office, not as God, but only as a prophet sent from God; not by the power of his divine nature, but of that Spirit by which he was anointed, and sanctified to that office; though, notwithstanding this quiescence in the Deity, being still God, of the same essence derived from the Father, he might do many other things by virtue of his divinity, such as discerning the hearts of all men, walking upon the sea, and stilling the stormy winds with a word, &c. And as this divinity was part of the doctrine he was to publish, he might, without any contradiction to himself, assert, that God was properly his Father, and he properly his Son; that he and his Father were one; and that 'all men were to worship the Son, even as they worshipped the Father.'⁸

Something of the like nature is to be said in relation to our Saviour's being tempted by the devil, ^a namely,

⁷ See Whitley's Preface to the Gospel of St John.

^a It has been said that the circumstances which occur in the narrative of the evangelists regarding the temptation of our Lord, may be viewed, either as events which happened in the most literal meaning which the words convey; or, they may be regarded as the representation of scenes that were exhibited only in vision to the mind of Jesus; or, they may be considered as a picturesque and lively description of the seductive conceptions that were actually suggested to his mind by Satan—a description in which the tempter and his arts are brought forth before our imagination as a specimen of what takes place in every temptation that assails us. The first of these suppositions is that which has been generally adopted, and it is that to which I feel myself bound to adhere. For, does not the scripture assert in point of fact, that the devil has occasionally been permitted to appear in a bodily form? And if, as has been remarked, in the form of a serpent, he seduced the first Adam from his duty, there is nothing incongruous in the supposition that he assumed the form of a man to assail the second. He had just left the state of privacy in which his youth was spent; his approach as the Messiah pro-

promised to the fathers had just been publicly announced to his countrymen by the messenger appointed to prepare the way before him; the Spirit of God had visibly descended on him in baptism; and a voice from heaven had declared, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.' The time therefore was come for his appearing on a new scene—as the Teacher and Redeemer of mankind. To fulfil all righteousness, and to prove him worthy of his office, it remained that he should be tried by temptation. For this purpose he was led by the Spirit of God into the wilderness. The plan of redemption rendered it necessary that he should assume the character of the Son of man; and as a man he was liable to the same temptations which encompass his followers; for it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, and in all points tempted like as we are, though without sin. But if there be no improbability in the supposition that Jesus should be subjected to trials, it surely cannot appear incredible that the agent should have been the same malicious spirit who in the beginning deceived our first parents, and gave rise to all the wickedness and misery which we observe among their descendants, and from which it was the great object of Christ's incarnation to redeem the human race. Satan, indeed, could not but know that Jesus was the Holy One of God, who had come into the world to destroy the works of the devil; but, notwithstanding he may have had some presumptuous expectations of success in assailing him. As he had already put it into the heart of Herod to murder Jesus in his infancy, he now attempted to draw him into sin, with the view of frustrating the plan of redemption. It is probable that Satan renewed his temptations, from time to time, during the whole forty days, continually interrupting Christ's holy meditations with his hateful suggestions. Those who allege that Satan did not appear in a bodily form on this occasion, but merely assailed our Lord by his usual artifices of deceit, argue, that the method in which Satan is commonly represented in scripture as seducing mankind, is by working on their imagination and passions. He does not appear to them himself, but he places before them occasions of sin, influences the train of their thoughts, and employs against them all the deceitfulness of unrighteousness, by suggesting to their minds such views as are most favourable to his purpose, by inflaming their desires, and through this medium hurrying them forward to the commission of iniquity. The power which he exerts over them operates through the force of motives and persuasion, and in a manner similar to that by which one man corrupts the principles and undermines the virtue of another. And what reason have we to believe that he acted differently in the present instance? Why may we not suppose that he employed against the human nature of Christ the same artifices that he employs against ourselves? Is it incredible that he should suggest to Jesus, pinched with hunger, that he ought no longer to wait, confiding in providence, for the usual appointed means of nourishment, but to exert his miraculous power for creating bread to himself? Is it incredible that he should suggest to Jesus, deliberating on the obligations involved in his arduous commission, some difficulties concerning the expediency of the gradual humiliating plan committed to him by his Father; and that he should inspire the thought of producing more immediate conviction on his countrymen, by descending from the pinnacle of the temple, or from the clouds of heaven; or of extending the benefits of his religion at once to the whole race, by appearing in his native dignity as the King and Sovereign of the nations? That there is nothing either incredible or improbable in supposing that Satan might labour to insinuate such thoughts into the mind of Jesus, is demonstrated by the fact that these are the very suggestions which he has committed to all his emissaries since that time, as sources of agreement against the wisdom of the plan pursued by Christ for instructing and saving mankind. Now, there can be no doubt that Satan often acted as an invisible tempter in regard to Christ, suggesting thoughts to his mind, as he does to the minds of his followers: but the form of the narration leads to the conclusion, that in the progress of the temptation, Satan assumed a bodily appearance. It has been thought that in the character in which he presented himself, he professed to be a friend, and proposed to him, that, if he were indeed the Son of God, he should command the stones before him to be made bread. Some think, that the temptation was chiefly intended to make him question, whether he were indeed the Son of God; but this seems rather exert itself upon all occasions, but sometimes suspended its operations, and was quiescent, as we said before. ¹ That the divinity was thus quiescent in Christ, until he entered upon the public exercise of his prophetic office, is generally thought by most orthodox divines; that, in all the actions relating to the execution of that, his office, it ceased in the like manner to act, we have just now endeavoured to prove; and it is generally thought that this was the case of his temptation by the devil, in which his divine perfections lying by, as it were, and forbearing to engage, he is to be considered abstractly as a man, though much more perfect than any other man. For fit it was that he, who, for this very reason, perhaps, is called the second Adam, should overcome the great enemy of mankind, in that very nature alone, and unassisted, wherein the first Adam was so miserably foiled.

Whether the devil might know that our Saviour was in reality the Son of God, or only some peculiar favourite of his, divines are at a stand to determine. It is the observation of Origen, that ² all the while that our Saviour was under the temptation, he never confessed himself to be the Son of God: and therefore, ³ since the dispensation of the gospel was not fully and perfectly understood by good angels, but gradually manifested to them, it is no wonder that the devil should be ignorant of the mysteries of the gospel, particularly that 'great mystery of godliness, God's manifestation in the flesh.' The devil therefore, seeing our Saviour, after he had been ⁴ declared the Son of God, so long in the wilderness with wild beasts, and hungry, without any food to sustain him, might be induced to question whether he was indeed the Son of God, in the most proper and highest sense of the words, and thereupon incited to assail him: but if even he knew him ever so well, such is his inveterate malice, that it hath often prevailed with him to attempt things very foolish and impossible. For what could be more so, than for a creature to attempt to be like God, or to annul the truth of the prophecies concerning Christ? What could be more pernicious to him than the death of the Lord of life for the redemption of mankind; and yet this he attempted with the utmost eagerness, and by setting all his instruments to work to accomplish it, though ⁵ 'it was impossible for our Lord to be held under the power of death:' whatever Satan, therefore, might conceive of Christ, as Petavius retorts the argument upon the head of Crellius, he could not but certainly know from the scriptures, that he was to be the Redeemer of mankind, and the Author of their salvation; that he was 'the seed of the woman, who was to bruise his head, to sit on the throne of his father David, and there rule for ever:' and therefore, knowing all this, he could not hope to prevail in his temptations of our Lord, unless he could believe that he was able to reverse both the decrees and oath of God. Whether therefore the devil knew, or knew not, our Saviour, it may well to have been assumed as a kind of principle, about which queries were to be proposed; in something of the same manner, as when Eve was tempted by the serpent. be deemed an infatuation in him, to think of being able to pervert him, as he had done our first parents in their obedience to God; but then, it was far from being a foolish or unnecessary thing for our Lord thus to suffer himself to be tempted,¹ since thereby he hath instructed us, that not any, the best, and most exalted degree of virtue sets men above temptations; and since thereby he has encouraged us to hope for his assistance and support under the like circumstances; both because² 'himself hath suffered, being tempted,' and because³ 'he was in all points tempted like as we are, he cannot but be touched with the feeling of our infirmities.' These were the true ends and reasons, why our Saviour suffered temptation, and the proper and natural inference from hence is that which the same author to the Hebrews makes,⁴ 'Let us therefore come boldly to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help us in time of need.'

There are few things wherein mankind seem to be more agreed, than in the acknowledgment and acceptance of miracles, as an authentic and indisputable testimony, that the persons intrusted with such power were employed by God; because the constant apprehensions, which both reason and revelation have given us of God, are, that he will not employ his power, as no true miracles can be done without the concurrence of his power, to deceive his creatures; and therefore, the reasoning of Nicodemus, when he came to visit our Saviour, was right,⁵ 'we know that thou art a teacher come from God, because no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him.' Since miracles then are the avowed effects of a divine power, we must certainly be mistaken in our judgment of them, when, with regard to their author, we esteem one greater than another. In effects, indeed, that are produced by human power, we are apt to say, that some of them are greater than others, that is, that they require more and greater degrees of power for the production of them; but this distinction vanishes in our consideration of the Supreme Being, to whose omnipotence the greatest effect we can imagine, gives no limitation, but is equal with the smallest, under the compass of his acting. To us, perhaps, it may seem a greater cure to dispossess a demon, than to drive away a fever; but in the hand of the Son of God, while he dwelt among us, they were operations equally easy; and yet a misconception in this matter has certainly led some into an opinion, that the several demoniacs mentioned in the gospels, were only so many persons afflicted with some strange and uncommon diseases.

But that these demons, or evil spirits, which our Saviour, his apostles, and the primitive Christians, expelled out of the bodies of men, could not be diseases, is plain both from the scriptures, and ecclesiastical writers, who make a constant and manifest distinction between the curing diseases and casting out of devils; for, when the evangelist tells us, that⁶ 'they brought unto Christ all sick people, that were taken with divers diseases, and those which were possessed with devils, and those that were lunatic, and had the palsy, and he healed them;' when⁷ 'he gave to the apostles power against evil spirits, to cast them out, and to heal all manner of sicknesses and diseases;' and accordingly,⁸ 'they healed many that were sick with divers diseases, and cast out many devils;' when Irenaeus⁹ informs us that the Christians, in his days, 'did truly cast out devils, and heal the sick by imposition of hands;' and¹⁰ Origen, that 'they cast out devils, and healed many diseases;' can any one of tolerable understanding think, that the diseases healed and the devils cast out, were one and the same thing?

That there were evil spirits of this kind, the holy scriptures have taken such abundant care to acquaint us with their origin and fall, their names and numbers, their government and orders, their malicious designs, and employments, &c., that no one can doubt of their existence, who believes these holy oracles to be true. That both among the Jews and Gentiles, before our Saviour's advent, men were possessed with these evil spirits, is evident from the testimony of¹¹ Josephus, who tells us of a very powerful form of exorcism, which descended from Solomon, who learned it of God; and from the testimony of¹² Plutarch, who acquaints us, that the exorcists of most nations advised those that were possessed, to repeat the Ephesian letters. And, that these evil spirits, in our Saviour's time, were distinct substances, and not the diseases of mankind, is evident from the circumstances of their ejection, from their expostulating with him, 'what have we to do with thee? Art thou come to destroy us? Art thou come to torment us before the time?' And from his commanding them sometimes to be silent, and sometimes to come out of the man, and enter into him no more, &c.

The truth is, these apostate spirits had gotten so far possession of the world, that they began to rival God in his worship; and therefore one end of his Son's incarnation is said to be this,¹³ 'that he might destroy the works of the devil,' and¹⁴ 'overcome the strong one, and divide his spoils.' And this, by the way, may suggest a reason, why at or about the time of our Saviour's advent, and perhaps more especially in the places which he frequented, God might permit the devil to exert himself in an unusual manner, in order to be the more signally triumphed over by the Saviour of the world, and those that were delegated by him to convert mankind to his religion. Nay, had I leisure to proceed to ecclesiastical writers, I might easily show how victorious the name of Christ was over these principalities and powers of darkness, even after his departure out of this world; for 'that our Lord was sent for the destruction of these evil spirits, you may now learn,' says Justin Martyr,¹⁵ 'from what is done before your eyes; for many Christians, throughout all the world, and in every city of your empire, have healed many that were possessed of the devil, and still do they eject them, by the invocation of the name of Jesus, whom none of your enchanters, conjurers, or sorcerers, were able to expel:' 'and give me a man,' says Tertullian,¹⁶ in that noble challenge of his to the heathen powers, 'give me a man here before your tribunals, that is visibly possessed by the devil; and if, when he is commanded by any Christian to declare what he is, he don't immediately confess himself to be a devil, not daring to lie to a Christian, then let the blood of that Christian be shed before you, in that very place." ^a But I forbear, and so proceed to the next objection, which relates to our Saviour's behaviour at the marriage feast.

^a Lardner, and some other writers, have supposed, that the demoniacs, or persons who were possessed by evil spirits, were only lunatics or diseased persons. They argue against the existence of real possessions on various grounds, more especially, of their being inconsistent with the wisdom and goodness of the divine government. All the persons, they say, spoken of in the New Testament as possessed with devils, were either mad or epileptic, and precisely in the same condition with the madmen and epileptics of modern times. Some of the Jews, offended with Christ's discourses, said, he hath a devil, and is mad; why hear ye him? The expressions, 'he hath a devil, and is mad,' were used, as they suppose, on this occasion, as synonymous. Those who thought more favourably of Christ, replied to the calumny of his enemies, 'These are not the words of him that hath a devil;' meaning, that they did not discover in his discourse the incoherence of a madman, or of one disordered in his understanding. Every thing, they allege, related in the New Testament concerning demoniacs, shows that they were persons affected with such natural diseases as are not uncommon among mankind in the present age. When the symptoms of the disorders which were cured by our Lord and his apostles, as cases of demoniacal possession, correspond so exactly with those of diseases well known as natural at the present time, why should we impute them to a supernatural cause? Is it not more consistent with common sense and sound philosophy, to suppose that our Saviour and his apostles adopted the vulgar phraseology in speaking of those unfortunate persons, who, without any foundation, were imagined to be possessed with demons? Now, I agree with Bishop Gleig in regarding all these objections to the literal interpretation of this part of scripture, as proceeding either from a desire to represent Christianity as nothing more than a republication of natural religion, or from a groundless apprehension of giving countenance to the lying wonders of the Church of Rome. That Christianity is something very different from any system of religion which can be called natural, it has been a main design of this work to establish. The triumphs of our Lord over the powers of darkness were an essential part of the great scheme of redemption, 'for the Son of God was manifested that he might destroy the works of the devil.' Though some of the Jewish prophets had performed many and great miracles, and even restored the dead to life, it was yet reserved for the Son of God—the Saviour of the world—to compel the spiritual powers that were opposed to his kingdom to proclaim their own ruin:—'What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God; art thou come hither to torment us before the time?' "When I find," says Dr Campbell, (Preliminary Dissertations to the Gospels, Diss. vi.) "mention made of the number of demons in particular possessors, their actions so expressly distinguished from those of the man possessed, conversations held by the former in regard to the disposal of them after their expulsion, and accounts given how they were actually disposed of; when I find desires and passions ascribed peculiarly to them, and similitudes taken from the conduct which they usually observe; it is impossible for me to deny their existence, without admitting that the sacred historians were either deceived themselves in regard to them, or intended to deceive their readers. The language in which the demoniacs are mentioned, and the actions and sentiments ascribed to them in the New Testament, show that our Saviour and his apostles did not consider the idea of demoniacal possession merely as a vulgar error concerning the origin of a disease or diseases produced by natural causes. If any person, in compliance with popular opinions, should talk seriously of the existence, dispositions, declarations, and actions, of a race of beings whom he knew to be entirely fabulous, we certainly could not praise him for his integrity. Our Lord and his apostles talked and acted as if they believed that evil spirits had actually entered into those who were brought to them as possessed with devils, and as if those spirits had been actually expelled by their authority from the unhappy persons possessed. They also demanded that their authority and declarations should be believed, in consequence of their performing such mighty works, and thus

Our blessed Saviour indeed was a person of so grave and serious a deportment, that, whatever instances we find of his pity and compassion to mankind, of his grieving and being troubled, and even weeping upon some triumphing over the powers of hell." The reality of demoniacal possession rests on the same evidence as the gospel system in general. There is nothing unreasonable in this doctrine. We often fancy ourselves able to comprehend things to which our understanding is wholly inadequate; we frequently persuade ourselves that the whole extent of the works of the Deity must be well known to us, and that his designs must always be such as we can understand. We are then ready, whenever any difficulty arises in considering the conduct of providence, to model things according to our own ideas, to deny that the Deity can be the author of things for which we are not able to account, and to assert that he must act on every occasion in a manner consistent with our narrow views. This is the pride of reason, which seems to have suggested the strongest objections against the reality of demoniacal possessions. But the Supreme Being may surely employ whatever agents he may think proper, in the execution of his purposes. All that divine revelation makes known, all that human reason can conjecture, concerning the existence of various orders of spiritual beings, good or bad, is perfectly consistent with, and favourable to, the doctrine of demoniacal possession. It is mentioned in the New Testament in such language, and such narratives are related concerning it, that the gospel can be regarded only as parts of an imposture, if this doctrine be only a vulgar error. In confirmation of these views, it may further be remarked, that the demons mentioned in the New Testament as possessing persons were conceived to be malignant spirits. They are exhibited as the causes of the most direful calamities to the unhappy persons whom they possess—dumbness, deafness, madness, palsy, epilepsy, and the like. The descriptive titles given them, always denote some ill quality or other. Most frequently they are called unclean spirits, sometimes malign spirits. They are represented as conscious that they are doomed to misery and torments, though their punishments be for a while suspended. It is evident that the devil and his angels, according to all that we can learn of them in the sacred books, are real beings, that the demons of the New Testament are malignant spirits, and that they act upon the same principles, and even under the authority of Satan himself, who is otherwise called Beelzebub, and the prince of the devils. Nay, in these very cases of possession, the chief of the apostate angels is clearly set forth as acting either in his own person or by means of his infernal agents. And it is on this supposition alone that we can explain the language of Christ in that remarkable declaration which he makes to the Pharisees and rulers of the Jews, and which we find recorded in the twelfth chapter of the gospel by Matthew: 'the Pharisees heard it, and they said, this fellow doth not cast out devils but by Beelzebub, the prince of the devils. And Jesus knew their thoughts, and said unto them, every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation, and every city or house divided against itself, shall not stand: and if Satan cast out Satan, he is divided against himself, how shall then his kingdom stand?' It should also be observed, that the inspired writers uniformly make a distinction between diseases occurring in the ordinary course of nature, and diseases occasioned by the agency of evil spirits. "There is every where," says Bishop Porteus, "a plain distinction made between common diseases and demoniacal possessions, which shows that they are totally different things. In the fourth chapter of the gospel by Matthew, where the very first mention is made of these possessions, it is said that our Lord's 'fame went throughout all Syria, and that they brought unto him all sick people, that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with devils, and he healed them.' Here, those that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those possessed with devils, are mentioned as distinct and separate persons: a plain proof that the demoniacal possessions were not natural diseases; and the very same distinction is made in several other passages of holy writ. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the demoniacs were persons really possessed with evil spirits; and although it may seem strange to us, yet we find from Josephus and other historians, that it was in those times no uncommon case."—Porteus's Lectures on St. Mat., vol. i. p. 264: Farmer's Essay on the Demoniacs of the New Testament; *Jortin's Remarks on Eccles. occasions, we can meet with none of his laughing, nor any token of a mirth or joy extraordinary, in the whole history of his life : but we must not from hence infer, that he was of a stiff and precise temper, or in any degree an enemy to such forms of civility, or social usages, as were then in practice. If therefore we may be allowed to suppose, what seems indeed highly probable, that this marriage at Cana was between persons of his own kindred and acquaintance, and that by the very rules of celebrating such festivals among the Jews, all excess and intemperance was excluded, then will it follow, that it could be no disparagement to our Saviour's character to accept of the invitation that was made him, and to be present at such a meeting.

Among us indeed, especially among the vulgar sort, there are sometimes, on these occasions, liberties taken that are not so justifiable ; but, among the Jews, there was always the greatest decency and sobriety imaginable observed in the celebration of their marriages. ¹ To this purpose a governor of the feast, as some say of the sacerdotal race, was always chosen, whose office it was to have the superintendency of the dishes and wine, and to oblige the guests to observe all the decorums that religion required ; and not only so, but other persons, at this time, were likewise appointed to break glass vessels, as a common signal, to give the company notice, that they had already drank enough, and were not permitted to run to excess. Under this regulation, it is scarcely imaginable that the guests, at a Jewish marriage, could be guilty of any intemperance, and least of all at this in Galilee, where our Saviour's presence and observation, the gravity of his behaviour, and the seasonableness of his discourse, might well be presumed to heighten the decorum, and to keep all the company under a proper restraint.

What therefore the governor of the feast says to the bridegroom, ² in relation to the water that was turned into wine, is to be understood only as a general representation of a custom, usual at other festivals, which was, to bring the best wine at first, and towards the conclusion, that which was worse ; which custom, as the governor tells him, was not observed here ; for the difference between this entertainment and others is, that ' thou hast kept the good wine until now.' ³ So that ' when men have well drunk,' is only a circumstance thrown in to illustrate the comparison, or describe the latter end of a feast, and has no manner of reference to the condition of the company then present. But allowing the words ὅταν μεθύσῃσι, to be a description of the condition that the company were then in, yet it will by no means follow, that they had proceeded to any intemperance, because the words are equally capable of an innocent, as well as vicious meaning. ⁴ Μεθύειν indeed, in its primitive signification, means no more than ' drinking after the sacrifice ;' and as there is nothing in the etymology that determines this to be done to excess, or beyond the proper bounds of joy in a festival, so there are several instances in scripture, wherein it was certainly done according to the rules of sobriety and moderation. Thus, to mention one out of many, in the Seventy's version of Genesis, where it is said, that ⁵ ' Joseph's brethren drank, and were merry with him,' the words are ἐμεθύ- ῥησαν μετ' αὐτοῦ, and yet no one can imagine, but that, in their present circumstances, thinking no other than that he was the governor of Egypt, and being apprehensive that he had no good design against them, they were too much upon their guard, and solicitous about their own safety, to give any way to intemperance in his presence : and, if the expression here, and in ⁶ several other passages, may be taken in a virtuous sense, we cannot but conclude, unless we can suppose that St John designed to expose his Master's behaviour upon this occasion, that he intended we should understand him in the most favourable acceptation. ^a

We, indeed, in our translation, say, that the water-pots, wherein the wine was created, ⁷ contained two or three firkins apiece ; but some, who have looked more nicely into μετρητής, or measure, here spoken of, ⁸ have brought it so low, as to make the whole six pots hold no more than about fourteen or fifteen gallons of our English measure. But not to descend so low, we will suppose, at present, that the quantity of wine made by our Saviour at this feast, was as large as our translation represents it ; yet whoever considers the nature of Jewish marriages, how they were celebrated with feasting and rejoicings, not only on the day of solemnity, as it is with us, but for six or seven days after, and that at these feasts not only all their relations, and neighbours, and acquaintance, were invited, but that it was well taken likewise, if any others, though not invited, would come to partake of the entertainment, and bear a share in the joy : whoever considers this, I say, cannot but imagine, that a very large quantity of wine must needs be requisite at such a time, since it was to be a supply, not for that day only, but for all the succeeding days, until the time of the feasting was expired.

Nay, even supposing farther, that our Lord, upon this occasion, did not confine himself to a precise quantity, proportionate to the company, or period of the festival, and, what is more, ⁹ that some of the company might abuse his liberality by their intemperance, which is a concession not to be gathered from the text, yet he cannot therefore be charged with the administering to their excess, by making such an ample provision, any more than we can charge the providence of God with being instrumental to all the gluttony and drunkenness which is committed in the world, merely because he affords that meat and drink, which men of inordinate appetites abuse to excess. The truth is, as it is a high commendation of providence, that it crowns us with plenty, whatever use we make of it, and bestows upon us all things richly to enjoy; so was it not unbecoming a person, invested with a divine commission, to give, on this occasion, an eminent instance of his flowing liberality, and, by his generous provision for the family, to leave a grateful memorial of his benevolent regard to two persons that very likely were his relations, and had just entered into the honourable state of matrimony.

^a The probability is, that the expression under consideration relates not at all to excess, nor indeed to drinking at any other feast than that which was kept at a marriage. The Abbi Mariti, speaking of the age of the wines of Cyprus, says,—' It is certain, that at the birth of a son or daughter, the father causes a jar filled with wine to be buried in the earth, having first taken the precaution to seal it hermetically ; and in this manner it is kept till the child's marriage. It is then placed on the table before the bride and bridegroom, and is distributed among their relations, and the other guests invited to the wedding.' If such a custom prevailed formerly, and prevailed among the Jews, it is evident that the wine first drunk at a marriage feast must have been the best, as nothing but wine of a very superior quality could have been preserved from the birth of a child to his or her marriage, even at the early age at which marriages were made in Judea. The probability therefore is, that the governor of the feast meant nothing more than to express his surprise at the bridegroom's having deviated, as he supposed, from the common practice of presenting, the jar of old and superior wine at first.—See Burder's Oriental Customs.

Since therefore our Lord answered, in so free and plentiful a manner, his mother's request at last, there seems to be something in their supposition, who, from the propriety¹ of the Greek expression, think that his mother spake to him, before the wine was out, but when it grew so low that she plainly perceived there would not be enough for the company; and therefore our Saviour's reply to her will very justly bear this sense, Τί ἐμοὶ καὶ σοὶ; 'what is it to you or me?' that is, the care of providing wine upon this occasion does not properly belong to you or me; but admitting it did, 'my hour is not yet come.' It is too soon as yet to set about it; because it is highly fitting that the necessity of that supernatural supply, which I intend them, should be a little more felt, in order to recommend the benefit itself, and to give the manner of attaining it a power of making a deeper impression on their minds.

This seems to be no unnatural construction of the words, and removes all the seeming harshness of our Saviour's answer, 'woman, what have I to do with thee?' We mistake the matter, however, very much, if we think that the word γυνή, which we render woman, was any title of disrespect or indifference, as it seems to be in our translation, since it is frequently used by the best authors, when the highest marks of esteem are intended. The polite Xenophon himself puts it in the mouth of one of his Persian chiefs, when he was addressing himself to a captive lady, and comforting her under her unfortunate circumstances; and certainly a time there was, that our Lord called his mother by this appellation, when he was far from being harsh or undutiful to her, even when he was hanging on the cross, and tenderly recommending both his mother to the care of his beloved apostle, and that apostle to his mother's love and affection,² 'woman, behold thy son.' So little does our Saviour's conduct, in this whole transaction, deserve these horrid and impious censures which of late have been thrown upon it!

Whatever some modern Jews and infidels may allege against the abuse, as they pretend, which the writers of the New Testament have put upon the prophecies of the Old, by applying them to a wrong sense;³ no man need be told, that an attempt of this nature had been as impertinent, the affront to man's reason as insolent, and the event as fruitless, nay as fatal to their cause, had they imposed a false, or even controverted, sense upon the predictions confessedly relating to the Messiah, as it would have been had they urged such predictions as were not acknowledged to belong to him at all. The truth is, if the Jews understood the prophecies relating to the Messiah in one sense, and the apostles, in their address to them, applied them in another, we cannot see how they could ever have made one proselyte, being in the same condition with what St Paul describes, when he tells us, that,⁴ 'he who speaketh in an unknown tongue,' and why not he that speaketh in an unknown meaning, speaketh to the air, and becometh a barbarian to him that heareth, but understandeth him not. So that every Jew converted to the Christian faith is an implicit proof of the apostle's applying the ancient prophecies in a sense that was then current and familiar to them.

That the famous prophecy in Isaiah⁵ is thus applied by St Matthew,⁶ to prove that Christ was born of an immaculate virgin, we took occasion to show. The remaining allegation is, that the name of the person of whom the prophet speaks was to be Immanuel; whereas the name of that son of Mary, of whom St Matthew speaks by God's express command, was Jesus; and therefore the words of the prophet are misapplied by the evangelist.

Now, nothing is more common in scripture than by the calling or naming of a person or thing, not to mean that the person or thing would be commonly distinguished by that name, but only that it should have such properties and qualities in it as that name did denote; or, in other words, that it should really be what the full sense of that name imported. Thus, of the city of Jerusalem it is foretold by the prophet,⁷ that it should be called 'the city of righteousness,' when it really was to be such a city; for in the foregoing words it is promised, 'that God would restore her judges as at the first, and her counsellors as at the beginning.'⁷ And in like manner, though it be declared by this prophet,⁸ that the wonderful child which God promised to the house of David should be called Immanuel; yet if he was but what that name properly imports, God with us, in a most eminent and peculiar manner, it is not to be doubted but that the prophecy received its full completion in the person of our Saviour Christ.

For, besides God's universal presence, there is a presence of favour and distinction, whereby he is said to be, in a more peculiar manner, with those whom he loves and blesses above others. And in this regard the child here spoken of is justly called Immanuel, because, as St Paul speaks,⁹ 'God was in him reconciling the world to himself,' for his sake and sufferings, 'not imputing their trespasses unto them;' so that by him¹⁰ they who were some time afar off are made nigh, have access to the Father, are accepted in the Beloved,¹¹ 'and become, of enemies and strangers, friends and children, insomuch that God vouchsafes to dwell in them and to be one of them. And as God unites us to himself by grace, so did he, in this child, condescend, by an ineffable generation, to unite our substance and nature to himself, "to be perfect God and perfect man,"¹² that so he might be the first-born among many brethren, and redeem the children from death, who are partakers of flesh and blood, by himself taking part of the same.'" Let it not then be any more objected, that the child in the prophecy could not be called Immanuel, whom we confess to have been called Jesus; for he is therefore our Immanuel, because our Jesus; therefore, most eminently, most literally, 'God with us,' because, by so miraculous an union, 'a Saviour of his people from their sins.'

It may seem perhaps surprising to some, that St Matthew should so frequently introduce his citations with a 'This was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet:' but whoever considers the idiom of the Hebrew tongue, cannot but know that the phrase, answering to the expressions, 'that it might be fulfilled,' means no more, than that hereby was verified, or that this event answered to the prediction, or the like. Nay, the Jews were accustomed to say, that a passage of scripture was then fulfilled, when any thing happened that was applicable to it; and therefore it is no wonder, that St Matthew, who himself was a Jew, and very probably wrote his gospel in the Hebrew tongue for the benefit of his countrymen, should naturally fall into their style and manner of expression.*

* Though it should be admitted, that the word πληρωθῆναι in Mat. i. 22, is used in the strictest sense, to express the fulfilment of a prophecy, which pointed to this single event; it cannot be denied that the general import of the verb πληρωσῶ, in the gospel, is more properly expressed by the English verb verify, than by fulfil. Those things are said πληρωθῆναι, which are no predictions of the future, but mere affirmations concerning the present, or the past. Thus, chap. ii. 15, a declaration from the prophet Hosea, (xi. 1.) which God made in relation to the people of Israel, whom he had long before recalled from Egypt, is applied by the historian allusively to Jesus Christ, where all that is meant is, that, with equal truth, or rather with much greater energy of signification, God might now say, 'I have recalled my Son out of Egypt.' Indeed the import of the Greek phrase, as commonly used by the sacred writers, is no more, as Le Clerc has justly observed, than that such words of any of the prophets may be applied with truth to such an event. For it is even used, where that which is said to be fulfilled is not a prophecy, but a command; and where the event spoken of is not the obedience of the command (though the term is sometimes used in this sense also,) but an event similar to the thing required; and which, if I may so express myself, tallies with the words. Thus, in the directions given about the manner of preparing the paschal lamb, it is said, (Exod. xii. 46.) 'none of his bones shall be broken.' This saying the evangelist John (xix. 36.) finds verified in what happened to our Lord, when the legs of the criminals who were crucified with him, were broken, and his were spared. 'But were not the recall of Israel from Egypt, and the ceremonies of the passover, typical of what happened to our Lord? I admit they were. But it is not the correspondence of the antitype to the type, that we call properly fulfilling: this English word, if I mistake not, is, in strictness, applied only, either to an event to which a prophecy directly points, or to the performance of a promise. Whereas the Greek word is sometimes employed in scripture to denote little more than a coincidence in sound. In this sense I think it is used, chap. ii. 23. We have an instance of its being employed by the Seventy, to denote verifying or confirming the testimony of one, by the testimony of another, 1 Kings i. 14. The word fulfilling, in our language, has a much more limited signification; and to employ it for all those purposes, is to give a handle to cavillers, where the original gives none. It makes the sacred penman appear to call those things predictions, which plainly were not, and which they never meant to denominate predictions. The most apposite word that I could find in English is verify; for, though it will not answer in every case, it answers in more cases than any other of our verbs. Thus, a prophecy is verified (for the word is strictly applicable here also), when it is accomplished; a promise, when it is performed; a testimony, when it is confirmed by additional testimony, or other satisfactory evidence; a maxim or proverb, when it is exemplified; a declaration of any kind may be said to be verified by any incident to which the words can be applied. I acknowledge that this word does not, in every case, correspond to πληρωσῶ. A law is fulfilled, not verified; and if the import of the passage be to denote that additional strength is given to it, it is better to say confirmed, or ratified. In some places it means to fill-up, in others to perfect, in others to make known. — Campbell on the Gospels, vol. ii. — Ed.

Now, whoever considers the state of the Jews in Egypt, their bondage, and danger of utter extinction, by reason of the decree which passed for the destruction of all their male children, (had not the providence of God prevented the execution of it) will soon perceive the cause, why Egypt is made in scripture the common figure and emblem of extreme danger, and imminent death; and why a deliverance out of Egypt should be applied to every great act of preservation, where there seemed to be no visible means of escape; inasmuch, that whenever any instance of such a watchful and protecting providence happened, it was an usual and proverbial speech among the Jews (who were wont then, as they are still, to apply sentences out of holy writ to the common occurrences of life) to say, in scripture phrase, 'Out of Egypt have I called my Son,' or 'He hath called him out of Egypt,' that is, he hath rescued him from the jaws of death, or from the like danger that the Israelites were in when he brought them out of Egypt with a mighty hand and a stretched-out arm. Since Joseph then was ordered to flee to Egypt, and tarry there until Herod was dead, for this reason, because Herod sought the young child's life; this distinguishing preservation of Jesus, by means of his retreat, till the danger was over, will justify the evangelist (even though it had been any other country, as well as Egypt, whereunto he retired) in applying to him the proverbial saying upon that occasion, 'Out of Egypt (that is, out of manifest danger) have I called my son.'

The deportation of the ten tribes from their native country into a foreign land, there to die or live in slavery, was so grievous a calamity, that the prophet Jeremiah² by way of prosopopœia, introduces Rachel, the favourite wife of Jacob, that great progenitor of the Israelites, making bitter lamentation for their loss, and refusing all consolation, because there were no hopes of their recovery. And the murder of so many innocent babes at Bethlehem, by the bloody decree of Herod, was an event so dolorous to their tender parents, that the evangelist, when he came to relate it, thought he might justly, by way of accommodation, apply the words of the prophet, and, in the name of all the miserable mothers that had lost their children, make Rachel upon this occasion, and as a farther accomplishment of the prophecy, return to her weeping again. The rather because Rachel, having been long dead before the captivity, may, with equal propriety, by the evangelist, as she is by the prophet, be introduced weeping; the rather, because she was³ so fond a lover of children, that she is fitly enough brought in here in the room of the tender mothers who wept for the loss of theirs; and the rather, because the slaughter of the Bethlehemites might be called that of her children, because among them⁴ was the place of her sepulchre, after that she had lost her life in the bitter pangs of childbirth.

There is no prophet, we own, wherein it is expressly said, that the Messiah should be called a Nazarene;⁵ but the observation of St Jerome, in his comment upon this place, is not amiss, namely, that when St Matthew⁶ mentions the word prophets in the plural number, whereas, in other places, he had always cited some particular prophet, he thereby shows that he did not take the words from the prophets, but only the sense. Since then the title of Nazarene both Jews and other enemies of Christianity have always, by way of contempt, given to our blessed Saviour, because he was supposed to come out of that very city, from whence it was thought impossible, that ¹ any good thing should come; and since most of the prophets speak of Christ, as a person that was to be reputed vile and abject, ² a stranger to his brethren, and even an alien to his mother's sons, ³ despised and rejected of men, despised and esteemed not, here is the plain sense of the words, 'he shall be a Nazarene,' ⁴ and the angel, by God's appointment, no doubt, sent him to this contemptible place, that he might thence have a name of infamy and contempt put upon him, according to the frequent intimation by the prophets.

⁵ The word we render wise men, in its original, signifies magicians; which, however now it bespeaks not so good a character, was, nevertheless, heretofore a name of very innocent and honourable signification. The studious and inquisitive, whose business and profession led them to search into nature, its most abstruse causes and effects, and more particularly into the motions and dispositions of heavenly bodies, were distinguished by this title: and in what profound veneration and respect they were held, appears from the most important matters, both sacred and civil, being committed to their administration. They were the counsellors, the judges, the priests, the princes, in a word, the oracles of the eastern countries. But, as the best arts are sometimes perverted to ill purposes; so it happened to these, that, falling into the hands of bad men, who met with people ignorant and credulous, and not only easy, but even glad, to be deluded, they degenerated into the cheats of judiciary astrology; and these abuses grew so general, as, at last, to fix an ill sense upon the word, and a scandal on the science itself.

It were a wrong and great indignity to the persons now before us, not to believe them of the nobler and better sort; but we can hardly be persuaded, though some would endeavour to do it, that they were persons of royal dignity, ⁶ because we cannot reasonably suppose that the evangelist would have omitted a circumstance of so great moment, both for their honour and our Lord's. We can hardly think but that some account would have been given of their royal train and equipage, and that all Jerusalem would have been moved as much to see their entry, as they were to hear their questions: nor can we imagine that it would have been decent in Herod to have received them with no more respect; to have dismissed them to Bethlehem without attendants; much less to have laid his commands upon them to return back, and bring him an account of the child, as soon as they had found him, had they been persons of equal rank and dignity with himself. Upon these considerations we may justly deny them the title of kings, though we cannot but allow them to be persons of great wisdom, learning, and integrity; of which ours, and some other translations of the Bible, have been so sensible, as very prudently to decline the odious name of magicians, and to call them 'the wise men of the east;' but what part of the east it was that they came from, few interpreters have agreed.

⁷ Some have imagined that these travellers came out of Persia; others from Chaldea, others from Arabia, and others again from Mesopotamia. All these countries lay eastward from Jerusalem and the Holy Land; and in each of these, some antecedent notions of the Messiah may be accounted for. In Chaldea and Persia, by the captivity of the Jews, and the books of Daniel; in Arabia, by the nearness of their neighbourhood, and frequent commerce; and in Mesopotamia, besides these common helps, they had the prophecy of their countryman Balaam, concerning a star ⁸ that should come out of Jacob to direct them. ⁹ But as we know of no record, wherein this prophecy was preserved, but the book of Moses, which the people of Mesopotamia neither read nor believed, so it seems evident, that Balaam's words do not refer to a star that should arise at any prince's birth, but to a certain king, who should be as glorious and splendid in his dominions, as the stars are in the firmament. Upon the whole, therefore, it seems most likely that these wise men came out of Arabia, ¹⁰ which, according to Tacitus, was the bound of Judea eastward, not only because the gifts which they presented were the natural products of that country, which was famous likewise for its magi, insomuch that Pythagoras, as Porphyry informs us, went into Arabia to acquire wisdom; but because its neighbourhood to Judea might give these wise men the advantage of discerning the star better than any more distant nation had.

For, that this star was no celestial one, and such as might be seen at a vast distance, its motion, contrary to the ordinary course of stars, its performing the part of a guide to the travellers, and that by day, very probably, as well as night, its accommodating itself to their necessities, and disappearing and returning, as they could best, or least, be without it; and, what is a circumstance as remarkable as any, its pointing out, and standing over the very place where the child was, which the height and distance of common stars makes it impossible for them to do, are a sufficient demonstration. It seems not improbable, therefore, that what the evangelist calls a star, was only that glorious light ¹¹ that shone upon the Bethlehem shepherds, when the angel came to impart unto them the tidings of our Saviour's birth; for that this light was exceeding great, is clear from that expression, which styles it the ¹² 'glory of the Lord,' and that it was a light from heaven hanging over their heads, the words in the ¹³ Greek, as well as ¹⁴ Latin version, sufficiently inform us.

Now, every one knows, that such a light, at a great distance, appears like a star; or at least, after it had thus shone about the shepherds, it might be lifted up on high, and then formed into the likeness of a star, where standing vertically over Judea for some time, it might direct the Arabian astrologers, whom so strange a phenomenon could hardly escape, to the capital city, as the likeliest place to gain intelligence of the new-born king, whose 'star they had seen in the east,' that is, from the place of their abode, which was in the east: for, should we suppose that this light was placed in any part of the eastern hemisphere, it would have denoted something extraordinary among the Indians, or eastern nations, rather than among the people of the Jews.

¹ But how came these eastern sages to know that this star, or luminous appearance in the heavens, place it where we will, denoted the birth of a king? Now, for the resolution of this question, it must be observed, what ² some heathen historians tell us, namely, 'that through the whole east it was expected, that about this time a king was to arise out of Judea, who should rule over all the world.' Nor could it well be otherwise, since, from the time of the Babylonish captivity, we find the Jews dispersed ³ through all the provinces of the Persian monarchy, and that ⁴ in great numbers, and ⁵ many people of the land becoming Jews; and, after their return home, increasing so mightily, that they were dispersed through Africa, Asia, and many cities and islands of Europe, and, as Josephus ⁶ tells us, wherever they dwelt, making many proselytes to their religion. ^a ⁷ Now these wise men, living so near to Judea, the seat of this prophecy, and conversing with Jews, that is, with those who every where expected the completion of it at that time, as soon as they came to see this extraordinary star, or body of light, hovering over Judea, they might rationally conjecture that it signified the completion of that celebrated prophecy concerning the king of Jewry, over the centre of which land, they, being then in the east, might see this meteor hang.

Not long after the departure of these eastern sages from Bethlehem, we find a prodigious multitude of innocent babes inhumanly put to death, upon the account of him whom these wise men came to adore. But, to vindicate the justice and goodness of providence in this proceeding, we need not appeal to God's universal dominion over all his creatures, and the right he has to take away, in what manner he pleases, the being which he gives us; we need only consider the present life, not as our last and final state, but as one whose principal

^a This visit which the magi, under the divine direction, made to the Son of God at his entrance into the world, answered several valuable purposes. 1. The principal thing was to show succeeding generations what expectations of him were entertained at this very time among the Gentiles, and thereby to confirm in latest ages, the existence of those prophecies which had raised such a general hope in the breasts of mankind. 2. It is far from being absurd to suppose, that these philosophers, by the tidings which they carried home concerning the king of the Jews, might prepare their countrymen for becoming his subjects in due time, For if their report was remembered by the succeeding generation, it must have contributed not a little to their cheerful reception of the gospel when it was preached to them. 3. The coming of the magi occasioned the answer of the sabbatim, wherein it was declared to be the unanimous opinion of the most learned Jewish doctors then living, that, by the designation of heaven, Bethlehem was to be the place of their Messiah's nativity. 4. The reasonable beneficence of those learned strangers, put Joseph in a condition to subsist his family in Egypt, whither he was soon to be sent from the wrath of the king.—Macknight's Harmony, vol. i.—Ed.

tendency is to another; and then it will appear, that there is no certain measure to be taken of the divine justice or goodness, towards us, without taking in the distributions of that other life, which, indeed, is the main end of our living at all. What Solomon, therefore, in his wisdom, says of the righteous in general, is much more verified in the case of these harmless babes: ⁸ 'In the sight of the unwise, they seemed to die, and their departure is taken for misery; but they are in peace: for, though they were punished in the sight of men, yet is their hope full of immortality.' ⁹ For a frail, a short, a troublesome, a dangerous life, God gives them the recompence of an immortal, a securely happy, a completely glorious one; which not only vindicates, but magnifies his goodness and liberality to them. He considers their infancy, and the noble fruit which might have sprung from these tender plants, had they been allowed to grow to full maturity, and accordingly rewards them: for, though they wanted the will of martyrdom, which riper years may have, yet it must be allowed, that they were clear of that voluntary and actual sin which those riper years would have contracted: and therefore, as in the most literal sense, ¹⁰ they were not defiled with sensual pleasures, but left the world in virgin-innocence, as they were truly redeemed from among men, whose early translation to a state of bliss, prevented the hazards and temptations of a wicked world; and, as they were, strictly speaking, the first fruits unto God and the Lamb, who began to shed their blood in the cause of a new born Saviour, so God hath been pleased to vouchsafe them a peculiar honour, ¹¹ to sing, as it were, a new song before the throne, and to follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, because in their mouth was found no guile; for they were without fault before the throne of God.'

We have but one objection more to answer, and that is a seeming inconsistency in our Saviour, in discovering to the Samaritan woman his divine character, which he had so often desired his disciples to conceal. Our Saviour, it is true, was so far from making any unnecessary declarations of himself, that, both upon ¹² St Peter's confessing him to be the Christ, and ¹³ after his transfiguration, wherein he was declared to be the Son of God, we find him charging his disciples to say nothing of this, until his resurrection; ¹⁴ because their testimony, in these points, might not only be like a matter concerted between him and them, but because indeed they were not qualified to be his witnesses in these things, until they had received power from on high, by the coming down of the Holy Ghost. It is to be observed, however, that, when our Lord is himself fairly called upon, and especially by persons invested with authority, he never once conceals his divine nature and commission.

When ¹⁵ the Jews came round in Solomon's porch, and said unto him, 'How long dost thou make us doubt? I told thee the Christ, tell us plainly;' his answer is express; 'I told you, and ye believed not: the works that I do in my Father's name, they bear witness of me; for I and my Father are one.' When he stood before the judgment-seat, and the high priest demanded of him, ¹⁶ 'I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us, whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God? his answer is, 'thou hast said;' or, as St Mark¹ expresses it, 'I am; and ye shall see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven.' Nay, there are some instances, wherein, of his own accord, and without any provocation of this kind, he freely discovers who he was; for, having cured the man that was born blind, and afterwards meeting him accidentally,² 'Dost thou believe on the Son of God?' says he. Whereupon the man asking, 'Who is the Son of God, that I may believe on him?' Our Saviour replies, 'Thou hast both seen him, and it is he who talketh with thee:' and therefore we need less wonder that, when this Samaritan woman had first of all confessed him to be a prophet, and, as her words seem to imply,³ was a little dubious whether he was not the Messiah, our Saviour should prevent her inquiry, and tell her voluntarily that he was. Especially considering, that⁴ such a declaration might be a means to prepare her, and the rest of the Samaritans, whenever his apostles should come and preach the gospel unto them, to receive their testimony, as we find, by the history of the apostolic acts, that they did it with great gladness.

Thus have we endeavoured to satisfy all the exceptions of any weight, that the lovers of infidelity have hitherto made to this part of the evangelical history; and, if Christianity stood in need either of the support or testimony of heathen authors, we might say, that the incarnation of Christ the Son of God, is no more than⁵ what the Greeks, as Julian avers, affirm both of Æsculapius and Pythagoras, namely, that they were both the sons of Jupiter, though they appeared in human nature, which doctrine, in the evangelist St John, Amelius,^a the master of Porphyry, allows to be true: That the birth of our blessed Jesus of a virgin immaculate is no more than⁶ what the ancient Jewish doctors expected in their Messiah; and therefore Simon Magus, who greatly affected that character, pretended that his mother Rachel bore him without the loss of her virginity: That the new star, or body of light, which, upon our Saviour's birth, conducted the wise men to him,^{7b} is acknowledged by Julian, though he would gladly ascribe it to natural causes, is set off with great eloquence by Chalcidius, in his comment upon Plato's Timæus, and perhaps might be that very phenomenon,^c

^b In his relation of some portentous significations of stars, he adds: "There is another tale told of a more sacred and holy nature; it says that, at the appearance of a certain unusual star, diseases, and pestilences were not, as is commonly the case, foretold, but the descent of a holy God, for the benefit of the human race, and its affairs; the star is said to have been seen by Chaldeans, who worshipped the young God by the offering of goats."—Hammond's Annotations on Mat. ii. 2.

which Pliny⁸ describes under the name of a comet: that our Lord's forerunner, John the Baptist, was such a person as the gospel represents him, namely, an exhorter of the Jews, to the love and practice of virtue, and to regeneration by baptism and newness of life, we have an ample testimony in Josephus: that our Lord himself was certainly a prophet, Phlegon,^{9d} who was the emperor Adrian's freedman, acknowledges, and in his history has related several events which he foretold; that he was¹⁰ a great worker of miracles, the authors of the Talmud own; nor can Celsus and Julian, his bitterest enemies, deny it, only they would gladly impute them to a wrong cause, his great skill in magical incantations: that human bodies were frequently possessed with devils, who afflicted them with grievous and tormenting diseases, is the joint concession both of¹¹ Jamblicus and Minutius Felix; ^e and that our blessed Lord had the power of curing these,¹² and of destroying the dominion of evil spirits, wherever he came, is the great complaint of Porphyry, who makes it no wonder that their cities should be wasted with plagues, since Æsculapius, and the rest of the gods, ever since the admission of the Christian religion, were either become useless or fled. So prevalent is the force of truth, that it seldom fails to draw confessions from those who least of all intend them.

CHAP. IV.—An account of the marriage ceremonies of the east.

SUPPLEMENTAL BY THE EDITOR.

MARRIAGE is evidently meant by scripture and reason, to be the union of one man with one woman. When God said, 'It is not good that the man should be alone; he promised him the help only of a single mate: 'I will make him an help meet for him.'¹³ This gracious promise he soon performed in the formation of one woman who should be joined in wedlock. This design Adam recognized and acknowledged in express terms; and his declaration was certainly meant as a rule for his descendants in every succeeding age. 'Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh.' These quotations, which are all couched in terms of the singular number, are inconsistent with the doctrine of polygamy. The original appointment was confirmed by our Lord in these words: ¹ 'Have ye not read, that he which made you at the beginning, made them male and female; and said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife; and they twain shall be one flesh? Wherefore they are no more twain but one flesh.' The apostle is not less decisive in his direction to the churches: ² 'nevertheless, to avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife; and let every woman have her own husband.' But though the law is so decisive, it cannot be doubted that polygamy was introduced soon after the creation; Lamech, one of the descendants of Cain, and only the sixth person from Adam, married two wives; he was probably the first who ventured, in this manner, to transgress the law of his Maker. This unwarrantable practice, derived from the antediluvian world, seems to have become very common after the flood; for it is mentioned as nothing remarkable that Sarah, when she despaired of having children, took her handmaid Hagar, and gave her to Abraham her husband, by whom she had a son. Both Esau and Jacob had a number of wives; and that is undoubtedly one of the practices which Moses suffered to remain among his people, because of the hardness of their hearts, prohibiting only the high priest to have more than one wife.

^d He composed a history, digested by Olympiads, as far as the year of Christ 140. In his history he takes notice, that, in Olympiad, which determines about the middle of the 33d year of the common era, there happened the greatest eclipse of the sun that ever had been seen, insomuch, that the stars were visible at noonday, and that afterwards there was a great earthquake in Bithynia. Several critics believe that this was the darkness which happened at the death of Jesus Christ, which is a matter we shall have occasion to inquire into, when we come to that part of his history.

^e The words of Minutius are worth observing,—"Evil spirits harass life, disturb our sleep, and even like thin air creep into our bodies; they create distempers, terrify the mind, rack the limbs, and compel men to worship them."

Every transgression of the divine law is attended by its corresponding punishment. Polygamy has proved in all ages, and in all countries where it has been suffered, a teeming source of evil. The jealousy and bitter contentions in the family of Abraham, and of his grandson Jacob, which proceeded from that cause, are well known, and still more deplorable were the dissensions that convulsed the house, and shook the throne of David. Such mischiefs are the natural and necessary effects of the practice; for polygamy divides the affections of the husband, and, by consequence, generates incurable jealousies and contentions among the unhappy victims of his licentious desires. To prevent his abode from becoming the scene of unceasing confusion and uproar, he is compelled to govern it, as the oriental polygamist still does, with despotic authority, which at once extinguishes all the rational and most endearing comforts of the conjugal state. The husband is a stern and unfeeling despot; his harem, a group of trembling slaves. The children espouse with ardour, unknown to those who are placed in other circumstances, the cause of their own mother, and look upon the children of other wives as strangers and enemies. They regard their common father with indifference or terror; while they cling to their own mother with the fondest affections, as the only parent in whom they feel any interest, or from whom they expect any suitable return of attention and kindness. This state of feeling and attachment is attested by every writer on the manners of the east: and accounts for a way of speaking so common in the scriptures, ³ 'It is my brother; the son of my mother,' 'they were my brethren,' said Gideon, 'the sons of my mother; as the Lord liveth, if ye had saved them alive, I would not slay you.' It greatly aggravated the affliction of David, that he had become an alien to his mother's children; ⁴ the enmity of his brethren, the relations of his father's other wives, or his more distant relatives, gave him less concern; 'I am become a stranger to my brethren, and an alien to my mother's children.' The same allusion occurs in the complaint of the spouse: 'Look not upon me because I am black, because the sun hath looked upon me: my mother's children were angry with me: they made me the keeper of the vineyards.'⁵ The children of one wife scarcely looked upon the children of the other wives as their brothers and sisters at all; and they scarcely felt more regard for their father. An oriental, in consequence of this unnatural practice, takes little notice of an insult offered to his father, but expresses the utmost indignation when a word is spoken to the disadvantage of his mother. To defame or to curse her, is the last insult which his enemy can offer; and one which he seldom or never forgives. 'Strike,' cried an incensed African to his antagonist, 'but do not curse my mother.'⁶

Marriage contracts seem to have been made in the primitive ages with little ceremony. The suitor himself, or his father, sent a messenger to the father of the woman, to ask her in marriage. Abraham sent the principal servant of his household, with a considerable retinue and costly presents, to the city of Nahor, to take a wife unto his son Isaac, from among his relations. The father of the suitor sometimes solicited the person whom he had chosen for his wife; for Hamor, the father of Shechem, went out unto Jacob, to treat with him about the marriage of Dinah to his son, the heir of his house, and the hope of his family. If the woman resides under her father's roof, the parents were consulted, and their consent obtained; and the damsel was asked if she agreed to the proposal. The servant of Abraham stated the design of his journey to Bethuel and Laban, the father and brother of Rebekah, and solicited their consent; and when they had agreed to his request, they said, 'We will call the damsel and inquire at her mouth. And they called Rebekah, and said unto her, Wilt thou go with this man? And she said, I will go.'

The kings and nobles of Israel were not more ceremonious on these occasions. When David heard that Nabal was dead, he sent messengers to Abigail to solicit her hand in marriage. ⁷ 'And they spake unto her, saying, David sent us unto thee, to take thee to him to wife. And she arose and bowed herself on her face to the earth, and said, Behold, let thine handmaid be a servant to wash the feet of the servants of my Lord.' After the death of Urijah, the same prince sent and fetched Bathsheba to his house, and she became his wife. This entirely corresponds with the manner in which the oriental princes generally form their matrimonial alliances. The king of Abyssinia 'sends an officer to the house where the lady lives, who announces to her, that it is the king's pleasure she should remove instantly to the palace. She then dresses herself in the best manner, and immediately obeys. Thenceforward he assigns her an apartment in the palace, and gives her an house elsewhere, in any part she chooses. The nearest resemblance to marriage is when he makes her iteghe or queen; for whether in the court or in the camp, he orders one of the judges to pronounce in his presence, that he, the king, has chosen his handmaid, naming her, for his queen; upon which the crown is put upon her head, but she is not anointed.¹

In the primitive ages, women received no portions from their relations, when they were married; but were purchased by their husbands, whose presents to the woman's relations were called her dowry. Thus, we find Shechem bargaining with Jacob and his sons for Dinah.² 'Let me find grace in your eyes, and what ye shall say unto me, I will give: ask me never so much dowry and gift, and I will give according as ye shall say unto me; but give me the damsel to wife.' The practice still continues in the country of Shechem; for when a young Arab wishes to marry he must purchase his wife; and for this reason, fathers, among the Arabs, are never more happy than when they have many daughters. They are reckoned the principal riches of a house. An Arabian suitor will offer fifty sheep, six camels, or a dozen of cows; if he be not rich enough to make such offers, he proposes to give a mare or a colt; considering in the offer, the merit of the young woman, the rank of her family, and his own circumstances. When they are agreed on both sides, the contract is drawn up by him that acts as cadi or judge among these Arabs. In some parts of the east, a measure of corn is formally mentioned in contracts for their concubines, or temporary wives, besides the sum of money which is stipulated by way of dowry. This custom is probably as ancient as concubinage, with which it is connected; and if so, it will perhaps account for the prophet Hosea's purchasing a wife of this kind, for fifteen pieces of silver, and for an homer of barley, and an half homer of barley.³ When the intended husband was not able to give a dowry, he offered an equivalent. The patriarch Jacob who came to Laban with only his staff, offered to serve him seven years for Rachel; a proposal which Laban accepted. Saul, instead of a dowry, required David to bring him an hundred foreskins of the Philistines, under the pretence of avenging himself of his enemies. This custom has prevailed in later times; for in some countries they give their daughters in marriage to the most valiant men, or those who should bring them so many heads of the people with whom they happen to be at war. It is recorded of a nation in Carmania, that no man among them was permitted to marry till he had first brought the head of an enemy to the king. Aristotle admits, that the ancient Greeks were accustomed to buy their wives; but they no sooner began to lay aside their barbarous meanness, than this disgusting practice ceased, and the custom of giving portions to their sons-in-law, was substituted in its place. In like manner, the Romans, in the first ages of their history, purchased their wives; but afterwards, they required the wife to bring a portion to the husband, that he might be able to bear the charges of the matrimonial state more easily.

The contract of marriage was made in the house of the woman's father, before the elders and governors of the city or district. The manner of contracting or espousing was various. Sometimes the man put a piece of money into the woman's hand before witnesses, and said, 'Be thou espoused to me according to the law of Moses and Israel;' or it was done by writing, which was no more than writing the same words with the woman's name, and delivering it to her before witnesses; or lastly, by cohabitation, when the law obliged the man to marry her whom he had dishonoured, if her father gave his consent. They had also several forms of betrothing in Greece; of which one is quoted by Clemens of Alexandria, out of Meander: 'I give you this my daughter, to make you father of children lawfully begotten.' According to Xenophon, the dowry was sometimes mentioned; for when Gyaxares betrothed his daughter to Cyrus, he addressed him in these words: 'I give you, Cyrus, this woman, who is my daughter, with all Media for her dowry.'

The espousals by money, or a written instrument, were performed by the man and woman under a tent or canopy erected for that purpose. Into this chamber the bridegroom was accustomed to go with his bride, that he might talk with her more familiarly; which was considered as a ceremony of confirmation to the wedlock. While he was there, no person was allowed to enter; his friends and attendants waited for him at the door, with torches and lamps in their hands; and when he came out, he was received by all that were present with great joy and acclamation. To this ancient custom, the psalmist alludes in his magnificent description of the heavens: 'In them he set a tabernacle for the sun; which as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, rejoices as a strong man to run a race.'⁴

A Jewish virgin legally betrothed, was considered as a lawful wife; and by consequence could not be put away without a bill of divorce. And if she proved unfaithful to her betrothed husband, she was punished as an adulteress; and her seducer incurred the same punishment as if he had polluted the wife of his neighbour. This is the reason that the angel addressed Joseph, the betrothed husband of Mary, in these terms: 'Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife; for that which is conceived in her is of the holy Ghost.' The evangelist Luke gives her the same title: 'and Joseph also went up from Galilee unto Bethlehem, to be taxed with Mary his espoused wife.'⁵

Ten or twelve months commonly intervened between the ceremony of espousals and the marriage; during this interval, the espoused wife continued with her parents, that she might provide herself with nuptial ornaments suitable to her station. This custom serves to explain a circumstance in Samson's marriage, which is involved in some obscurity: 'He went down,' says the historian, 'and talked with the woman (whom he had seen at Timmath) and she pleased him well.' These words seem to refer to the ceremony of espousals; the following to the subsequent marriage, 'And after a time he returned to take her.'⁶ Hence a considerable time intervened between the espousals, and their actual union.

From the time of the espousals, the bridegroom was at liberty to visit his espoused wife in the house of her father; yet neither of the parties left their own abode during eight days before the marriage; but persons of the same age visited the bridegroom, and made merry with him. These circumstances are distinctly marked in the account which the sacred historian has given us of Samson's marriage: 'so his father went down unto the woman, and made there a feast; for so used the young men to do. And it came to pass when they saw him, that they brought thirty companions to be with him.'¹ These companions were the children of the bride-chamber, of whom our Lord speaks; 'can the children of the bride-chamber mourn as long as the bridegroom is with them?'²

An eastern bride submitted to various purifications, before the celebration of her nuptials. The virgins of Persia were prepared for the bed of Ahasuerus, 'six months with oil of myrrh, and six months with sweet odours, and with other things, for the purifying of the women.' It was a custom among the ancient Jews, to adorn the married couple with bridal crowns, which were generally of gold, made in the form of a tower. We discover this usage in the invitation of the spouse to her companions; 'go forth, O ye daughters of Zion, and behold king Solomon, with the crown wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his espousals, and in the day of the gladness of his heart.'³ And in the compliment of the bridegroom; 'thine head upon thee is like Carmel;' rising with the tower-shaped crown, 'like that mountain in shape; and rough with jewels as that mountain is with protuberances.'⁴

The prophet Isaiah makes an allusion to the same custom, where he celebrates, in strains of rapturous pleasure, the future prosperity of Zion: 'I will greatly rejoice in the Lord; my soul shall be joyful in my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation; he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with garments;'⁵ literally, decketh himself with a crown.

The Greeks were decked with garlands of various herbs and flowers on their marriage day; whence Clytemnestra, in Euripides, speaks thus to Achilles about her daughter Iphigenia. 'But oh, in vain, though I had crowned her to be wedded to thee.'⁶ The hair of a Roman bride was, in like manner, crowned with flowers, after being divided into six locks with the point of a spear. This very ancient practice of crowning the bridegroom and the bride, has been continued among the members of the Greek church in Egypt, to our own times.

The marriage ceremony was commonly performed in a garden, or in the open air; the bride was placed under a canopy, supported by four youths; and adorned with jewels according to the rank of the married persons; all the company crying out with joyful acclamations, Blessed be he that cometh. It was anciently the custom, at the conclusion of the ceremony, for the father and mother, and kindred of the woman, to pray for a blessing upon the parties. Bethuel and Laban, and the other members of their family, pronounced a solemn benediction upon Rebekah before her departure: 'and they blessed Rebekah, and said unto her, Thou art our sister, be thou the mother of thousands of millions, and let thy seed possess the gate of those which hate them.'⁷ And in times long posterior to the age of Isaac, when Ruth the Moabitess was espoused to Boaz, 'all the people that were in the gate, and the elders said, We are witnesses: the Lord make the woman that is come into thine house like Rachel and like Leah, which two did build the house of Israel; and do thou worthily in Ephrath, and be famous in Bethlehem.'⁸ After the benedictions, the bride is conducted, with great pomp, to the house of her husband; this is usually done in the evening; and as the procession moved along, money, sweetmeats, flowers and other articles were thrown among the populace, which they caught in cloths made for such occasions, stretched in a particular manner upon frames. The use of perfumes at eastern marriages is common, and upon great occasions very profuse. Not only are the garments scented, till, in the psalmist's language, they smell of myrrh, aloes, and cassia; it is also customary for virgins to meet, and lead the procession, with silver-gilt pots of perfumes; and sometimes aromatics are burned in the windows of all the houses in the streets through which the procession is to pass, till the air becomes loaded with fragrant odours. In allusion to this practice it is demanded, 'Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness, like pillars of smoke perfumed with myrrh and frankincense.'⁹ So liberally were these rich perfumes burned on this occasion, that a pillar of smoke ascended from the censers, so high, that it could be seen at a considerable distance; and the perfume was so rich, as to equal in value and fragrance all the powders of the merchants. The custom of burning perfumes on these occasions, still continues in the east; for Lady Mary Wortley Montague, describing the reception of a young Turkish bride at the bagnio, says, 'Two virgins met her at the door; two others filled silver-gilt pots with perfumes, and began the procession, the rest following in pairs to the number of thirty.'

It was the custom among the ancient Greeks, and the nations around them, to conduct the new-married couple with torches and lamps to their dwelling, as appears from the messenger in Euripides, who says, he called to mind the time when he bore torches before Menelaus and Helena. These torches were usually carried by servants; and the procession was sometimes attended by singers and dancers. The Roman ladies were, in like manner, led home to their husbands in the evening, by the light of torches. A Jewish marriage seems to have been conducted in much the same way; for in that beautiful psalm, where David describes the majesty of Christ's kingdom, we meet with this passage: 'and the daughter of Tyre shall be there with a gift; even the rich among the people shall entreat thy favour. The king's daughter is all glorious within: her clothing is of wrought gold. She shall be brought unto the king in raiment of needlework; the virgins, her companions that follow her, shall be brought unto thee. With gladness and rejoicing shall they be brought: they shall enter into the king's palace.'¹⁰ In the parable of the ten virgins, the same circumstances are introduced: 'they that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them: but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. While the bridegroom tarried, leading the procession through the city, the women and domestics that were appointed to wait his arrival at home, 'all slumbered and slept. And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. Then all those virgins arose and trimmed their lamps. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out.'¹

But among the Jews, the bridegroom was not always permitted to accompany his bride from her father's house; an intimate friend was often sent to conduct her, while he remained at home to receive her in his apartment. Her female attendants had the honour to introduce her; and whenever they changed the bride's dress, which is often done, they presented her to the bridegroom. It is the custom, and belongs to their ideas of magnificence, frequently to dress and undress the bride; and to cause her to wear on that same day all the clothes made up for her nuptials. For the same reason, the bridegroom's dress is less frequently changed. These circumstances discover the propriety and force of John's language, in his magnificent description of the Jewish church in her millennial state: 'and I, John, saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband.'²

Those that were invited to the marriage, were expected to appear in their best and gayest attire. If the bridegroom was in circumstances to afford it, wedding garments were prepared for all the guests, which were hung up in the antechamber for them to put on over the rest of their clothes, as they entered the apartments where the marriage feast was prepared. To refuse, or even to neglect putting on the wedding garment, was reckoned an insult to the bridegroom, aggravated by the circumstance that it was provided by himself for the very purpose of being worn on that occasion, and was hung up in the way to the inner apartment, that the guests must have seen it, and recollected the design of its suspension. This accounts for the severity of the sentence pronounced by the king, who came in to see the guests, and found among them one who had neglected to put it on: 'and he saith unto him, friend, how earnest thou in hither, not having a wedding garment? And he was speechless,' because it was provided at the expense of the entertainer, and placed full in his view. 'Then said the king to the servants, bind him hand and foot, and take him away and cast him into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'³ The arrival of the bride at the house of her husband, was followed by the marriage feast, at which they indulged in great mirth and hilarity. It was made entirely at the expense of the bridegroom; thus Homer sings; 'a shot-free banquet, or a marriage feast, not such as is by contribution made.'⁴

From the parable of the marriage feast, we have a right to conclude that such entertainments among the Jews were equally free. 'The kingdom of heaven is like unto a certain king which made a marriage for his son, and sent forth his servants to call them that were bidden to the wedding.'⁵

The marriage feast was of old frequently protracted to the length of seven days: for so long Samson entertained his friends at Timnath.⁶ To this festival Laban is thought by many divines to refer, in his answer to Jacob's complaint, that he had imposed Leah upon him instead of Rachel; 'fulfil the week of the marriage, and we will give thee this also.' This feast was called the nuptial joy, with which no other was to be intermixed; all labour ceased while it continued, and no sign of mourning or sorrow was permitted to appear. It may be only further observed, that even in modern times none but very poor people give a daughter in marriage without a female slave for a handmaid, as hired servants are unknown in the oriental regions.⁷ Hence Laban, who was a man of considerable property in Mesopotamia, 'gave unto his daughter Leah Zilpah his maid, for an handmaid;' and 'to Rachel his daughter, Bilhah his handmaid, to be her maid.'⁸ In Greece also the marriage solemnity lasted several days. On the third day the bride presented her bridegroom with a robe; gifts were likewise made to the bride and bridegroom, by the bride's father and friends; these consisted of golden vessels, beds, couches, plates, and all sorts of necessaries for housekeeping, which were carried in great state to the house by women, preceded by a person carrying a basket, in the manner usual at processions, before whom went a boy in white vestments, with a torch in his hand. It was also customary for the bridegroom and his friends to give presents to the bride, after which, the bridegroom had leave to converse freely with her, and she was permitted to appear in public without her veil.⁹ To these circumstances the holy psalmist certainly refers, in his magnificent description of Messiah's kingdom; 'and the daughter of Tyre shall be there with a gift; even the rich among the people shall entreat thy favour'¹⁰ with gifts and offerings suited to their wealth and thy dignity.

The apartments of the women are counted sacred and inviolable, over all the east; it is even a crime to inquire what passes within the walls of the harem, or house of the women. Hence, it is extremely difficult to be informed of the transactions in those sequestered habitations; and a man, says Chardin, may walk an hundred days, one after another, by the house where the women are, and yet know no more what is done there than at the farther end of Tartary. This sufficiently explains the reason of Mordecai's conduct, who 'walked every day before the court of the women's house, to know how Esther did, and what should become of her.'¹¹

The Arabs are not so scrupulous as the Turks about their women; and though they have their harem, or women's apartment in the tent, they readily introduce their acquaintances into it, or those strangers whom they take under their special protection. Pococke's conductor, in his journey to Jerusalem, led him two or three miles to his tent, where he sat with his wife and others round a fire. The faithful Arab kept him there for greater security, the wife being always with him; no stranger ever daring to come into the women's apartment unless introduced. We discover in this custom, the reason of Jael's invitation to Sisera, when he was defeated by Barak: 'turn in, my lord, turn in to me, fear not.'¹²

CHAP. V.—Of the four evangelists and their writings.

BEFORE we proceed any farther in the history of our blessed Saviour's life, it may not be amiss to give some short account of the four evangelists that have recorded it. I call them four, because, whatever spurious pieces gained credit in the world afterwards, the tradition of the church from the beginning of the second century makes it evident, that the gospels then received were only the four gospels which we now own.

St Matthew, who stands in the front of these evangelists, and is generally allowed to be the first who committed the gospel to writing, was the son of Alpheus, a Galilean by birth, a Jew by religion, and a publican by profession. Among the Jews, as well as other nations, the custom at this time prevailed of having more names than one; and therefore we find his brother evangelist St Mark² and Luke,³ giving him the name of Levi, with a civil intent to avoid all mention of his former not so reputable profession, before he was called to the apostleship; but, what is no less an instance of his own modesty, in the gospel written by himself, he not only takes the name by which he was most commonly known, but generally adds the odious epithet to it of 'Matthew the publican,' intending thereby no doubt to magnify the grace of God, and the condescension of our blessed Saviour, who did not disdain to take into the highest dignity of the Christian church those whom the world rejected, and accounted vile.

⁴ Whether he was born in Nazareth or no, it is certain that his ordinary abode was at Capernaum,⁵ because his proper business was to gather the customs on goods that came by the sea of Galilee, and the tribute which passengers were to pay that went by water; for which purpose there was a custom-house by the sea-side, where Matthew had his office, or toll-booth, 'there sitting at the receipt of custom.' Our Lord having lately cured a famous paralytic, retired out of the town, to walk by the sea-side, where he taught the people that flocked after him; and having espied Matthew in his office, he asked him to become one of his disciples; whereupon, without any manner of hesitation, without staying so much as to settle his accounts, and put his affairs in order, he left all and followed him.^a

We cannot but suppose that, as he lived in Capernaum, the place of our Lord's usual residence, and where his sermons and miracles were so frequent, he must have been acquainted with his person and doctrine before this time; and consequently in a good preparation to receive the call with gladness. And that he did so, a good evidence it seems to be, his entertaining our Lord and his disciples at dinner next day in his house; whither he invited several of his own profession, in hopes, no doubt, that our Saviour's company and converse might make the like impression upon them.

From his election to the apostolate he continued constantly with our Lord, during his abode upon earth; and after his ascension for the space of eight years preached the gospel in several parts of Judea: but being now to betake himself to the conversion of the Gentiles, he was entreated by the Jews, who had been converted to the Christian faith, to commit to writing the history of our Lord's life and actions, and to leave it among them as a standing record of what he had preached to them; which accordingly he did, and so composed the gospel which we have now under his name.

⁶ The countries in which he preached were chiefly Parthia and Ethiopia, in the latter of which he converted multitudes, settled churches, and ordained ministers to confirm and build them up; and having signalized his zeal in the ministry of the gospel, and his contempt of the world in a life^b of most exemplary abstinence, he is most probably thought to have suffered martyrdom at Nadabar,^c a city in Ethiopia; but of the time and manner of his death no certain account is transmitted to us.

At the request of the Jewish converts, as we said, and, as some add, at the command of the rest of the apostles, St Matthew wrote his gospel, about eight or nine years after our Lord's resurrection: for that it was extant before the dispersion of the apostles, is plain from Bartholomew carrying it with him into India, where, as Eusebius⁷ informs us, it was found by Panartus, when he went passed his business into other hands. And an attentive consideration of the context, and the mode of the gospel narratives, will show that this is no way inconsistent with the mention of the feast immediately after his call.—ED.

^b Clemens Alexandrinus tells us, that he abstained from the eating of flesh; and that the chief of his diet was herbs, roots, seeds, and berries.—Pedag. b. ii. c. 1.

^c This is contradicted by the account of Heraclion, a learned Valentinian of the second century, who, as cited by Clement of Alexandria, reckons Matthew among the apostles that did not die by martyrdom; and as his statement is not contradicted by Clement, it is more likely to be true than the relation of Socrates, who did not flourish until three hundred years after Heraclion.—Horne's Introduction, vol. iv.—ED.

^a Matthew is generally allowed to have written his gospel before the other evangelists; though the precise time when it was composed cannot be determined. Dr Mill, Michaelis, and Bishop Percy, after Irenæus, assign it to A. D. 61; Dr Hales to 63; Dr Lardner and Mr Hewlett to 64; Baronius, Grotius, Wetstein, J. Jones and others after Eusebius, to 41; Dr Owen and Bishop Tomline, to 38. It is proper to remark that Calvin, Beza, Gomarus, the antagonist of Arminius, Lardner, Michaelis, Dr Macknight, and others, seem all to have been decidedly of opinion that Luke wrote before Matthew. But the question, really, is of no importance. For the evidence of the inspiration of Luke, which has lately been controverted by divines both in England and in Germany, does in no degree depend upon it.—ED.

^a This is a rash conjecture. Although it is said in the text (Luke v. 27.) that Levi, or Matthew left all, rose up, and followed Christ, it is not necessary to infer from this, that in obeying the divine call he committed an act of injustice to his employers, and made no settlement of his accounts. He might have left his office to the care of some of his friends, or he might have returned soon afterwards to arrange his affairs. Surely he who said, 'render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's,' would not encourage one whom he had chosen to be his follower to act the part of an unfaithful steward even in temporal concerns. "The feast," says Doddridge, "was made the day following his calling, or perhaps some months after it, when he had made up his accounts, and to propagate the faith in those parts, and by such as retained the knowledge of Christ, was reputed a valuable treasure.

^a As it was primarily designed for the benefit of the Jewish converts, whatever some moderns may say to the contrary, the voice of all antiquity must carry it against them, that it was originally wrote in Hebrew, not in the ancient pure Hebrew, for that, in a great measure, was lost among the vulgar, but in a language commonly used at that time by the Jews of Palestine, and therefore still called the Hebrew tongue, because wrote in Hebrew characters, which was the Syriac, with a mixture of Hebrew and Chaldee.

This gospel of St Matthew was, for a long time, in use among the Jews, who had been converted to Christianity, and when, some time before the Romans laid siege to Jerusalem, they retired to Pella, they carried it thither along with them; from whence it was diffused into Decapolis,

^a There is a diversity of opinion respecting the language in which it was written: many learned men have contended, that it was written in the Hebrew, or Syro-Chaldaic dialect then spoken by the Jews; and others have as strenuously vindicated the Greek original. A third opinion has been offered by Dr Townson, to whose opinion great deference is due, and some other modern divines, that there were two originals, one in Hebrew, and the other in Greek. He thinks that there seems to be more reason for allowing two originals than for contesting either; the consent of antiquity pleading strongly for the Hebrew, and evident marks of originality, for the Greek. Dr Campbell argues strongly in favour of a Hebrew original. After adducing the external testimonies in support of this view of the matter, he says, have we not reason to conclude, from the express order, as well as from the example of our Lord, and from the uniform practice of his disciples, that it was suitable to the will of Providence, in this dispensation of grace, that every advantage should be first offered to the Jews, especially the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and that the gospel which had been first delivered to them by word, both by our Lord himself, and by his apostles, should be also first presented to them in writing, in that very dialect in which many of the readers, at the time of the publication, might remember to have heard the same sacred truths, as they came from the mouth of him who spake as never man spake, the great oracle of the Father, the interpreter of God. This loss of this gospel proved the prelude to the extinction of that church. But we have reason to be thankful that what was most valuable in the work, is not lost to the Christian community. The version we have in Greek is written with much evangelical simplicity, entirely in the idiom and manner of the apostles. It only remains that we notice the third opinion above mentioned, namely, that there were two originals one in Hebrew, the other in Greek, but both written by Matthew. This opinion, we believe, was first intimated by Sixtus Senensis, from whom it was adopted by Drs Whitby, Benson, Hey, and Townson, and some other modern divines. It has been conjectured, that Matthew on his departure to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, left with the church at Jerusalem, the Hebrew or Syriac narrative of our Lord's doctrines and miracles, and that the Greek gospel was written long after the apostles had quitted Jerusalem, and dispersed themselves in the discharge of the duties of their office. This conjecture receives some countenance from the terms in which Eusebius, when giving his own opinion, mentions Matthew's gospel. Matthew, says that historian, having first preached to the Hebrews, delivered to them, when he was preparing to depart to other countries, his gospel composed in their native language: that to those, from whom he was sent away, he might by his writings supply the loss of his presence. This opinion is further corroborated by the fact, that there are instances on record, of authors who have themselves published the same work in two languages. Thus Josephus wrote the History of the Jewish war in Hebrew and Greek. Upon the whole, the evidence preponderates in favour of the opinion that Matthew wrote first a Hebrew gospel for the use of the first Hebrew converts; and that afterwards, within a few years after our Lord's ascension, the same evangelist wrote his gospel in Greek.—Ed.

and all the countries beyond Jordan, where the Judaizing Christians still made use of it in the time of Epiphanius¹ and Eusebius² of Cæsarea. But these Christians³ did not preserve this sacred depositum, with all the fidelity they should have done. They added to it several things, which perhaps they might have heard from the mouths of the apostles, or from their immediate disciples, and this in time brought it under the suspicion of other believers. The Ebionites, at length, got it into their hands, and by their additions and defalcations, in favour of some errors they had fallen into concerning the divinity of our Saviour and the virginity of the blessed mother, so corrupted it, that at length it was given up by other churches which adhered to the form of sound doctrine. It continued, however, a long time in its primitive purity in the hands of the Nazarenes, or first believers in Palestine, who, though they were zealous in the observation of the law, embraced no such opinions as the Ebionites did, nor made any alterations in the gospel. But after the extinction of this sect, we hear no more of the genuine gospel of St Matthew, because the ancient Greek version, which, in the apostolic times, was made from it, having always preserved its primitive integrity, did, long before this, universally prevail, and was looked upon as authentic as the original; for, though its author be uncertain, yet every one who mentions it, always ascribes it to some one apostle or other.^b

When St Matthew began to write, the great question among the Jews was, Whether our blessed Saviour was

^b Those who maintain that St Matthew wrote in Greek, produce these arguments for their opinion. 1st, That some of the fathers, such as Origen, Epiphanius, and St Jerome, quote indeed the Hebrew of St Matthew, but quote it as a book of no great authority, which they would not have done, had it been the true original. 2d, That had St Matthew wrote in Hebrew, the Hebrew names in his gospel would not have been interpreted into Greek, nor would he have quoted the Old Testament, according to the Septuagint translation. 3d, That the Greek language was then very common in Palestine, and all the east. And, 4th, since all the other authors of the New Testament wrote in Greek, why should St Matthew alone write his gospel in Hebrew? But to these arguments it may be replied, 1st, That the uniform testimony of all the ancients, who tell us that St Matthew wrote his gospel in Hebrew, is certainly of very great weight; but then we must know that there were two of these copies of St Matthew, the one pure and uncorrupted, of which they have spoken with great esteem, the other depraved by heretics, which they have contemned, and looked upon as apocryphal. 2d, The Hebrew names, interpreted into Greek, prove the very contrary to what would be inferred from it; for this demonstrates that the translation was Greek, and the original Hebrew. 3d, Of the ten passages in the Old Testament that St Matthew cites in his gospel, there are seven of them which resemble the Hebrew more than the Septuagint; in the other three, the Septuagint and the Hebrew themselves agree; but the plain truth is, that St Matthew quotes by memory, and relates, not so much the words, as the sense, of the passages. 4th, However common the Greek tongue might be in Palestine among the better sort of people, yet it is certain that the generality of the Jews spoke commonly what they called Hebrew, which was Syriac and Chaldee mixed with Hebrew. And, 5th, Though all the rest of the New Testament were written in Greek, yet that is no argument why this part of it should; though, if convenience were considered, it should rather, one would think, be adapted to the general use and capacity of those for whom it was wrote. The dispute, however, is about matter of fact, and this is a fact attested by all the ancients, many of whom had seen the original, and were capable of making a judgment of it.—Whitby's Prefatory Discourse to the four Evangelists; and Calmet's Dictionary, under the word Matthew.

the true Messiah or no? and the main tendency of his gospel seems to prove this. For he shows by his mighty deeds, that he was the Christ, the Son of God; that his mother Mary was a virgin; that he was not come to destroy the law, but to fulfil it; and that his miracles were not magical operations, nor the effects of any human art, but incontestable proofs of the power of God, and of his divine mission.¹ St Ambrose observes, that none of the apostles has entered so far into the particulars of our Saviour's actions^a as has St Matthew; that none of them has related the history of the wise men coming from the east, or the parable of the wise and foolish virgins, and some others, but he; that, in short, he has given us more rules for the conduct of life, and more lessons of morality, suitable to our necessities, than any; and all this² in a natural and easy style, (though sometimes mixed with Hebraisms,) such as becomes an historian, and especially a sacred historian, whose narration should be free from affectation, and all such trifling ornaments as do not agree with the gravity and dignity of his subject.

Though the name of Mark seems to be of Roman extraction, yet the evangelist now before us was born of Jewish parents, and originally descended from the tribe of Levi. What his proper name was, or upon what change or accident of life he might assume this, we have no manner of intelligence; but as it was no unusual thing for the Jews, when they went into the European provinces of the Roman empire, to conform to the customs of the country, and while they continued there, to be called by some name of common use; so some have conjectured, that when Mark attended upon St Peter to Rome, he might at that time take upon him this name, which, as he never returned to Judea to reassume his own, he for ever after retained. In the writings of the apostles we read of several called by this name. There is John,³ whose surname was Mark; ⁴ Mark, the sister's son of Barnabas; Mark, ⁵ who was employed in the ministry: Mark, whom St Paul calls his fellow labourer; ⁶ and Mark, whom St Peter ⁷ styles his son: but which of these was the evangelist, or whether the evangelist might not be a person distinct from each of these, has been a matter of some doubt among the learned.

That he was one of the seventy disciples, and among them one of those who took offence at our Lord's discourse of ⁸ eating his flesh and drinking his blood, some of the ancients have affirmed; but Eusebius, ⁹ from Papias who was bishop of Hierapolis, and lived near those times, tells us positively that he was no hearer or follower of our Saviour. He was converted by some of the apostles, and most likely by St Peter, to whom he was a constant retainer, and served him in the capacity of an amanuensis, and an interpreter.¹⁰ For, though the apostles were divinely inspired, and, among other miraculous powers, had the gift of languages conferred on them; yet the interpretation of tongues seems to be a gift more peculiar to some than others; and it might be St Mark's talent, either by word or writing, to expound St Peter's discourses to those who understood not the language wherein they were delivered.^b

¹⁰ Cave's Lives of the Apostles.

^b With regard to the evangelist Mark, all that we learn from the New Testament concerning him is, that he was sister's son to Barnabas, (Col. iv. 10.) and the son of Mary, a pious woman of Jerusalem, at whose house the apostles and first Christians often assembled. His Hebrew name was John, and Michaelis thinks that he adopted the surname of Mark when he left Judea to preach the gospel to foreign countries—a practice not unusual among the Jews of that age, who frequently assumed a name more familiar to the nations which they visited than that by which they had been distinguished in their own country. But Dr Campbell, and others, were not convinced that the nephew of Barnabas is the person who wrote the gospel which bears the name of Mark. Of John, surnamed Mark, says Dr Campbell, one of the first things we learn is, that he attended Paul and Barnabas in their apostolical journeys, when these two travelled together, Acts xii. 25. xiii. 5. And when afterwards there arose a dispute between them concerning him, insomuch that they separated, Mark accompanied his uncle Barnabas, and Silas attended Paul. When Paul was reconciled to Mark, which was probably soon after, we find Paul again employing Mark's assistance, recommending him, and giving him a very honourable testimony, Col. iv. 10. 2 Tim. iv. 11. Phil. 21. But we hear not a syllable of his attending Peter, as his minister, or assisting him in any capacity. This is so different from the accounts which the most ancient writers give of the evangelist Mark, that though they cannot be said to contradict each other, they can hardly be understood as spoken of the same individual. The evangelist is not said to have derived any part of his information from our Lord himself, or even from any of his apostles, except the apostle Peter, whose disciple he is always represented as having been; and who doubtless speaks of him when he says, 1 Pet. v. 13, 'Marcus my son saluteth you;' a denomination commonly given in those times by the minister, to every one who by his means had been converted to the Christian faith. In brief, the accounts given of Paul's attendant, and those of Peter's interpreter, concur in nothing but the name, Mark, or Marcus; too slight a circumstance to conclude the sameness of the person from, especially when we consider how common the name was at Rome, and how customary it was for the Jews, in that age, to assume some Roman name when they went thither.—(Dr Campbell's Preface to Mark, vol. ii. p. 116.) But this is a question of no great importance. That Mark was the author of the gospel which bears his name, is proved by the unanimous testimony of the Christian writers of the four first centuries. From the earliest ages of the church this gospel was received not only as genuine and authentic, but as divinely inspired.—It has always been fully admitted, that the apostle Peter during his residence in Rome saw the gospel of Mark, and approved of it; so that the work comes to us with the highest apostolical authority. The deep humility of Peter has been justly inferred from the fact, that in this gospel, which was written under his superintendance, his denial of his Master is described with circumstances of higher aggravation, and with fainter views of his repentance, than are to be found in the other gospels. In regard to the time when this gospel was written there are different opinions. But as it is evident from the evangelist's own narrative, (Mark xvi. 20.) that he did not write until after the apostles had dispersed themselves among the Gentiles, and had preached the gospel every where, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following; and as it does not appear that all the apostles quitted Judea earlier than the year 50, perhaps we shall approximate nearest to the real date, if we place it between the years 60 and 63. That Mark is not to be considered as an abridger of Matthew's gospel, as he has been represented by some modern divines, may be proved by the following

^a If we compare St Matthew with the three other evangelists, we may perceive a remarkable difference in the order and succession of our Saviour's actions, and from chap. iv. 22 to chap. xiv. 13, which has much perplexed chronologers and interpreters. Some pretend, that St Matthew should be followed, but others think it more reasonable to submit to the authority of the other three, especially since St Mark, who follows him close enough in every other thing, forsakes him in this particular. However this be, it can prove no prejudice to the truth of facts, which are the essential part of the gospel: and as to the order of time, the sacred authors are not always solicitous to follow it exactly.—Calmel's Dictionary under the word Matthew.

He accompanied St Peter in all his travels, preached Christianity in Italy, and at Rome, and at the request of the Christians in those parts, composed his gospel, which St Peter afterwards revised and approved. From which St Peter went into Egypt, and having fixed his chief residence in Alexandria, he there, and in the country round about, propagated the Christian faith with such success, that multitudes of both men and women, not only became converts, but engaged themselves likewise in a more strict profession ^a of the religion that he taught them than ordinary.

From Alexandria he removed westward; and passing through the countries of Marmorica, Pentapolis, and some others in his way to Libya, though the people were barbarous in their manners, as well as idolatrous in their worship, by his preaching and miracles, he not only converted, but, before he departed, confirmed them in the profession of the gospel. Upon his return to Alexandria, he preached with all boldness, ordered and disposed of the affairs of the church, and wisely provided for the continuance thereof, by constituting governors and pastors in it. ¹ The great number of miracles which he wrought, and the reproaches which some of the converts made upon circumstances: first, he omits altogether several things related by Matthew—our Lord's pedigree, his birth, the visit of the magians, Joseph's flight into Egypt, and the cruelty of Herod. As his intention appears to have been to give in brief the history of our Lord's ministry, he begins very properly with the preaching of the Baptist. Secondly, it is clear, that whereas Matthew had designed his gospel chiefly for the Jewish Christians, that of Mark was principally intended for Gentile believers. Thus, the first time the Jordan is mentioned, the appellation river is added to the name, Mark i. 5. As the Romans could not understand the Jewish phrase of defiled or common hands, this evangelist adds the parenthetical explanation of it, that is, unwashed, Mark vii. 2. When he uses the word corban, he subjoins the interpretation, 'that is a gift' (vii. 11.): and instead of the word mammon, he uses the common term riches.—Dr Townson's Works, vol. i. p. 151. The manner in which Mark relates the life of our Saviour is an additional evidence that he wrote for Gentile Christians. His narrative is clear and concise, and while the other evangelists style our Saviour the Son of Man, he announces him as 'the Son of God.' Thirdly, there are some things in Matthew, of which, though they fall within the time to which Mark had confined himself, he has taken no notice; and some things are mentioned by Mark which had been overlooked by Matthew. Fourthly, he has not always followed the same arrangement with his predecessor; and his relation of some facts, so far from being an abridgment of Matthew's, is the more circumstantial of the two. His style in general, instead of being more concise, is more diffuse.—Campbell; Michaelis; Koppe; Jones.—Ed.

^a Philo, in his 'Treatise of a contemplative Life,' gives us a long account, and high commendation, of a set of people, whom he calls εὐαριστοὶ, who, in a pleasant place near Maræotic lake in Egypt, formed themselves into religious societies, and lived a strict philosophic life, and these Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. b. ii. c. 16.) affirms to have been Christians, converted and brought under these admirable rules by St Mark, at his coming into Egypt: but whoever seriously considers Philo's account, will plainly find that he intends it of Jews, and professors of the Mosaic religion, and not of Christians; partly because it is improbable that Philo, being a Jew, should give so great a character and commendation of Christians, who were so hateful to the Jews at that time in all places of the world; partly because Philo speaks of them as an institution of a considerable standing, whereas Christians had but lately appeared in the world, and were later come into Egypt; and partly because many things in Philo's account do no way suit with the state and manners of Christians at that time.—Cave's Life of St Mark.

the senseless idols of the Egyptians, so exasperated their rage, that they were resolved to destroy this introducer of a new religion among them. It was at the time of Easter when the great solemnities of their god Serapis happened to be celebrated; at which festival the minds of the people being excited to a passionate vindication of the honour of their idol, they broke in upon St Mark, then engaged in the solemn celebration of divine worship and binding his feet, they dragged him through the streets, and other rugged places, to a precipice near the sea; but for that night they thrust him into a dark prison, where his soul, by a divine vision, was strengthened and encouraged under the ruins of a shattered body. Early next morning the tragedy began again. For, in the same manner as they had done the day before, they dragged him about, till his flesh being raked off, and his veins emptied of blood, his spirits failed, and he expired: but their malice died not with him; for taking the poor remains of his body, they threw them into a fire, and so burned them; but his bones and ashes the Christians gathered up, and decently entombed near the place where he usually preached. ^b

² After the defeat of Simon Magus, whereof we shall have occasion to say more hereafter, the reputation of the Christian religion grew so great, and converts at Rome became so many, that they were desirous to have in writing those doctrines which had hitherto been imparted to them by word of mouth only. St Mark, to whom this request was made, accordingly set himself to recollect what he, by long conversation, had learned from St Peter, who, when the other had finished the work, perused, approved, and recommended it to the use of the churches: and for this reason it is, by some of the ancients, styled St Peter's gospel; not that St Peter dictated it to St Mark, but because St Mark did chiefly compose it out of that account which St Peter usually delivered in his discourses to the people: and accordingly St Chrysostom ³ observes that the evangelist, in his nervous style and manner of expression, takes a great delight to imitate St Peter.

^c The original Greek copy, under St Mark's own hand, is said to be extant at Venice at this day, written, as they tell us, by him at Aquileia, and thence, after many hundred years, translated to Venice, where it is still preserved, though the letters are so worn out with length of time, that they are not capable of being read. There are likewise some Greek manuscripts, wherein the last twelve verses of this gospel are omitted; but they are extant in the greatest number of the most ancient and authentic copies, as well as in the works of Irenæus, an author of prior date to any of the manuscripts that want them. It is not to be questioned, therefore, but that they originally belonged to St Mark's gospel, and were suppressed by some ignorant or conceited transcriber, upon the account of some seeming contradictions between St Matthew and this other evangelist, which, with a small skill in critical learning, may be easily reconciled.—Cave's Lives of the Apostles; and Beausobre's Preface on St Mark.—The story of the autograph of St Mark's gospel, said to be preserved at Venice, is now proved to be a mere fable, for the Venetian MSS. formerly made part of the Latin MSS. preserved at Friuli, most of which was printed by Blanchini in his Evangeliorum Quadruplex. use of the Christians at Rome, and from hence some may be apt to think it highly congruous that it should at first be written in the Latin tongue: but it must be considered, ¹ that as the Jewish converts, in that city, understood but little Latin, so there were very few Romans that did not understand Greek, which, as appears from the writers of that age, was the genteel and fashionable language of those times; nor can any good reason be assigned, why it should be more inconvenient for St Mark to write his gospel in Greek for the use of the Romans, than that St Paul should in the same language, write his epistle to that church.

We cannot compare St Matthew and St Mark together but must perceive, that the latter had seen the writings of the former, because he often uses the same terms, relates the same facts, and takes notice of the same circumstances; but we must not therefore infer, that all he intended in his work was simply to abridge him; because he begins his gospel in a different manner; he omits several things, particularly our Lord's genealogy; he varies from him in the order of his narration; he relates some facts that the other has omitted; he enlarges upon others in many particulars, and, what is no mean argument of his truth and impartiality in all the rest, the shameful lapse and denial of his beloved master St Peter he sets down, with more and more aggravating circumstances than any of the other evangelists have recorded.

^a As to whether Luke was originally a Jew or a pagan, different opinions have been entertained. Some have inferred the latter opinion from an expression of the apostle Paul to the Colossians, (chap. iv, 10—14,) where, after naming some with this addition, 'who are of the circumcision,' he mentions others, and among them Luke, without any addition. These, are therefore, supposed to have been Gentiles. But this, though a plausible inference, as Dr Campbell observes, is not a necessary consequence from the apostle's words. He might have added the clause, 'who are of the circumcision,' not to distinguish the persons from those after-mentioned as not of the circumcision, but to give the Colossians particular information concerning those with whom perhaps they had not previously been acquainted. If they knew what Luke, and Epaphras, and Demas, whether Jews or Gentiles, originally were, the information was quite unnecessary with regard to them. It will perhaps add a little to the weight of this consideration to observe, that in those days, in introducing to any church such Christian brethren as were unknown to them before, it was a point of some importance to inform them, whether they were of the circumcision or not, inasmuch as there were certain ceremonies and observances, in which the Jewish converts were indulged, which, if found in one converted from Gentilism, might render it suspected, that his conversion was rather to Judaism than to Christianity.—But that Luke was, with all the other writers of the New Testament, a convert to Christianity from Judaism, not from Gentilism, is, upon the whole, sufficiently evident from his style, in which, notwithstanding its greater copiousness and variety, there are as many Hebraisms, as are found in the other evangelists, and such as, I imagine, could not be exemplified in any writer, originally Gentile, unless his conversion to Judaism had been very early in life.—Dr Campbell's Preface to Luke, vol. ii, p. 129.—Ed.

the metropolis of Syria, was, at this time, a city celebrated for the pleasantness of its situation, the fertility of its soil, the riches of its traffic, the wisdom of its senate, the learning of its professors, and the civility and politeness of its inhabitants, by the pens of some of the greatest orators of their times; and yet, above all these, it was renowned for this one peculiar honour, that in this place it was, where the disciples were first named Christians.

In Antioch there was a famous university, well replenished with learned professors of all arts and sciences, where St Luke could not miss of a liberal education; however, he did not only study in Antioch, but in all the schools of Greece and Egypt, whereby he became accomplished in every part of human literature, and, as the Greek academies were then more especially famous for the study of physic, our evangelist, for some time, applied himself solely to the practice of that; and, after his conversion, continued, very likely, in the same profession, which was far from being inconsistent, but rather subservient to the ministry of the gospel, or the cure of souls.

As to his other accomplishment, the art of painting, the ancients knew nothing of it. Nicephorus ⁴ is the first author that mentions it; and though a great deal of pains has been taken to prove, that some pieces, still extant, were drawn by his own hand, yet the ancient inscription found in a vault near St Mary's church, in the Via lata at Rome, the place where St Paul's house is said to have stood, where mention is made of a picture of the blessed virgin, as one of the seven painted by St Luke, is an argument of better authority for his skill in that art, than any that the Jesuit Gretser, in his laborious treatise, ⁵ ⁶ has produced. But, whether our evangelist ever painted the blessed virgin or not, it is certain that he has left us so many particulars, omitted by others, relating to the conception, birth, and infancy of her son, ⁶ that he seems to have been acquainted with her, and to have had some share in her confidence.

That he was one of the seventy disciples, is a notion inconsistent with his own declaration, in the preface to his gospel, wherein he informs us, that the facts therein contained were communicated to him by others, who had been ⁷ eye-witnesses, and ministers of the word from the beginning; and therefore the most probable opinion is, that, as the Jews lived in great numbers, and had their synagogues, and schools of education at Antioch, St Luke was at first a Jewish proselyte, but afterwards, by St Paul, while he abode in this city, converted to the Christian faith. A companion of his travels and sufferings he plainly appears to have been, if not from his first conversion, at least from the time of St Paul's first going into Macedonia; for there, in his account of the apostle's actions, he changes his style, and, ⁸ includes himself ever after as a party concerned in the narrative.

The truth is, he followed him in all his dangers, was with him at several arraignments at Jerusalem, and accompanied him in his desperate voyage to Rome, where he still attended on him, to serve his necessities, and supply those ministerial offices which the apostle's confinement would not suffer him to undergo. Nay, it appears from a passage of St Paul ¹ to Timothy, that he returned with him to Rome the second time, waiting on him in the same capacity, and especially in carrying messages to those churches where they had planted Christianity: nor can we well forbear thinking, that he continued his attendance on him until the apostle had finished his course, and crowned his ministry with his martyrdom; by which kind offices he infinitely endeared himself to St Paul, who owned him for his fellow-labourer, and called him 'the beloved physician,' ² and 'the brother, whose praise is in the gospel, throughout all the churches.'

After the death of St Paul, how he disposed of himself is not so certain. Some are of opinion that he returned into the east, and in Egypt and Lydia preached the gospel, wrought miracles, converted multitudes, and constituted guides and ministers of religion; but others rather think, that he travelled into Dalmatia, Gallia, Italy, and Macedonia, where he spared no pains, nor declined any dangers, that he might faithfully discharge the trust committed to him. ³ Upon his coming into Greece, those who make him die a violent death, for some are of a contrary opinion, tell us, that he preached with great success, and baptized many converts into the Christian faith, till a party of infidels, making head against him, drew him to execution, and, for want of a cross whereon to dispatch him, hanged him upon an olive-tree, in the eightieth year of his age. ^a

We have two pieces of his, namely, his gospel, and the history of the apostolic acts, wrote for the use of the churches, and both dedicated to Theophilus: but who this Theophilus was, it is not so easy a matter to determine, since many of the ancients themselves have taken this name in a general appellative sense, for a lover of God, a title common to every good Christian; but others, with better reason, have thought, that it is the proper name of some person of distinction, since the title of 'most excellent' is annexed to it, which is the usual form of address to princes and great men. But who this person of distinction was, it is impossible to tell, only we may suppose, that he was some considerable magistrate, whom St Luke had converted, and to whom he now dedicated his books, not only as a testimony of honourable respect, but as a means of giving him a farther information of those things wherein he had instructed him.

that this evangelist is more circumstantial in relating the facts, and more exact in the method and order of them, than either of the two who wrote before him. ⁵ The history of Zacharias, the generation of John the Baptist, the angel's coming to the blessed virgin, Elizabeth's salutation of her at the first interview, the occasion of Joseph and Mary's going to Bethlehem, the circumstances of our Saviour's birth there, the publication of it to the shepherds, and the testimony which Simeon and Anna gave to him in the temple; these, and several other pieces of history, as well as the parables of the lost sheep, lost piece of money, and returning prodigal son, &c., are not related by any other evangelist. His history therefore is an excellent supplement of what they have omitted; nor does it in the least detract from the authority of his relations, that he himself was not present at the doing of them: for, if we consider who were the persons from whom he derived his account of things, he had a stock of intelligence sufficiently authentic to proceed upon; and, when he had finished it, had the sanction and approbation of an apostle, divinely inspired, as himself likewise was, even of the great apostle of the Gentiles, to confirm it.

Whoever looks into the beginning of St Luke's history of the apostolic acts, may easily perceive that it is a continuation of what he had related in his gospel; for it takes up the story at our Saviour's ascension, and continues it to St Paul's arrival at Rome after his appeal to in writing this gospel was to supersede the defective narratives of the life of Christ which were then in circulation, and to furnish the church with a genuine account of the life, doctrines, miracles, death, and resurrection of our Saviour. Dr Campbell truly observes, that the very circumstance of the number of such narratives at so early a period is itself an evidence that there was something in the first publication of the Christian doctrine, which, notwithstanding the many unfavourable circumstances wherewith it was attended, excited the curiosity, and awakened the attention of persons of all ranks and denominations; insomuch that every narrative which pretended to furnish men with any additional information concerning so extraordinary a person as Jesus, seems to have been read with avidity. Who they were to whom the evangelist alludes, who had published narratives not entirely to be depended on, it is impossible for us now to discover: but we are certain they were not the evangelists Matthew and Mark, because they could not be called 'many'; and the former of them at least wrote from his own personal knowledge, as well as under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, while the persons to whom Luke refers had written merely from report. Some writers have supposed that Luke derived his information chiefly from the apostle Paul, whom he had faithfully attended. But though Paul, who was divinely enlightened in all that concerned the life and doctrine of his Master, must have been of great use to this evangelist, it appears from Luke's own words, that the chief source of his intelligence, as to the facts related in his gospel, was from those who had been eye and ear witnesses of what our Lord both did and taught. Now of this number Paul evidently was not. At the same time, the sanction of the apostle, and the early and unanimous reception of the writings of Luke, as divinely inspired, and a part of the canon of Scripture, are sufficient to satisfy us of the divine authority both of the gospel which bears the name of this evangelist, and of the acts of the apostles. As to the time when this gospel was written, the majority of biblical critics are of opinion that it was in the year 63, or 64. As to the place of publication, though nothing certain can be affirmed, it has been conjectured with much probability that it was written by Luke while he attended on Paul during his two years' imprisonment at Caesarea; and that before he set sail with the apostle for Rome, he sent it to Theophilus, wherever that person was residing.—Ed.

Cæsar, and so, properly speaking, is but one history divided into two parts. The main difference between the gospel and the Acts is, that in the former he writes from the information he had from others, but such as were true and authentic witnesses; in the latter, from his own knowledge, and personal concern in the things he relates.

His chief design, in the composition of this work, was, to write a true history of the apostles, and of the foundation of the Christian church, in opposition to the false Acts, and false histories, which began then to be dispersed about the world. This history, however, does not comprise the acts of all the apostles, but confines itself chiefly to the most remarkable passages of two, St Peter and St Paul, and even of these two, it gives us but a short and summary account. St Peter's story carries it down no lower than his deliverance from Herod's imprisoning him, and the death of his persecutor, which happened in the year of our Lord 44; and yet, the apostle lived four and twenty years after this. And in like manner, the history of St Paul is far from being complete, for, as from the time of his conversion, there is very little said of him, to his coming to Iconium, which was twelve years after; so his story proceeds no farther than to his first coming to Rome, in the year of our Lord 58; and yet, after this, he lived ten years, and having preached the gospel in Spain, and other parts of the west, at last returned to Rome, and there suffered martyrdom.

² The evangelist's design, in short, was not to compose a large volume, but only to single out some few things which he thought necessary for the instruction of the faithful; and in this respect his work may be called 'An historical Demonstration of the Truth of the Christian religion;' since therein we perceive our Lord's promises fulfilled in his mission of the Holy Ghost, in his resurrection, and ascension into heaven, in the sovereign power he exercises there, in the miracles he enabled his followers to work, in the rise and wonderful progress of his religion, and, in one word, in the Christian church becoming the church universal by the call to the Gentiles.

We have only one thing more to remark concerning this history, namely, That as St Luke wrote it at Rome and at the end of St Paul's two years' imprisonment there, with which he concludes his story; so his way and manner of writing is exact and accurate; his style polite and elegant, sublime and noble, and yet easy and perspicuous, flowing with a natural grace and sweetness, admirably adapted to an historical design, and all along expressed in a vein of purer and more refined language than is to be found in the other writers of the sacred story.

St John, though the last in order, yet first in quality, among the evangelists, was by birth a Galilean, the son of Zebedee and Salome, one of those devout women who constantly attended our Lord in his ministry, and brother of James, who, to distinguish him from another apostle of the same name, is generally called 'James the great.' Before his adjoining himself to Christ, he seems to have been a disciple to John the Baptist, and is thought to have been that other disciple who, in the first chapter³ of his gospel, is said to have been present with Andrew when John declared Jesus to be the Lamb of God, and thereupon to have followed him to the place of his abode.

He was by much the youngest of the apostles; yet was he admitted into as great a share of his Master's confidence as any. He was one of those to whom he communicated the most private passages of his life; one of those whom he took with him when he went and restored Jairus's daughter to life; one of those to whom he exhibited a specimen of his divinity, in his transfiguration on the mount; one of those who were present at his conference with Moses and Elias, and heard that voice which declared him the beloved Son of God; and one of those who were companions of his solitude, and most retired devotions, and bitter agonies in the garden. Thus, of the three who were made the witnesses of their Master's actions, which he saw convenient to conceal, St John had constantly the privilege to make one. Nay, even of these three he seems, in some respects, to have the preference; to be known by the most desirable of all titles, 'the disciple whom Jesus loved;' to have the honour of ^a leaning upon his Lord's bosom at meat; to have the intimacy with him to ask him a question, namely, who in the company was the traitor; which even St Peter himself had not courage to do; and, what is the highest instance of his affection, to have his mother, his sorrowful and disconsolate mother, with his last dying breath, committed to his care and comfort; ⁴ which peculiar tokens of his Master's favour and esteem, some have ascribed to the apostle's eminent modesty, others to his unspotted chastity, others think it an indulgence due to his youth; but they seem to have the brightest notion who impute it to a nearness of relation, and a peculiar sweetness of disposition conspiring to recommend him.

⁵ Upon the division of the provinces, which the apostles made among themselves, Asia fell to St John's share, though he did not immediately enter upon his charge, but staid at Jerusalem, at least till the death of the blessed virgin, which was about fifteen years after our Lord's ascension. After he was thus released from his trust, he took his journey into Asia, and industriously applied himself to propagate Christianity, preaching where the gospel had not yet taken place, and confirming it where it had been already planted. Many churches of note and eminence were of his foundation; but the chief place of his residence was at Ephesus, where, though St Paul had many years before settled a church, and constituted Timothy bishop of it, yet considering that it was a city of exceeding great resort, both upon the account of its traffic, and the convenience of its port, the apostle thought he could not be seated more commodiously than here for dispersing the knowledge of his doctrines to natives of several nations and quarters at once.

After several years, some say twenty-seven, spent here, he was accused to Domitian, who had then begun a severe persecution, as a great asserter of atheism and impiety, and a public subverter of the religion of the empire; so that, by his command, the proconsul of Asia sent him bound to Rome, where, as Tertullian relates, in a manner importing the fact abundantly notorious, he was plunged into a caldron of oil set on fire; but God, who had reserved him for farther services to the truth, restrained the heat of it, as he did in the fiery furnace of old, and so preserved him from this seemingly unavoidable destruction. The emperor, however, unmoved with his miraculous deliverance, ordered him to be banished to Patmos, a small desolate island in the Archipelago, where he remained several years, instructing the inhabitants in the faith of Christ; and where he was vouchsafed those visions and prophetic representations which he then recorded in his book of Revelation, reaping this great advantage from his exile, that though he was cut off from the society of men, he was the more entertained with immediate converses of heaven.

Upon the death of Domitian, and the succession of Nerva, who rescinded all the odious acts of his predecessor, and, by public edict, recalled those whom the other's fury had banished, St John took the opportunity to return into Asia, and fixed his seat again at Ephesus; the rather, because the people of that place had lately martyred their bishop, Timothy. Here, with the assistance of seven other bishops, he took upon him the government of the large diocese of Asia Minor, erected oratories, and disposed of the clergy in the best manner that the circumstances of those times would permit; and having spent his time in an indefatigable execution of his charge, travelling from east to west to instruct the world in the principles of the holy religion which he was sent to propagate; and shunning no difficulties or dangers, to redeem men's minds from vice, error, or idolatry, he finished his course, in the beginning of Trajan's reign, in a good old age, and, in the ninety-ninth year of his life, died a natural death, and was buried near Ephesus; a wonderful pattern of holiness and charity, and a writer so profound, as to deserve, by way of eminence, the character of St John the divine.

The first in time, though placed last, is his Apocalypse, or book of Revelation, which he wrote in his confinement at Patmos. After the preface, and admonition given to the bishops of the seven churches in Asia, it contains the persecutions which the faithful have suffered from the Jews, heretics, and Roman emperors, down as far as Julian the apostate. After this we have a view of that vengeance which God has exercised against the persons of persecutors, against the Roman empire, and the city of Rome, which is described under the name of Babylon, the great prostitute, seated upon seven hills; then we have a description of the peaceable and flourishing state of the church for a thousand years, and, after some molestation from the Turks, as is supposed, the happiness of the church triumphant, set off with all the imaginable beauties of rhetoric; and, at last, we come to a formal conclusion of the whole matter, and a severe commination to all those who shall presume either to add or diminish any thing from this prophecy.

¹ That St John the evangelist was the author of the book of revelation, all the most ancient ecclesiastical writers were agreed, until Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, in his answer to one Nepos, another Egyptian bishop, who had revived the gross notion of Cerinthus, concerning the millennium, in order to evade the use which this Nepos had made of the Apocalypse, called in question its authority, by asserting that several of the ancients had disowned this book to have been wrote by any apostolic man; that Cerinthus had prefixed John's name to it, to give the better countenance to his dream of Christ's reign upon earth; and that, though it might be the work of some inspired person, it could not possibly be St John's, because its style, matter, and method, did by no means agree with his other writings. Now, whoever looks into the ancient writers of the church, will find that Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, who, according to ² Irenæus, had seen St John; Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, who, according to St ³ Chrysostom, was conversant with the apostles; Justin Martyr, ⁴ Irenæus, ⁵ Clemens ⁶ of Alexandria, and Tertullian, ⁷ authors all of the second century, are unanimous in their ascribing this work to the same hand from whence the gospel and epistles did proceed; and that therefore the opinion of one private doctor should not prevail against the authority of so many writers, who were either cotemporary, or nearly subsequent to the apostles. For, be it allowed that there is a diversity of style, yet does not every able writer vary that according to the nature of the subject he is upon? In history, the style should be simple; in epistles, familiar; and in prophecies, majestic and sublime; and therefore what wonder is it, if, in arguments so vastly different, the same person did not always observe the same tenor and way of writing? Nothing can be more different in their method and diction, than the book of Proverbs and the book of Canticles, and yet few have doubted but that Solomon was the writer of both: but now, that Cerinthus should be the author of a book which contains doctrines directly opposite to the errors which he broached, is a thing incredible. For, whereas Cerinthus did not believe that God made the world, or that Christ died, and rose again; the author of the Revelation ⁸ ascribes to God the work of the creation, and calls our blessed Saviour ⁹ the 'first begotten of the dead;' and whereas Cerinthus made Jesus merely the Son of Joseph, and a being different from that of Christ; the author of the Revelation calls him expressly ¹⁰ 'the Son of God,' and makes him ¹¹ one and the same person with Christ. Though therefore there may be some similitude between St John's expressions, and the notions of Cerinthus, in regard to Christ's reign of a thousand years, yet it had been much more prudent in Dionysius, to have given a spiritual sense and interpretation of these expressions, than to ascribe to a wicked and sensual man, as Cerinthus was, a book, which breathes nothing but piety and holiness, an awful dread of God, and a devotion such as the angels perform in heaven.

The truth is, all circumstances concur to entitle our apostle to be the author of this book. His name frequently expressed in it; his writing it in the island of Patmos, whither none but he was banished; his directing particular epistles to the seven churches of Asia, which had either been planted or cultivated by him, and his styling himself 'their brother and companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ:' these, and many more circumstances that might be mentioned, added to the doctrine contained in it, which is highly suitable to the apostolic spirit and temper, evidently bear witness, that this book was the work of St John, and consequently, of divine and canonical authority.

¹ Next to the Apocalypse, in order of time, are the three epistles, which St John wrote. The first of these is catholic, calculated for all times and places, and contains most excellent rules for the conduct of the Christian life, and for preservation against the crafty insinuations of seducers. The other two are but short, and directed to particular persons: the one to a lady of honourable quality; and the other to the charitable and hospitable Gaius, so kind a friend, and so courteous an entertainer, of all indigent Christians.

² Eusebius, and after him St Jerome, informs us, that St John, having perused the other three gospels, approved and confirmed them by his authority; but observing withal, that these evangelists had omitted several of our Saviour's actions, such especially as were done before the Baptist's imprisonment, he wrote his gospel in order to supply what was wanting in them: ^a and because at this time there were several heretics, such as Cerinthus, Ebion, and their followers, sprung up in the church, who denied the divine nature of Jesus Christ, another end of his writing was, to antidote the world against the poison of these heresies, by making it appear that our blessed Saviour was God from all eternity, and before his incarnation; ³ and that as other evangelists had written the series of his generation according to the flesh, he might write a spiritual gospel, beginning from the divinity of Christ: which was a subject reserved for him, as the most excellent person by the Holy Ghost.

When therefore the bishops of Asia, and several ambassadors from other churches, had been for some time soliciting him, he caused them to proclaim a general fast, to seek the blessing of heaven on so great and momentous an undertaking; and when this was done, he set about the work, and ^b completed it in so excellent and sublime a manner, that the ancients generally resembled him to an eagle soaring aloft within the clouds, whither the weak eye of man was not able to follow him: for, 'as the evangelical writings,' says ⁴ St Basil, 'transcend all the other parts of the holy scriptures, because in other parts God speaks to us by his servants the prophets; but in the gospels our Lord, who is God blessed for evermore, speaks to us himself: so among all the evangelical preachers none is like St John, the son of thunder, for the sublimity of his discourses, beyond any man's capacity duly to reach and comprehend.'

CHAP. V.—On Philo and Josephus.

(SUPPLEMENTAL BY THE EDITOR.)

It is proper that the reader should have some acquaintance with the general character and principles of the two highly respectable Jewish writers whose names are at the head of this chapter.

Philo, who is called Judæus, to distinguish him from Philo the Carpathian, lived when Christ appeared on earth. He is generally regarded as a Jew of Alexandria: from his own account, however, we learn that he was born at Jerusalem; and he doubtless repaired to that city occasionally to attend at the festivals. He was a man of distinguished family, and of great authority at Alexandria, being brother to Alexander Lysimachus, who was alibarch, or chief of the fiscal scribes, in that city; exercising an office which is supposed to have had the direction of the territorial revenue, and which was probably a situation of considerable rank, as his son married Bernice, the daughter of Agrippa.

⁴ Hom. 16. t. i.

^b His gospel was originally written in Greek, but in a Greek that abounds with Hebraisms, as do the other evangelists. His words are peculiar to himself, and his phrases used in an uncommon sense, which may possibly make his way of writing not so grateful to some nice masters of eloquence. In citing places from the Old Testament, though he sometimes makes use of the Septuagint, yet he usually translates from the Hebrew original, and generally renders them word for word: for being an Hebrew of the Hebrews, and admirably skilled in the language of his country, this probably made him less exact in his Greek composures, wherein he had no advantage besides what was immediately communicated from above. But what he wanted in the politeness of his style, was abundantly made up in the excellence and sublimity of his matter.—Cave's Life of St John.—One thing very remarkable in John's style, is an attempt to impress important truths more strongly on the minds of the readers, by employing, in the expression of them, both an affirmative proposition, and a negative. Thus: 'All things were made by it, (the word,) and without it not a single creature was made. He acknowledged and denied not, but acknowledged.' Pleonasm is very frequent in this gospel: 'This man came as a witness to testify concerning the light;' tautologies also, and repetitions. Thus it follows: 'He was not the light, but came to testify concerning the light.' Again: 'In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. This was in the beginning with God.'—Campbell's Preface to John's Gospel.—ED.

³ Whitby's Preface to St John's Gospel.

^a It is manifestly not without design that he commonly passes over those passages of our Lord's history and teaching, which had been treated at large by the other evangelists, or, if he touches them at all, he touches them but slightly, whilst he records many miracles which had been overlooked by the rest, and expatiates on the sublime doctrines of the pre-existence, the divinity, and the incarnation of the Word, the great ends of his mission, and the blessings of his purchase. This gospel may be truly said to interfere less with the rest than these do with one another: in consequence of which, if its testimony cannot often be pleaded in confirmation of theirs, neither is it liable to be urged in contradiction. It is remarkable also, that though this evangelist appears, more than any of them, to excel in that artless simplicity, which is scarcely compatible with the subtlety of disputation, we have, in his work, a fuller display of the evidences of our religion, on the footing on which it then stood, than in all the rest put together.—Campbell's Preface to John's Gospel.—ED.

and to have attained extensive and various information, and great knowledge of the scriptures of the Old Testament, which he read probably in the Septuagint version, not having, it is supposed, been acquainted with the Hebrew, being an Hellenist, and writing himself in the Greek language. He was a man of very eminent qualities, and highly revered; and a remark of his wife which is recorded, bears testimony to his worth, since, on being inquired of wherefore she did not wear ornaments, she answered, 'that the virtue of an husband was a sufficient ornament for a wife.'

He was deputed by the Jews of Alexandria upon an embassy to Rome, in the fourth year of Caligula, A. D. 40, or 41. The object was to counteract the calumnies of Apion, and to make a complaint to Caligula on the subject of a persecution excited against these Jews, for having refused divine honours to the statues of the emperors, while the rest of the world was submitting, with servile flattery, to adore a weak and depraved mortal as a god. Philo describes his reception by the emperor at a villa, which had belonged to Mecænas, near Rome. He was treated with a contemptuous levity, equally unbecoming the imperial dignity, and the venerable character of Philo. He, however, manifested his firmness, and upon the failure of his petition, turned to the Jews who accompanied him, and encouraged them by saying, 'Now Caius is against us, God will be with us.'

Eusebius and Jerome state, that during Philo's stay at Rome, he conversed with St Peter; and some have affirmed that he was converted to Christianity either by that apostle, or by reading the gospel of St Mark at Alexandria, and that he afterwards renounced the Christian faith.¹ These accounts have been disputed by the learned editor of the works of Philo, and it has been maintained that it is not probable that St Peter was at Rome so early as Philo's time, if at all, and that St Mark's gospel was not published till A. D. 45. Bryant, however, contends, that Philo's age is placed too far back when it is assigned to the time of Julius Cæsar, that he was a contemporary of the apostles, and lived so late as the reign of Nero; and that as St Mark came to Alexandria in 48 or 49, Philo had an opportunity of conversing with the apostle, and of seeing his gospel, which some suppose to have been published in 45.

In the works of Philo, we discover a great devotion to the Old Testament, but he sometimes follows a vague strain of allegory, particularly in interpreting the history of the temptation in paradise; he expected that all nations should be converted to the law of Moses; and conceived that the promises relating to Christ referred only to a temporal Messiah, describing him as a man, who, as the oracle foretold, should 'go forth warring and conquering, and who should subdue great and numerous nations.' Though he appears to have conceived that the divine could not be united to the human nature, he had nevertheless been led to form very just apprehensions, in some respects, of the eternal nature and attributes of the Logos, and to describe him as a real and acting being, 'the first begotten Son,' 'the express image of God, esteemed the same as God, the great Cause of all things, by whom all things were produced and disposed,'

"the person who visibly appeared to Abraham, to Jacob, and to Moses in the bush, the appointed mediator and intercessor for the sins of the world; the Word of the Supreme God, by whom a ransom and price of redemption of the soul may be paid."

Philo speaks also remarkably of the Holy Ghost, and styles him 'the all-wise Spirit, the divine power which breathed the breath of life into man, being sent from God for abode here, to the advantage of the human race, that if man be mortal as to the visible, he might at least be rendered immortal as to the invisible part.' He represents a prophet also as 'not manifesting any thing of his own, but as being an interpreter,—the divine Spirit coming upon and dwelling in him, impelling and directing the organism of his voice to a distinct manifestation of what the Spirit predicts.' Philo then, though he does not state an association and equality in the mysterious union of the Godhead, still must be allowed to have caught, either from the scriptures or from Plato, some outline of the doctrine of the Trinity; and he appears in one instance, if the present reading of the passage be adhered to, to represent the Logos as 'bearing the similitude of man, and as the shepherd of the holy flock.'

The observations, however, expressed by Philo upon these and other points of faith, and particularly upon regeneration and the divine grace, so much resemble what is communicated by St Luke and St James, and by the author of the epistle to the Hebrews, that we may suppose them to have been borrowed from the inspired writings, if we admit that these scriptures were produced sufficiently early for that purpose. We have seen indeed that Philo might possibly have conversed with St Mark, and seen his gospel; and if he had not any intercourse with the early disciples, he might at least have caught the distant reports of those preachers, whose sound went forth with rapid communication into all lands. On the other hand, it is attended with difficulties to suppose, that the testimonies to the word of Christ should have been presented to Philo, and not have been noticed by him. Many who like him imagined that the divine perfections could not be united to the flesh, maintained, as did the Nicolaitans, and afterwards the Gnostics, that the body of Christ was a heavenly substance, which assumed merely the appearance of the human form; it is probable, therefore, that Philo either did not hear, or was withholden by his belief in the perpetuity of the Mosaic dispensation, from receiving the witness of the evangelists, if brought before him. He was employed, however, by providence, indirectly to support the cause of religion, and to bear his suffrage to many doctrines communicated in the gospel; thus, for instance, he gives a remarkable account of Pilate, the Roman governor, being apprehensive that the Jews should send an embassy to Rome, to represent the crimes of his government, and the murder of eminent persons who had been condemned by him.

The attempts which are recorded in the Acts of the Apostles to have been made upon the life of Paul will be more readily accounted for, and the danger from which he was delivered be more fully understood, if we consider that the Jews were so blinded by bigotry and a persecuting spirit, that even Philo states it to be proper that all who had a zeal for virtue should have a right to punish, without delay, and with their own hands, those who forsook the worship of the true God, not carrying them before a court of judicature, or the council, or any magistrate whatsoever, but indulging the abhorrence of evil and the love of God, in the immediate punishment of those impious wretches; and from such principles might originate the custom among the Jews of making a vow not to eat and drink until they had killed the object of their religious abhorrence.

The writings of Philo, which abound with just sentiments eloquently expressed, furnish much that has a general claim to regard. He speaks of God, and of the worship and purity becoming his creatures, and describes the duties of life, and the rewards and punishments of sin, with great solemnity and effect. The elevation of his thoughts sometimes swells out his representations beyond a strict and literal accuracy. He bears, however, the testimony of an enlarged mind to the truth of revelation, and to the harmony and importance of its communications; and his works illustrate the providence of God, who at no time left himself without a witness, and employed in different ages and countries distinguished men to diffuse a light around them, which, however defective when compared with the brightness of gospel knowledge, served at least to open the minds of men for the reception of some preliminary convictions. Philo, by his wisdom and eloquence, attracted much attention at Alexandria to his writings, which were widely spread, excited doubtless a reverence for the Hebrew scriptures among many who were not acquainted with them.

With respect to JOSEPHUS, his character as an historian is entitled to very particular consideration, and the testimonies which he affords in support of Christianity have an especial claim to regard.

This eminent man appears to have been raised up by providence for purposes equally remarkable and important. He stands on a distinct ground between sacred and heathen writers, and his works afford most valuable illustrations of the divine authority of the scriptures, and of the truth of many facts on which the claims of religion rest. The attestation which he gives to the fidelity of the sacred accounts of the Old Testament, is so full, that he transcribes almost every part, with such variation as might naturally be expected from an historian who composes a work in his own style, but with an evident deference to the sacred writers, demonstrating the deep veneration for, and entire confidence in them. It has been alleged that he suppressed some miraculous circumstances, in accommodation to the opinions and manners of a people who differed in all respects so much from his countrymen; and that he was not himself sufficiently aware of the spiritual import of the Jewish dispensation, and of the figurative application of its prophecies. It does not however appear that he intended to withhold the proofs of the miraculous economy under which the Jews were governed in subjection to a theocracy. The detail of circumstances which he records, every where demonstrates the direction and support of providence, manifesting its interference, and exhibiting the signs of peculiar protection.

He mentions the frequent disclosures of the divine presence; the descent and ministry of angels conversing with the patriarchs and others; the miraculous deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt, and their support in the wilderness, with many subsequent indications of God's special direction; the descent of celestial fire on the altar, consuming the sacrifices; the permanent abode of a divine oracle, or source of illumination from which revelations were obtained by the high priest, by means of the Urim and Thummim, the operation of which was expected to be restored when the temple was rebuilt in the time of Nehemiah,¹ and which Josephus represents to have ceased two hundred years before he composed his antiquities.²

In treating of the declarations of God, which were prophetic, as relating to the Messiah, he sometimes generalizes what is particular, from not apprehending the import of the words now distinctly seen by those who have the veil of prejudice taken from their hearts. He qualifies, therefore, or omits that spiritual meaning which is included in the inspired promises: thus, in speaking of the first intimation of the Messiah, delivered by God at the fall in paradise, he interprets the divine threat, with respect to the bruising of Satan by the triumph of Christ, to imply only that men should direct their strokes against the serpent's head.

The works of Josephus consist of the Jewish Antiquities, the Wars of the Jews, his own Life, his books against Apion, and a few other smaller pieces. He was the son of Matthias, of sacerdotal extraction, and of royal descent, on the mother's side, she being of the Asmonean race. He was born at Jerusalem, A. D. 37, and died in 93. He appears to have been educated in strict adherence to the Mosaic law. He appears to have entertained some apprehension of the approaching termination of the Jewish dispensation, as he combated the opinions of his countrymen with respect to the necessity of circumcision, maintaining that every man should be left to serve God in his own way, and he seems to have expected the fall of Jerusalem. But whatever his religious persuasions were, he certainly established a high character by his judgment and attainments, so as to have been consulted at a very early age by those who had the direction of public affairs. He obtained stations of considerable authority, and was employed in many undertakings of great moment and enterprise, in which he displayed much activity and courage. His distinguished talents enabled him to record his own actions, and to transmit the memorial of them, with that of the history of his country, to after ages.

He went to Rome in the twenty-sixth year of his age, A. D. 63, and having been introduced by an Hebrew comedian to Pappæa the empress, he experienced much favour from her. On his return to his country, he obtained the command of some forces, and distinguished himself in the defence of Jolapata against Vespasian and Titus. When the place was reduced, he was not only pardoned at the intercession of Titus, but received into much consideration and favour with Vespasian, who took him to the siege of Jerusalem. Josephus, after beholding the accomplishment of the divine predictions, in the siege and destruction of that place, accompanied Titus to Rome, and obtained the freedom of the city, and an allowance from Vespasian, which he enjoyed for many years, employing his time in the study of the Greek language, and in composing his works. He wrote his history of the Jewish war at the command of Vespasian. Some think that it was first written in Hebrew; and Hebrew manuscripts, either of this original or of a subsequent version, are occasionally mentioned, one particularly that was in the Vatican. The work, however, was presented to Vespasian in the Greek language, and the emperor with his own hand wrote an order for it to be published; and it afterwards obtained the approbation of king Agrippa, Archelaus, and Herod. It was deposited in the public library at Rome, and a statue was erected in honour of the author.¹ It is indeed greatly to be admired for the striking and animated manner in which it describes the affecting scenes which the author beheld.

The Jewish Antiquities, which extend to twenty books, bring down the history from the beginning of the world to the twelfth year of the reign of Nero, when the Jews rebelled against the Romans. This work was finished in the thirteenth year of Domitian, A. D. 93. It is almost a transcript of the sacred history, written with the latitude of a paraphrase. The author introduces dates with more attention to chronology than is usual in ancient writers, but still with less accuracy than might be wished, as they do not correspond with the chronology of the Hebrew text or of the Septuagint version. It is possible, however, that the copies may have been mutilated, since they differ from each other in many points, as well as in chronology, and vary also from the accounts of other writers. The history of his own life, which seems originally to have been annexed to the Antiquities, is continued down to the reign of Domitian, who distinguished him for some time by his favour.

His two books against Apion were written after his Antiquities. Apion was a grammarian of Alexandria, who entertained great prejudices against the Jews, and made many misrepresentations concerning them, which were refuted by Josephus, who has preserved in his work some interesting fragments of ancient historians, which repeat or confirm many accounts in scripture. How many years Josephus lived after completing this work is not exactly known. It has been conjectured that he did not long survive his patron Epaphroditus, who was put to death by Domitian, A. D. 95, after which, it has been suspected, that the historian fell a victim to the malice of his enemies.²

Another work also, entitled the History of the Macabees, has been ascribed to him, but some writers attribute it to another Josephus.

Josephus, as an historian, is justly celebrated for his fidelity and correctness. If he admitted some relations of questionable character into his earlier accounts, and even intermixed them with particulars of sacred history, and also disagreed with other writers, yet upon an impartial judgment, he is entitled to the highest regard and respect; and Scaliger justly observes that it is more safe to believe him, not only as to the affairs of the Jews, but as to those of foreign nations, than any of the Latin writers, and that his fidelity and compass of learning are every where conspicuous. A great mass of information might be collected from the works of Josephus, in confirmation of the evidence of Christianity; it is intended, however, here to adduce only such particulars as occur on a general view of his writings.

These will be found to relate to the establishment of facts, as well those which illustrate the completion of prophecy, as those which tend to verify circumstances on which the credibility of the gospel depends. We shall not, however, insist much upon the many proofs which might be adduced from the works of Josephus, in confirmation of the prophecies of the Old Testament, relating to events completed before the time of Christ, since, as being a Jew, he may be supposed to have had a bias in favour of such prophets: he acknowledged as sacred all the canonical books of the Old Testament as now received by the protestant church; as, for instance, when he relates that Antiochus Epiphanes spoiled the temple, and put a stop to the constant practice of offering a daily sacrifice or expiation during three years and six months. The general picture of the corruption of manners among the Jews which Josephus has furnished, is full of interest, from the relation which it bears to the argument for the necessity of the divine mission of Christ, and of his interposition as a mediator.

The first particular which may be mentioned as demonstrating strongly the advantage to be derived from attention to the writings of Josephus is, that the historian appears to relate with minute and unusual accuracy and detail of dates, that Nehemiah, by unwearied perseverance, finished the rebuilding of Jerusalem, after three years and four months' exertion, in the twenty-eighth year of Xerxes, and in the ninth month. Again, although he seldom adverts to astronomical circumstances, he mentions an eclipse of the moon, which took place a little before the death of Herod the Great. By these chronological notices some most important points relating to the history of Christianity have been ascertained, as the explication of the seventy weeks of Daniel, the duration of our Lord's ministry, and the time of his death, in conformity to the prediction of the prophet. The historian, in describing Daniel's interpretation of the dream of Nebuchadnezzar, when he comes to the part which relates to the stone cut out of the mountain without hands, which was to break in pieces the iron, the brass, and the clay, the silver and the gold, and which is generally supposed to relate to the kingdom of the Messiah, speaks thus: "Daniel did also declare the meaning of the stone to the king, but I do not think proper to relate it, since I have only undertaken to describe things past, or things present, but not things future; yet, if any one be so very desirous of knowing truth as not to waive such points of curiosity, and cannot curb his inclination for understanding the uncertainty of futurity, and whether they will happen or not, let him be diligent in reading the book of Daniel, which he will find among the sacred writings."

Upon this intimation of the belief of Josephus in a prophecy relating to Christ, Havercamp observes, that it is not to be wondered at, that the historian would not meddle with things future, for he had no mind to provoke the Romans by speaking of the destruction of that city which they called the eternal city. Josephus admits that Daniel predicted that the Jews should be destroyed by the Romans. He was induced by some interested view to apply the prophecies relating to Christ to Vespasian, since he himself afterwards intimated that the Messiah was yet to come; and he endeavours to introduce a latitude of opinion upon the subject, by saying that interpretations go by fancy, some one way, some another, and that the Jews in the end came to suffer for their mistakes with the irreparable destruction of their country. The account which he gives of the twenty-two books of the canon, and of the conviction which the Jews entertained of the divine authority of those books, not in any case adding to or altering any part of them, is highly important. The circumstantial detail likewise which he recites of the translation of the Mosaic law, under Ptolemy Philadelphus, exhibits a proof of the care with which providence substantiated to heathen nations the authority of the Pentateuch, securing its distribution in a language generally understood long before the promulgation of the gospel.

The passages in which Josephus confirms the accounts of the evangelists are numerous; thus, for instance, the description which he gives of the Jewish sects, particularly of the Scribes and Pharisees, corresponds with what is stated of them in the gospel. He observes that the Pharisees asserted that God had decreed to put an end to Herod's government; which confirms the account given by the evangelist Matthew, that the chief priests and scribes, many of whom were Pharisees, declared that it was written in the prophets, that out of Bethlehem should come a governor, who should rule over the people Israel.

The dissensions, the incestuous marriages in violation of the laws of Moses, and the other abominable crimes of the family of Herod, especially their conduct with respect to Christ and the Baptist, and his disciples, drew down the divine vengeance, and effected the destruction of their house. The fate of Herod was distinguished by the most striking miseries; and his death was characterized by a malignity which preserved to the last the same spirit that had led him to murder the children of Bethlehem. Josephus states that not long before he expired, he sent orders through Judea, requiring the presence of all the chief men in Jericho, and he earnestly enjoined his sister Salome, and her husband Alexis, to kill them when he should die. The other accounts with respect to Herod and his successors accord with the circumstances of their reigns and characters, incidentally mentioned, or alluded to, by the evangelists. The historian informs us, that Herod, by his will, appointed Archelaus to succeed him in Judea, with the title of king, and assigned the rest of his dominions to Herod Antipas, as tetrarch of Galilee, and to Philip, with the exception of a small part given to Salome. The will was ratified in part by Augustus, and Archelaus was appointed ruler over Idumea and Judea, with the title of ethnarch, that of king being reserved till he should deserve it. He, however, soon assumed it, and Josephus, who admits the restriction imposed, nevertheless calls him "the king who succeeded Herod." The historian adds, that Herod Antipas continued tetrarch of Galilee till removed by Caligula, thus confirming the account of St Luke, that our Lord was sent to Herod, who himself was at Jerusalem at that time, because he belonged unto his jurisdiction:

and attesting the justice of the punishment inflicted upon the man who had dared to set at nought the Saviour of the world.

The history shows how fully the prophecy was accomplished, which declared that the sceptre should not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, till Shiloh come. This is considered by Prideaux to relate to A. D. 12, at which time Christ made his first appearance in the temple. According to Josephus, it was in the same year that Coponius was sent into Judea, to govern it as a Roman province. Julian seems to have considered the government as passed away from that time, since he states it as an objection to the Christians, that Jesus, whom they proclaimed, was one of Cæsar's subjects. The census was suspended on the reconciliation of Augustus to Herod, and afterwards completed when Archelaus was deposed, on the complaint of the Jews, who requested that Judea might be rendered a province, and, then, if the sceptre departed, the Shiloh was come.

Josephus mentions the government of Felix and that of Porcius Festus, and others, in a manner which concurs with the representations of sacred history, and the circumstances stated by the evangelical writers. He also relates in regard to that same Agrippa before whom Paul defended himself, that he was a man of great activity and experience, who had been appealed to upon disputes concerning the Jews. Josephus speaks of Pontius Pilate, and confirms the account of Caiaphas being high priest during his government. The evangelist Luke mentions that Pilate, when he knew that Jesus belonged to Herod's jurisdiction, sent him to Herod, the tetrarch of Galilee, who himself was at Jerusalem at that time; and it is deserving of notice, that Josephus alludes to the practice of Herod to go up to Jerusalem at the feast of the passover.

In the eighteenth book of the Antiquities, the following passage occurs: "Now there was about this time, Jesus, a wise man, if we ought to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works, a teacher of such men as receive the truth with pleasure. He drew over to him many of the Jews and many of the Gentiles; he was the Christ; and Pilate, upon the denunciation of the principal men amongst us, having condemned him to the punishment of the cross, they that loved him at the first did not cease (to love him,) for he appeared unto them alive again the third day; the divine prophets having spoken these, and ten thousand other things concerning him: the sect of Christians, so named from him, have continued until this day."¹

There appears to have been a strong disposition in some writers to consider this passage as spurious, though Fabricius represents it to have been in all the Greek and Latin editions and manuscripts which Bosius Bigotius and Lambecius examined; in a very ancient Hebrew version in the Vatican, but afterwards erased, as it was said, by the Jews; and in two manuscripts of an Hebrew version, spoken of by Robert Canute in the twelfth century. It has been objected against the passage, that it is not cited by Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Chrysostom, Origen, or Photius, even when some of these writers argue against the Jews; but the testimony was of less importance in early times than it may now be deemed; and it seems to be cited in a discourse, which some consider as genuine, addressed to Dioclesian by Macarius, who held an office of distinction in that emperor's court: it is referred to likewise by Jerome, by Eusebius in the most express manner, by Ambrose, Hegesippus and others.

It has however been urged, that the passage speaks in such clear terms of Christ, and with such apparent acknowledgment of some of his claims, that if it were genuine, the author must have been a believer in the divine authority of the gospel, since it admits that Jesus was Christ or Messiah, and attests his resurrection on the third day from the grave, in agreement with the predictions of the prophets. But in answer to this it may be observed, that Josephus could not omit all mention of Christ, without convicting himself of a manifest suppression of facts; and that, considering the passage as genuine, the historian may perhaps be understood to relate the account only as it was currently received, without intending to substantiate it, or allowing our Saviour to be the Messiah in the Christian construction of the word, but only to be the person known under that designation. Jerome cites the passage as speaking of him who was believed to be the Christ. Origen mentions a passage in Josephus, in which the historian spoke of Christ's discourse with the doctors in the temple, but the passage is not to be found in the works which are extant. The Jews accused the Christians of interpolating, and the Christians reproached the Jews for erasing testimonies to their cause.

The representation which Josephus gives of the destruction of Jerusalem verifies in the fullest and most circumstantial manner the completion of our Saviour's denunciations with respect to that ever memorable event: some particulars, in illustration of this fact, might be here produced, but the whole relation of Josephus is an exact and striking comment upon the prophecies of Christ; and nothing can be more interesting than to pursue the subject by comparing the specific declarations of our Lord with the history of their accomplishment. A spectator and an historian of the events, he verifies the completion of the divine revelation in every part, and while he thought, possibly, that he was describing only the fulfilment of the Jewish prophecies, he unintentionally substantiated the exact accomplishment of the denunciations of our Lord. He, and the writers who consent with him, inscribe a title in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, which, with whatever view it was written, is written, and declares that "Jesus is the King of the Jews."¹

SECT. II.

CHAP. I.—From the beginning of the second passover to our Lord's transfiguration; in all, one year and about four months.

THE HISTORY.

OUR Blessed Saviour was now in the second year of his public ministry, when the near approach of the passover, a which was the second after his baptism, called him to Jerusalem. On the south-east side of the city there was a famous pool, and an hospital called Bethesda, ^b which consisted of five porticos, in which lay a great multitude of poor impotent people, with distempers of all kinds, waiting for the moving of the water; for at certain times an angel came from heaven, and putting the pool into a fermentation, conveyed such a medicinal virtue into it, that the first person who entered it, after such commotion, was cured of whatsoever distemper he had. On

^a From the time that our Lord first began his ministry, to the conclusion of it, there had been four passovers held at Jerusalem; all, except the last, are not mentioned by the three first evangelists; but St John has been mindful to set every one down; the first, chap. ii. 13.; the second, chap. v. i.; the third, chap. vi. 4.; and the fourth, chap. xiii. 1.—Poole's Annotations.

^b The words of the text (John v. 2.) are 'Now there is in Jerusalem by the sheep-market a pool, which is called in the Hebrew tongue Bethesda having five porches.' The word market is supplied by the translators, there being an ellipsis in the original, but the most eminent modern critics, among whom are Bloomfield, Campbell, and Boothroyd, instead of sheep-market, render sheep-gate, and observe that this rendering is confirmed beyond a doubt by Nehem. iii. 1, 32, and xii. 39, where mention is made of the sheep-gate, and also that there is no evidence of there having been any such place there as the sheep-market. The word καταβήθρα signifies a bath or batting pool, as is evident from its etymology, but it would seem to denote here not only the pool, but the buildings connected with it. Bethesda, which is a Syro-Chaldaic word, signifies the house of mercy, or charity-hospital. "Some have supposed that the pool received its name because the sheep used for sacrifice in the temple were washed in it; and others, because it served as a kind of reservoir for the blood of the sacrifices. But it is well known that the sheep were washed as soon as they were bought in the adjoining market, from which they were driven to this pool; and the supposition that the blood of the sacrifices ran into it, which was Dr Pococke's opinion, is erroneous, when we know that there was a drain or ditch between this pool and the temple, over which a bridge was thrown for access to the latter. Besides, Dr Lightfoot has sufficiently proved, that from the situation of the sheep-gate, near which the pool of Bethesda stood, which was on the south-east wall of Jerusalem, a part of the city lay between it and the temple. The interpretation, therefore, the house of mercy, is more in unison with the design for which this pool or bath was constructed, and the purposes to which it was applied." "Tradition now points out this pool on the east side of the mount on which the temple stood, where there is an empty tank one hundred and twenty feet long, forty broad, and about eight feet deep, walled round with stones, but without water. This agrees with Maundrell's measurement, who surveyed it in 1696, and found at the west end three old arches built or choked up, which are said to be the remains of the five original porches in which sat the lame, blind, and withered of Jerusalem. Sandys was in Jerusalem on Good Friday, A. D. 1611, and says he saw the spring running, but in small quantities. The erection of the pool of Bethesda is ascribed to King Hezekiah. The following observations on it are given by the author of 'Letters from Palestine,' an anonymous work published in 1819:—'Towards the eastern extremity of the town, not far from the gate of St Stephen, is the Piscina d' Israel. This is the pool of Bethesda, in which an angel was commissioned periodically to trouble. It appears to have been of considerable size, and finished with much care and architectural skill; but I was unable to ascertain either the depth or the dimensions for its contiguity to the enclosure which contains the Mosque of Omar made it rather hazardous to approach even the outer borders, and our dragoman entreated us to be satisfied with a cursory view. Near to this place is the church of St Anna, so named from being erected on the ground where the house of the virgin's mother formerly stood, and where the virgin herself was born. Between that structure and Pilate's palace is the tower Antonia, which has a more striking air of antiquity than any in the city.—Scripture Gazetteer, part 4. art. Bethesda. p. 320. Edinb. 1836.—See more on this subject in Answers to Objections, next chapter. the sabbath-day our Saviour came to this place; and seeing a poor paralytic,^a who had been in that condition for the space of eight and thirty years. and lain there a long while in expectation of a cure, but all in vain, because, whenever the water was moved, some one or other always stepped in before, and prevented him;^b he immediately healed him with a word's speaking, and at the same time^c ordered him to take up his bed, and walk home; but while he was doing this, the Jews exclaimed against him for bearing a burden on the Sabbath-day,^d

^a The word ἀσθενία, which we render infirmity, or weakness, is indeed a general name for almost all distempers; but here it is so limited in its signification, by the circumstances occurring in the man's history, that it can properly denote no other disease than what we call a confirmed palsy. For, besides that the symptoms of no other distemper do so exactly agree with the description given of this infirmity, both in point of its long continuance, and extreme weakness; the very word weakness, in its most obvious sense, answers exactly to such a relaxation of the nervous system, as the palsy is known to be; and, what is no mean circumstance, our Saviour makes use of the same form, and method of cure, to this very man, that he applies to another paralytic, 'Rise, take up thy bed and walk,' Mat. ix. 6.

^b If it be asked, how it came to pass, that of the multitude of infirm people, who lay at this pool, our Saviour should think fit to cure but one? the answer is obvious, because he was an object most to be compassionated of any in the place, not only because he was too feeble to step into the water himself, and too poor to have any to assist him, but, more especially, because he had been now a long while in this condition, and yet still depended upon the good providence of God for an opportunity to be cured at one time or other. To cure at once whole multitudes, indeed, sounds more popular, and carries the face of a more extensive goodness; but, besides that our Saviour might, in this case, very probably conform to the rule of cure established providentially at Bethesda, which was, to heal but one person at one time, his great design, in every action of this kind, was to prove his character and commission from God, to which end one single and incontestible miracle was as sufficient an evidence as a thousand. The short is, since our Lord was at liberty to do what he would with his own, or to bestow his favours where he pleased, his goodness was conspicuous in choosing the most helpless object, and his wisdom no less manifest, in leaving the rest to the standing miracle of the pool.—Bishop Smallbrooke's Vindication of our Saviour's Miracles, p. 525.

^c It is very observable, that whenever our Lord did any miracle, he generally adjoined some circumstance or other, to denote the truth and reality of it. Thus, after his multiplication of the loaves and fishes, he ordered his disciples to gather up the fragments, which amounted to twelve baskets full. Upon his changing the water into wine at Cana, he commanded the servants to carry it to the ruler of the feast, for him to taste it. When he had healed the leper near Capernaum, he sent him to present his oblation in testimony of his cure. And here, for the same reason, namely, the demonstration of the completeness of his cure, he bids the paralytic take up his bed and go home. But why did he this on the sabbath-day? Even to make his divine power and mission more universally known, especially in Jerusalem, the capital of the nation, and centre of the Jewish church, by first working this miracle on the sabbath-day, when there were more people at liberty to view and consider it; and then sending his patient along the streets in a very uncommon manner, and to make the people more inquisitive, with his bed upon his back.—Cabnet's Commentary.

^d The sabbath was originally instituted as a day of sacred rest, and was to be employed in the service of God. Of this latter circumstance the Jews had so far lost sight, that they substituted their own superstitious rites in the place of divine ordinances, and thus exchanged a spiritual for a merely ceremonious observance of the day. Concerning some of the superstitions which prevailed among the people, M. Basnage thus speaks: "In the places where they had liberty, in Maimonides's time, they sounded the trumpet six times, to give notice that the sabbath was beginning. At the first sound the countryman left his plough, at the second they shut up their shops, at the third which was^e directly¹ contrary to their law. The man excused himself, by declaring that the person who had miraculously cured him, commanded him to do so, which he thought a sufficient warrant; but, when they understood that it was Jesus, they,^f brought him before the sanhedrim, with a design to take away his life, as an open profaner of the sabbath. Here, in defence of himself, he alleged,—That, "since God," from whose rest they took the observation of the sabbath, "did, on that day, and all others, exercise the works of providence, preservation, and mercy, there could be no reason why he, who was his Son, and invested with full authority from him, (as² he proves immediately in a set speech before the council,) might not employ himself on the sabbath, as well as any other day, in actions of the like nature;" which provoked the Jews still more and more against him, for they looked upon him now, not only as a sabbath-breaker, but a blasphemer likewise, who by they covered the pits. They lighted candles, and drew the bread out of the oven; but this last article deserves to be insisted upon because of the different cases of conscience, about which the masters are divided. When the sound of the sixth trumpet surprised those that had not as yet drawn their bread, what was to be done? To fast the next day was disturbing the feast: to draw their bread at the beginning of the sabbath was to violate it. The perplexity is great: some have not ventured to decide it, others have given leave to draw out what was necessary for the three meals of the sabbath. But this permission has caused abuses; for a multitude of people meet, who under pretence of drawing out the quantity of bread they have need of for their three meals, take out all that might be spoiled. The difficulty is increased if any one suffers his bread to bake after the sabbath is begun. If he has sinned knowingly, he must leave his bread there, and fast to expiate his fault. Nothing but ignorance is ground sufficient to permit them taking wherewith to subsist their family for twenty-four hours. But how is this bread to be taken out? They must not make use of a peal, but a knife, and do it so nicely as not to touch the stones of the oven, for that is a crime. Such are the questions that arise upon the entrance of the sabbath."—History of the Jews, p. 443. Similar superstitions are related by this author concerning other particulars which affect the Jews. See Stehelin's Traditions of the Jews, vol. ii. p. 263.—Ed.

^e The prohibition runs in these words:—"Thus saith the Lord, Take heed to yourselves, and bear no burden on the sabbath-day, nor bring it in by the gates of Jerusalem, neither carry forth a burden out of your houses on the sabbath-day, neither do ye any work, but hallow ye the sabbath-day as I commanded your fathers," Jer. xvii. 21, 22; and according to the Jewish canons, those who did this, were punishable, either by death or scourging. It must be acknowledged, therefore, that our Saviour's injunction to the late impotent man, was contrary to the letter of the law; but then it may be justly said, that it was not contrary to the sense and intention of it. The law only prohibited evil labour, and restrained men from carrying such burdens as they were wont to do in the way of their trade; but it did not forbid the doing of any thing that might be a testimony of God's mercy or goodness to mankind. As therefore the sabbath was made for the honour of God, and this action was a public monument of his mercy and power, the man, properly speaking, did not break the sabbath, neither did our Lord deserve any censure from the Jews, especially considering, that as he was a prophet, even by their own rules, he had power to require what was contrary to the ceremonial rest of the sabbath.—Poole's and Whittby's Annotations; and Cabnet's Commentary.

^f John v. 16. It certainly doth not appear from this verse, nor from any part of the chapter, that a meeting of the sanhedrim, or great council, was called for the purpose of trying Jesus for a breach of the law. They were probably members of that council who challenged him for what he had done, and with whom he condescended to reason; but it seems evident that he was not brought to trial for his offence.—Gleig making himself the Son of God,^a had claimed a equality with him.

What the result of our Saviour's defence before the sanhedrim was, we cannot tell, because none of the evangelists have acquainted us; but the sequel of the history informs us, that it no ways abated the malice of the Pharisees, because, on the very next sabbath-day, upon his disciples pulling some ears of corn,^b as they passed through the fields, rubbing them in their hands, and so eating them, because they were really hungry, they began again to clamour against this violation of the sabbath; until our Saviour, in vindication of his disciples, both from the example of David^c and his attendants, who ate the shew-bread;^d which it was un-

^a From hence it seems to follow, that though the Jews of our Saviour's time had very high conceptions of the Messiah, and were confident, that when he came, he would be a mighty prince, and subdue all other nations under his feet; yet they never once imagined that he would be God; or, in the strict and sublime sense of the word, 'the Son of God,' though in the very prophecies, which, as they themselves acknowledge, relate to the Messiah, he is called IMMANUEL, Isaiah vii. 14., and elsewhere, 'the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace,' Isaiah ix. 6.—Whitby's Annotations.

^b What our Lord's disciples did in this case, could not be accounted any unjust invasion of another's property, because the law had indulged them thus far:—'When thou goest into thy neighbour's standing corn, thou mayest pluck the ears with thy hand, but thou shalt not move a sickle to thy neighbour's standing corn,' (Dent. xxiii. 25.) It was not then for plucking the ears of corn, much less, as some say, for breaking their fasts, before they had celebrated the public offices, (which was contrary to the custom of the Jews, Acts ii. 15.) that the Pharisees took exceptions to the disciples, but for plucking them on the sabbath-day, whereof they thought this action, which at other times was lawful enough, to be a violation, and accordingly our Saviour's whole vindication of them turns upon this supposition.—Hammond's and Whitby's Annotations.

^c There is something very cogent in our Saviour's argument, taken from David's practice, because, according to the concession of the Jews themselves, his example contains two things tending to excuse the violation of the sabbath: 1. That they suppose, that David and his men fled on the sabbath-day, and yet were not guilty of breaking the rest of the sabbath; for "our masters think it lawful," say they, "in him whom the Gentiles, or thieves, pursue, to profane the sabbath, by the preservation of his life, even as David, when Saul pursued to kill him, fled and escaped." 2. That their own canons allowed the laity to eat of the shew-bread for the preservation of life; for "it is a small thing," say they, "to hold that it is lawful for us to eat of the bread removed from the table: it would be lawful for us, in the extremity of hunger, even to eat of the bread now sanctified upon the table, if there were no other." And indeed this opinion, that it was lawful to violate the sabbath for the preservation of life seems plainly to have obtained before the translation of the Septuagint, who render the words in Exod. xii. 16, to this purpose, 'Ye shall do no servile work on it, but that which shall be done for the safety of life.'—Whitby's Annotations.

^d The shew-bread, which in Hebrew is literally the bread of faces, was so called, not because it was set upon the golden table, which was in the sanctuary, but because it was placed 'before the Lord,' that is, not far from the ark of the covenant, which was the symbol of his more immediate presence. These loaves, according to the number of the tribes, were twelve: they were made four square, covered over with leaves of gold, and were of a considerable bigness, having about three quarts of flour in each. They were served up hot every sabbath-day, and, at the same time, the stale ones, which had been exposed the whole preceding week, were taken away, and allowed to be eaten by none but the priests, and that only in the holy place, which was the tabernacle at first, and afterwards the temple, (Lev. xxiv. 5, &c.) And the reason of this institution seems to have been to represent, in a more lively manner, to the people, God's government and presence among them; that, as the tabernacle first, and then the temple, was his palace and place of residence, so these weekly lawful for the laity to eat, when they were hungry, and from the example of their own priests, who performed the work of the temple on the sabbath-day, endeavoured to convince them, "that works of necessity were sometimes permitted, even to the breach of a ritual command; that acts of mercy^e were the best and most acceptable method of serving God upon any day whatever; that it was inverting the order of things, to suppose that man was made for the sabbath, and not the sabbath for the benefit of man: but, if even it were not so, that he, a Son of God,^f and, consequently, Lord of the sabbath, had a power to dispense with the ceremonial laws¹ concerning it.

Not long after this, our Saviour left Jerusalem, and returned into Galilee, where on another sabbath-day, while he was preaching, there stood before him a man, whose right hand was shrunk, and withered; and when

services of bread, wine, and salt, say the Jews, were to denote his habitation among them, as if he had been an earthly prince, for whom such provisions are made.—Calmet's Dictionary under the word, and Lamy's Introduction.

^e On the text here alluded to, 'I will have mercy and not sacrifice,' (Mat. xii. 7.) Doddridge has the following important note: "I must here repeat a very obvious remark, because the sense of so many important scriptures depends upon it, namely, that according to the genius of the Hebrew language, one thing seems to be forbidden, and another commanded, when the meaning only is, that the latter is greatly to be preferred to the former. The text before us is a remarkable instance of this; as likewise Joel ii. 13; Mat. vi. 19, 20; John vi. 27; Luke xii. 4, 5, and Col. iii. 2. And it is evident that Gen. xlv. 8, Exod. xvi. 8, John v. 13, and vii. 19; and many more passages are to be expounded in the same comparative sense. A late ingenious writer says, "our Lord does not compare moral and positive duties together here, but only the commandments of men with the commandments of God." But it is plain, the series of our Lord's arguments here is intended to prove that circumstances of necessity dispense with some ceremonial observances which were in the general commanded by God, and manifestly goes upon this foundation, that ceremonial institutes being the means of religion, if circumstances occurred in which they interfered with the end of it, they were suspended of course, and when this is the case, the conscience of particular persons is to judge as in the sight of God.—ED.

^f There are some who pretend to infer, from the passage of St Mark ii. 27, that the words in St Matthew, 'the Son of Man is Lord also of the sabbath,' chap. xii. 8, are of the same import with, 'the sabbath was made for man;' so that the Son of man is here put for all men in general, and, consequently, the sense of the words must be, that every one is lord of the sabbath, to observe or dispense with it, according to the call or exigency of his affairs. But besides that the phrase, 'Son of Man,' which is used no less than eighty-eight times in the New Testament, is, in all other places, set to denote our blessed Lord, and in Dan. vii. 13, from whence it is originally taken, it is thought by all ancient Jews as well as Christians, to signify the Messiah only; it is plain that those two passages are distinct propositions in St Mark, chap. ii. 27, 28, and that they can relate to no other than our Saviour Christ; because he tells the Pharisees, and therein means of himself, that, in that place, 'there was one greater than the temple,' that is, whose prophetic office was of more consequence to the world than the sacerdotal administrations in the temple, and ought therefore, least of all, to be interrupted by a superstitious observation of the sabbath. 'The sabbath was made for man,' must therefore signify, that it was first appointed for the good and benefit of man; and, being so, it cannot reasonably be supposed to oblige him to any thing so contrary to humanity as starving or debilitating his nature; and therefore, as 'the Son of Man came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them,' he must have power, in such cases as concern the good and welfare of mankind, to dispense with the strict rest of the sabbath which the law required.—Calmet's Commentary; and Hammond's and Whitby's Annotations.

the scribes and Pharisees insidiously watched him whether he would cure him or not, our Lord bade him stand up in the midst of the assembly as an object of public commiseration, and turning to these superstitious observers of the sabbath, put the question ^a to them, whether they ‘thought it lawful, on the sabbath-day, to do good or ill, actually to save life, or negligently to destroy it?’ And then, from their own practice, in running to the relief of any dumb creature on the sabbath-day, he fairly inferred, that whatever their hypocritical pretences might be, they themselves esteemed it lawful to do good on that day; and so, looking about him with some marks of indignation for their strange perverseness, he commanded the poor man to stretch out his lame hand, and that very moment it became as sound as the other.

The Pharisees, however, though silenced by his arguments, and surprised at his miracles, would not surcease their malice, but joined in consultation with the Herodians, though a sect quite opposite to them in principles, how they might take away his life; which when our Saviour understood, he withdrew with his disciples^b toward the sea-side; but which way soever he went, his name was now grown so famous, that vast multitudes, not only out of Galilee, but from Jerusalem, from the provinces of Judea, and Idumea^c and all the country about Jordan, as far as the Mediterranean sea, to the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, hearing the report of his miraculous power to cure all diseases with a word of his mouth, the touch of his hand, or barely the touch of his garment, came, with their sick and possessed, for help, and, as fast as they came, he cured them. Nay, to such a degree was his fame increased, that the very devils and unclean spirits publicly confessed that he was ‘the Son of God,’ till, upon all occasions, they were restrained and compelled to silence.

Finding some inconvenience in the pressures of the people, he ordered his disciples, for the time to come, to have a small vessel always in readiness for him to step into upon occasion; and so retired to a solitary mountain,^d where he continued all night in prayer, intending next morning to make an election of some particular persons, both to be witnesses of his actions and discourses, and, after his departure out of the world, his vicegerents upon earth, founders of his church, and propagators of his gospel.

The number of these, according to the patriarchs, was twelve; Simon, who is likewise named Peter, and Andrew; James,^e commonly called the Great, and John;

^a This is not contrary to what St Matthew, (xii. 10) tells us, namely, that they asked him, because both are true. They asked him, ‘whether it was lawful to heal?’ And he, in reply, says, ‘I also will ask you one thing: is it lawful on the sabbath-day to do good, or to do evil?’ (Luke vi. 9.) We are not however to suppose, that by doing evil our Saviour propounded to the Pharisees, whether, on the sabbath-day, it was lawful to do that which, on any other day, is utterly unlawful; for then, without doubt, they would have had a ready answer for him; but only, whether, according to the distinction of the sabbath, it was lawful to do good, or not to do it, to save life, or not to save it, when a man had it equally in his power. And the reason why our Saviour instances in saving a life is, because it was a maxim then among the Jews, that, on the sabbath-day, all servile work was prohibited, except where the life of any man or beast was concerned; but the modern Jews are of a contrary opinion, and in hatred to Christians, as Grotius thinks, have loaded the observation of the sabbath with such trifling and superstitious practices, as their forefathers and ancient doctors knew nothing of.—W’hitby’s and Beausobre’s Annotations, and Calmet’s Commentary.

^b It was a direction which our Saviour gave to his disciples, ‘when they persecute you in this city, flee to another.’ (Mat. x. 23.) and a rule which himself put in practice: for, when by his doctrine and miracles he could do no good upon men by reason of the hardness of their hearts, (Mark iii. 5.) he usually departed, and retired, that he might give place to their wrath, and secure himself from their malice, (Mat. xii. 15; and John viii. 59.) When the providence of God brings trials upon us, we may reasonably hope, that his mercy will be magnified in our rescue from them: but there is not the same assurance due to those troubles which our own forwardness or indiscretion involves us in. God hath no where promised to work miracles for our deliverance, nor engaged to save those who are not careful to save themselves. He hath commanded us ‘to take up our cross,’ when he lays it in our way; but he hath not commanded, that we should go out and seek it; nay, or that we should meet it, when we can pass by another way, and honestly, and with a good conscience, escape from it. He hath promised to succour them that are tempted, that is, such as are purely passive in the thing; but, when men break their ranks, and, without orders from their commander, will needs march up, as it were, to the mouth of a loaded cannon, by turning their own tempters, this is not courage, but fool-hardiness; and, whatever expectations these men may cherish of God’s assistance in such cases, they are not the effects of a vigorous faith and well-grounded trust, but of a blind and hot-headed presumption.—Stanhope’s Occasional Sermons.

^c Though this be no more than a Greek name derived from the Hebrew idiom, yet it is not to be understood of the original habitation of the Edomites, mount Seir, but rather of that southern part of the province of Judea, which, during the captivity of the Jews at Babylon, being left destitute, or not sufficiently inhabited by its natives, seems to have been possessed by the neighbouring Idumeans. These Idumeans, when afterwards conquered by the Maccabees, chose rather to embrace the Jewish religion than to quit the habitations they had taken possession of; and, though hereupon they were incorporated into the body of the Jewish nation, yet that tract of Judea which they inhabited did not so soon lose the name of Idumea, derived from them, but retained it, not only in our Saviour’s days, but for a considerable time afterwards.—Fell’s Geography of the New Testament.

^d Some have thought that the words ἐν τῇ προσευχῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ, should be rendered ‘in an house of prayer of God,’ or in a synagogue dedicated to the service of God; but then they will be concerned to find out any house of prayer which at this time stood on a mountain, or any place, except the temple, which was called by that name: nor can we conceive why our Lord should go into a mountain to pray, if it were not for the privacy and retirement of it, which he could not have had in any common place of divine worship. Our Saviour however, being about to send out his twelve apostles, thought that so great a work as this could not be done, without offering up his solemn addresses to God for their success, and accordingly having found out a place of retirement, he thither betook himself, and as the evangelists inform us, continued ‘all night in prayer,’ leaving the bishops and governors of his church an example what they are to do in the great and momentous affair of appointing persons to the ministry of the gospel.—W’hitby’s and Poole’s Annotations.

^e These two brothers our Saviour calls Banerges, a word composed of two Hebrew or Syriac words, but which have suffered some alteration in their passing into the Greek language. For whether it be that the Greek transcriber has mistaken them, or that this might be the corrupt way of pronouncing them in Galilee, certain it is, that the originals are benci rehem, denoting sons of thunder, or of a tempest; a name given to them in allusion to the natural heat and zeal of their temper, and that vehemence and efficacy wherewith our Saviour foresaw that they would preach the gospel. Of the former of these they gave an early instance, in their desire to call down fire from heaven to consume the Samaritans, (Luke ix. 54.) and, in the Acts of the Apostles, we find that Peter and John are the chief actors and speakers in the defence and propagation of the gospel, and that the zeal of James and Peter seems to be the reason why the one was slain by Herod, and the other imprisoned, in order to the like execution.—Calmet’s Commentary, and Beausobre’s and W’hitby’s Annotations.

^a The name given here to this apostle is not his proper but patronymical name, and imports only the son of Tholomew, or Tolmaj; so that we are still at a loss for his personal name, unless we will admit of the conjecture, that he was indeed no other than Nathanael. To this purpose it is remarkable, 1st, That as no other evangelist makes mention of Nathanael but St John, so he never once makes mention of Bartholomew. 2dly, That in the catalogue of the apostles, Philip and Bartholomew are always coupled together, and were, very probably, sent out together to preach the gospel: and fit companions they were, supposing Nathanael to be the man with whom it is plain that Philip had an intimacy, and was the first instrument of bringing him to Jesus. 3dly, That this Nathanael is by St John (chap. xxi. 2.) named in company with several of the apostles upon our Saviour's showing himself at the sea of Tiberias, after his resurrection, which the evangelist tells us was the third time of his doing so, (ver. 14.) and some presumption that he was one of them. 4thly, That, at the two former times, it is expressly said, that he appeared to the eleven. John xx. 19, 26. And here, at the third time of his appearance, those that are named with Nathanael are all of that number. From these considerations, it is more than probable that Nathanael was one of the apostles; which can only be accounted for by supposing that St John calls the same person by his proper name Nathanael, whom the other evangelist calls by his patronymical, Bartholomew.—Stanhope on the Epist. and Gos., vol. iv.

^b Thomas, in Hebrew or Syriac either, signifies a twin, and so is the same with Didymus, that other name whereby this apostle is sometimes called.

^c Simon, the cousin of our Lord, and brother of James the Less, is called by Mark 'the Canaanite.' But it is plain that the epithet does not express his descent, otherwise his brothers James and Judas ought to have been termed Canaanites likewise. Luke calls him Simon Zelotes, which seems to be the Greek translation of the Hebrew appellation given him by Mark. For from זֵלֹטִים zelotymus fuit, he was jealous, comes the Chaldaic word זֵלֹט, zelotes, a zealot. (Buxtorff, on the word). Put the Greek termination to this Chaldaic word, and it becomes zelotismos. Wherefore, the appellation of Canaanites, given to Simon by Mark, and Zelotes, the epithet which he bears in Luke, are as perfectly the same as Cephas and Petros, Tabitha and Dorcas. The zelots were a particular sect or faction among the Jews, who, in later times, under colour of zeal for God, committed all the disorders imaginable. They pretended to imitate the zeal which Phinehas, Elijah, and the Maccabees expressed in their manner of punishing offenders. But they acted from blind fury, or from worse principles, without regard either to the laws of God or to the dictates of reason. Some are of opinion that Simon the apostle had formerly been one of this pestilent faction. But as there is no mention made of it till a little before the destruction of Jerusalem (Josephus's Wars, b. iv. c. 3.), we may rather suppose that the surname of Zelotes was given him, on account of his uncommon zeal in matters of true piety and religion.—Macknight's Harmony.—Ed.

^d This man's surname may be taken, either from the place of his birth, which was Carioth, in the tribe of Issachar, whereof we have mention in Josh. xvi. 25, and Amos ii. 2, or from the Syriac word secariat, denoting the purse or wallet which it was the office of this Judas to carry; or from the word askara, or iscara, which signifies to strangle; and therefore a name which the evangelists might give him after his death: but all these etymologies are no more than mere conjectures.—Hammond's and Beausobre's Annotations, and Catnet's Commentary.

^e The wisdom of Christ saw fit to admit Judas into the number of his disciples, that by him the counsel of God, in giving up his Son to death, and the predictions of the prophets, might be fulfilled (Acts i. 16). This very person, however, is by our Lord sent to preach the gospel, to cure diseases, and to cast out devils, who had himself a devil, (John vi. 70.) thereby to teach us, that the mission of a person may be valid, though he be not sanctified; and that in things belonging to the ministerial office we should hearken even to such persons, and obey them.—Whitby's Annotations.

traitor. To these he gave the name of apostles,^f and as he perceived the multitude gathering round him, these he called nearer than the rest to him, and began that most excellent discourse, which comprises all the great principles of the Christian religion, and is commonly called the sermon on the Mount.

Herein he pronounces divers blessings, both spiritual and temporal, to such as the generality of the world esteemed miserable; to the poor in spirit, or humble-minded; to the kind and merciful; to the pious mourners; to the peace-makers; to the meek and patient; to the pure in heart; to such as hunger and thirst after righteousness; and to such as are persecuted upon the account thereof. Herein he instructs the apostles more

^f The word ἀποστολος signifies an envoy, and was a name given by the Jews to any messenger in general, but more especially to such persons as were sent by the high priest and heads of the people, to collect the tithes and other dues belonging to the temple or synagogue, or to carry their orders and mandates to the cities and provinces, when any affairs relating to religion were transacted; and to this custom St Paul seems to allude, where he styles himself 'an apostle, not of man, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ.' (Gal. i. 1.) Our Saviour indeed, as he was no lover of innovations, took the word from among the Jews; but then he raised it to a much higher and more honourable signification; for himself declares, that he sent out his apostles, even as his Father sent out him, (John xx. 21.) that is, with a full commission to act in his stead, even as he did in God's; and accordingly we may observe, that as the Father gave judgment to the Son, (John v. 22.) so in effect the Son gives judgment to the apostles, (Mat. xix. 28. and Luke xxii. 30.); that as the Father gave the Son power to forgive sins upon earth, (Mat. ix. 6.) so the Son gives power to the apostles to remit sins on earth likewise (John xx. 23.); that as the Father gave the Son the honour to sit down with him on his throne, so the Son gave the apostles the privilege to sit with him on thrones (Mat. xix. 28. and Luke xxii. 30); and that as the Father gave the Son to be the foundation or corner-stone of the church, (Mat. xxi. 42.) so the Son gave the apostles to be foundations upon a foundation; for so the church is said to be built upon the foundation of the apostles, 'Christ being the chief corner stone.' (Eph. ii. 20.)—Hammond's Annotations.

^g The mountain where our Lord delivered his discourse is generally supposed to be Tabor; for by comparing St Mark iii. 13, with the other two evangelists, Matthew xiv. 23, and Luke vi. 12, &c., we may perceive that it was not far distant from some part of the sea of Tiberias, whither our Lord had retired very lately from the Pharisees, and about five or six leagues from Capernaum, whither he returned after his descent from this mount. But then the question is, whether this sermon be the same with what we find recorded by St Luke, vi. 20? Now, in order to resolve this, we may observe, 1st, That the sermon in St Matthew was delivered before the healing of the leper, viii. 2; whereas St Luke, who promises to discourse in order of what Christ did, gives us first the story of the leper, (v. 12.) and then an account of Christ's sermon. (vi. 20.) 2dly, That the sermon in St Matthew, our Lord preached on the mount, and called his disciples up to him; whereas St Luke informs us, that our Lord came down with his disciples from a mount, and stood in the plain, and from thence preached what he recorded ver. 20. And, 3dly, That St Luke omits the much greater part of the sermon, as it is recorded by St Matthew, mentions only four beatitudes; whereas St Matthew speaks of eight, and has added four woes, (ver. 24, &c.) whereof we find no indications in St Luke. Since the sermons then are so very different in their matter, as well as in the circumstances of time and place, it is reasonable to suppose that they were not the same; though, considering that after both the sermons we find our Lord returning to Capernaum, and healing the centurion's servant, (Mat. viii. 5. and Luke vii. 1.) we may probably conjecture, that he spake the sermon in St Matthew, whilst he was sitting on the mount, to his disciples; but that in St Luke he afterwards spake when he came down into the plain (vi. 20.) in the audience of all the people. (vii. 1.)—Whitby's Annotations.

especially in their duty; and in several comparisons setting before them the high station wherein he had so lately placed them, and how much it would redound to their honour if they behaved well, and to their dishonour if otherwise; he recommends to them, above all other things, purity of life and conversation. Herein he expounds the true meaning, and shows the just extent of several moral precepts, namely, the laws against murder, against adultery, against perjury; that concerning retaliation, and that of loving our neighbour; and rescues them from the wretched glosses and interpretations which the Jews had put upon them. Herein he explains and teaches the proper method of performing with acceptance the several duties of charity to the poor, prayer and fasting. Herein he dissuades us from all covetous inclinations, and anxious thoughts concerning the things of this world, from a consciousness of our being under the providential care of God; and having laid down several other precepts and instructions, he concludes the whole with this admonition, 'That whoever heard, believed, and practised the things contained in his discourses, would, in the event, be like a wise builder, who laid the foundation of his house upon a rock, not to be affected by wind or weather; but that he who heard and practised them not, would be like a man who built his house upon the sand, soon to be blown down by the winds, and washed away by the floods.'^a

This sermon was delivered with such a grace and majesty, as gained the applause of the whole audience, and made them very readily declare their sense of the difference between such divine discourses, and the jejune harangues^b of their ordinary teachers, the scribes; and,

^a The words of the text, Mat. vii. 24—27, Bishop Jebb has arranged into two stanzas of six parallel lines each; thus,

Whoever, therefore, heareth these my words, and doeth them,
I will liken him to a prudent man,
Who built his house upon the rock:
 And the rain descended,
 And the floods came,
 And the winds blew,
 And fell upon that house:
And it fell not; for it was founded upon the rock.

And every one hearing these my words, and doing them not,
Shall be likened to a foolish man,
Who built his house upon the sand:
 And the rain descended,
 And the floods came,
 And the winds blew,
 And struck upon that house;
And it fell; and the fall thereof was great.

In these two connected stanzas, he observes, the language may be justly termed picturesque. The marked transition in each of them from a long and measured movement, to short rapid lines, and the resumption, at the close, of a lengthened cadence, are peculiarly expressive. The continual return, too, in the shorter lines, of the copulative particle (a return purely Hebraic, and foreign from classic usage) has a fine effect: it gives an idea of danger, sudden, accumulated, and overwhelming. These are beauties which can only be retained in a literal translation; and which a literal translation may exhibit very competently.—Jebb's Sacred Literature, vol. ii. p. 438.—In the above passage there is a manifest allusion to the rains of Palestine, which descend with great violence, and the torrents which they form sweep away often whole villages, the houses being generally constructed of sun-dried bricks.—Ed.

^b The words in the text are, 'he taught them as one that had authority, and not as the scribes,' (Mat. vii. 29.) But they certainly are mistaken who interpret the words in this sense:—'He taught them as the author of the doctrine which he preached; as one who had authority in his own name to propound the terms of life and death;' because it is not only contrary to the nature of his prophetic office, but to his own frequent declarations, to confirm his doctrine by the testimony of miracles, our blessed Saviour, upon his descent from the mount, healed a leper, and then remitted him to the priest, to make his oblation, in acknowledgment of his cure.

At his return to Capernaum he cured, at a distance, the favourite servant of the Roman centurion, ^c who had made an ample declaration of his divine power, and thereupon received from him as ample commendation of his faith; and, at his arrival at the gates of Nain, ^d he restored to life a widow's only son, as the people were carrying him out to his funeral, ^e to the great joy and comfort of his parent, and the no less wonder and astonishment of the spectators, who, upon this occasion, glorified God, and that "the doctrine which he taught was not his own, but his who sent him; and that he spake not of himself nor in his own name, but as he had heard from his Father, and as he had commanded him to speak" (John vii. 16, 17, 18; viii. 28; xii. 49; xiv. 10.); and therefore the truer interpretation is, what Lightfoot and others give us, namely, "That he spake as a prophet, having authority from God to deliver his message to them, and not as the scribes, who pretended only to deliver the traditions of their forefathers, and to teach them no more than what they had learned from Hillel, Shammai, Abtaion," &c.—Whitby's Annotations.

^c He was an officer, commanding an hundred men, much of the same rank and station as one of our captains, and belonged to the iron legion, as it was called, which was usually quartered in Judea.—Howell's History, in the notes.

^d Nain or Nain, so called for the pleasantness of its situation, was a town of Galilee, about two leagues from Nazareth, and not so much from mount Tabor, between which and the city ran the river Kison. From our Saviour's meeting the funeral coming out of the gates, we may learn, that it was a custom among the Jews to bury their dead in the day-time, when their nearest friends and relations followed the corpse, which was usually carried in procession through the streets and public places, to the cemeteries, which were generally at a considerable distance from the city, because they looked upon their graves as places full of pollution.—Whitby's Table of Places; and Cabnet's Commentary on Luke vii. 12. The raising of this young man, was one of the most decisive and instructing of our Lord's miracles. It was decisive. There was no doubt that he was dead. There could be no delusion—no agreement to impose upon the people. He came near to the city with no reference to this young man; he met the funeral procession, as it were by accident; and by a word he restored him to life. All those who had the best opportunity of judging, the mother, and friends, believed him to be dead, and were about to bury him. The evidence that he came to life was decisive. He sat up, he spoke, and all were informed with the full assurance that God had raised him to life. Many witnesses were present, and none doubted that Jesus, by a word, had restored him to his weeping mother. The whole scene was affecting. Here was a widowed mother, who was following her only son, her stay and hope, to the grave. Here was borne along one in the prime of life, and the only comfort of his parent—impressive proof that the young, the useful, the vigorous, and the lovely, may die. Jesus met them—apparently a stranger. He approached the procession, as if he had something important to say—he touched the bier, and the procession stood still. He was full of compassion for the weeping parent; and, by a word, restored the youth, stretched upon the bier, to life. He sat up, and spoke. Jesus therefore had power over the dead. He also has power to raise sinners, dead in trespasses and sins, to life. He can speak the word; and though in their death of sin they are borne along towards ruin, he can open their eyes and raise them up, and teach them to speak his power, and restore them revived to real life, to their friends. Often he raises up children in this manner, and gives them, converted to God, to their friends; imparting as real joy as he gave to the widow of Nain, by raising her son from the dead.—Barnes on the Gospels—Ed.

^e The Jews had different ways of carrying their dead to the grave. A child under a month old was carried out in the bosom of a person; if a full month old, in a little coffin which they carried in their arms; one of a twelve month old, was carried in a little coffin on the shoulder; and one of three years old on a bier or bed; in this manner was this corpse carried out. publicly declared, that ¹ ‘a mighty prophet was sprung up among them; and that God ^a had visited his people.

Upon the fame of this, and several other miracles, which our Saviour did daily, John the Baptist, who was still in prison, sent two of his disciples to inquire of him, ^b whether he himself was the promised Messiah, or some other person was to appear in that character? As our Lord was at that time working many miracles, ^c curing the deaf, the blind, the lame, &c., and instructing the people that were gathered about him; instead of giving a direct answer to their question, he bade them go and report what they saw to their master. And having thus dismissed them, he began to discourse to the people concerning John, giving a large encomium of the austerity and holiness of his person, ^d the greatness of his function, and divinity of his commission; and hence taking occasion to blame the perverseness of the age, in rejecting both his and the Baptist’s testimony, though the Baptist was a man of a mortified deportment, and he a person of a free and affable behaviour, so that ^e nothing would please them, he proceeded to upbraid the several cities where most of his miracles had been wrought, namely, Chorazin, Bethsaida, and more especially Capernaum, with their obstinacy and impenitence, and having declared that the mysteries of the gospel-revelation were better adapted to the humble and modest, than to the proud and worldly-wise, he concludes his discourse with an exhortation to such as were thus qualified to be his ² disciples, ‘come unto me, ^f all ye that labour, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest,’ &c.

cording to the age of persons was the company that attended them to the grave. If it were an infant not a month old, it was buried by one woman and two men; but not by one man and two women. If a month old, by men and women; and whoever was carried out on a bier or bed, many mourned for him. Persons well known were accompanied by great numbers of people. It was looked upon as an act of kindness and mercy to follow a corpse to the grave, and, what must have tended to increase the number of persons who attended at such a time, it was forbidden to do any work at the time a dead man was buried, even one of the common people.—En.

^a The people of Nain, in these words, acknowledge Jesus to be the Messiah, or that great prophet whom Moses had promised to the Jews: ‘the Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet, from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me, unto him shall ye hearken,’ Deut. xviii. 15; for they describe this prophet in the very same terms that Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, makes use of to denote the Messiah: ‘the Lord hath visited his people,’ Luke i. 68.—Calmet’s Commentary.

^b The words in the text are, ‘art thou he that should come,’ or rather, ‘he that is coming?’ For the prophecies of the Messiah in the Old Testament were so plain, and yet his person or name so unknown to the Jews, that they were wont to express it by some circumlocution, and more especially, by this of ὁ ἐρχόμενος, he that cometh; for so he is termed, Mat. iii. 11. xxi. 9. Luke vii. 20. xix. 38. John xii. 13. and Heb. x. 37, &c.; and this name they gathered from Habakkuk, where he is called, ‘he that shall come,’ chap. ii. 3; and from Daniel, where he is styled, ‘he that cometh with the clouds of heaven,’ chap. vii. 13.—Hammond’s and Whitby’s Annotations.

^c If it be asked, how the seeing of these things done by our Saviour could be a sufficient argument to John’s disciples, that he was in truth the Messiah? The reply is, that the performance of these things was exactly answering the character which the prophet had given of the Messiah, namely, that, ‘at the coming of God to save them, the eyes of the blind should be opened, and the ears of the deaf unstopped;’ that ‘the lame should leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb should sing,’ Is. xxxv. 4, &c. And therefore, instead of giving them a direct answer, which might be liable to the old objection of his bearing record of himself, (John viii. 13.) our Saviour refers them to the miracles they saw him do; miracles of the same kind that were predicted of the Messiah, and then leaves it to their own master to draw the conclusions from thence; which was a method of conviction more short and strong, and withal more agreeable to our Saviour’s modesty and great humility, than any long detail of arguments would have proved.—Poole’s Annotations, and Calmet’s Commentary.

^d Maimonides observes, that though the Jews generally reckon eleven degrees of prophecy; yet two of these were something more sublime and excellent than ordinary prophecy. The one of these was what they call gradus Moisaicus, when the prophet had a familiar converse with God upon all occasions, and the other, when he had his revelations, not from a dream or ecstasy, but an immediate dictate of the Holy Ghost. Of this sort was John the Baptist, who was plainly told by the Father, (Mat. iii. 17. John xiii. 3.); and as plainly proclaimed it to others, that Jesus ‘was the Lamb of God.’ Other prophets spoke of the coming of Christ, but then they did it in a dark and obscure manner. They saw him only at a distance in a dream, or in a vision of the night, and couched their predictions under a veil of enigmatical phrases, but the Baptist spoke of him openly and distinctly. He knew him; he was conversant with him; he pointed him out to the people; had, in short, the honour of baptizing him, and hearing the voice from heaven testifying of him, ‘this is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.’ And, upon these accounts, we find him called a great and illustrious person, (Luke i. 15.) one ‘filled with the Holy Ghost,’ and, by way of excellence, the ‘Prophet of the Highest,’ verse 76.—Hammond’s Annotations; and Calmet’s Commentary.

^e The words of our Saviour, to illustrate this, are these.—‘We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented,’ (Mat. xi. 17.) which seem to be a proverb, founded upon a custom among the Jewish children, to imitate what they saw done by others upon greater occasions, and particularly the custom in festivities, or funerals; when, in the former, as soon as the musician struck up a tune, the company began to dance to his pipe; and in the latter, as soon as some old women had begun the mournful song, the rest followed, lamenting and beating their breasts. These the children were used to act and personate in the streets at play; and when one had begun the musician’s part, and another the old woman’s part, and the rest did not follow them in theirs, this gave occasion to the proverbial saying which our Saviour applies to the present purpose, in this sense. ‘I and John have both of us invited you to enter into the kingdom of heaven, or to turn to God by repentance. John, by the austerity of his life, and I by my affability and courtesy, have endeavoured to recommend ourselves; but all to no purpose. You will neither mourn with him, nor laugh with me; but, for that very reason, censure and revile our different behaviour, accounting him, for his reserved temper, no better than a ‘melancholic kind of madman;’ and me, for my free and open conversation, a mere glutton and wine-bibber.’—Hammond’s Annotations; and Calmet’s Commentary.

^f ‘To come unto Christ,’ in the phrase of the New Testament, is to believe in him, and to become one of his disciples; and this invitation our Saviour gives to all mankind in general, and to the Jews in particular. To all mankind, forasmuch as all, without the knowledge of Christ, are heavy laden with the burden of their sins, and the calamities incident to life; are surrounded with a cloud of ignorance, and held in bondage through the fear of death; and to the Jews in particular, as they, under their dispensation, were oppressed with a load of ceremonies, ‘a yoke which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear,’ (Acts xv. 10.) besides the additional weight which the Pharisees laid upon them, by their traditions, ‘heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne,’ Mat. xxiii. 4.—Whitby’s Annotations; and Calmet’s Commentary.

^g Is it not a little strange, that any interpreters should ever imagine, that this is the same story with what we find related in Mat. xxvi. Mark xiv. and John xii; since the histories agree scarce in any thing, unless it be in bringing the alabaster box of ner; but while he was at table there happened an incident somewhat remarkable: for a certain woman, who not long before^a had been noted for a lewd liver, came into the house, and^b throwing herself at the feet of ointment, and anointing our Saviour's feet, which in these countries, especially at great entertainments, was no uncommon thing. But now the anointing, in the other evangelists, was done at Bethany, within two miles of Jerusalem; this in St Luke, in Galilee; that in the house of one Simon the leper; this in the house of one Simon a Pharisee; that but a little before our Saviour's passion: this a considerable time before it: at that, Judas was offended for the waste of the ointment; at this Simon for the woman's touching our Saviour: upon that occasion our Lord vindicates the woman from one head of argument, and upon this from another. So that all circumstances make it plain, that these were different actions, done by different persons, and at different times.—Poole's Annotations.

^a Who this woman was, the gospel no where tells us. We read indeed of three persons, who by several evangelists are said to have anointed our Lord's head and feet, namely, Mary Magdalene, Mary the sister of Lazarus, and this other woman, whom St Luke calls a sinner; and some commentators make these three to be one and the same person. It is to be observed, however, that the sister of Lazarus is all along represented as a person of great sobriety and virtue, who always lived at Bethany, was none of our Lord's attendants, nor ever came into Galilee; and consequently was a woman distinct from Mary Magdalene, who was of his retinue, (Luke vii. 2,) and from this other woman who anointed his feet in Simon's house: but whether this Mary Magdalene, and this woman, here called a sinner, might not be the same person, is not so easy to determine. The characteristic of Magdalene is, that she was the person out of whom our Lord had cast seven devils; but then, if the ejection of these devils he understood, as some will have it, in an allegorical sense, the words will well enough suit with the sinner in St Luke; or suppose they were real devils, the ejection of them might be some time before her coming into Simon's house, and, as our Saviour's vindication of her seems to imply, her reformation consequent thereupon, though Simon knew nothing of it. For these reasons some have imagined, that the sinner in St Luke and Mary Magdalene were both the same person; and that she was called Magdalene from the town and castle of Magdal, where her husband, who had been a man of great distinction, but then dead, had lately had his habitation. It must not be dissembled, however, that the most general and prevailing opinion is that these were two different and distinct women.—Calmel's Dissertation on the three Marys; and Hammond's Annotations.

^b On the passage here alluded to Dr Campbell thus observes:—To show that errors in translation, however trivial they may appear, are sometimes highly injurious to the sense, and render a plain story not only incredible but absurd, I must entreat the reader's attention to the following passage, as it runs in the common version: (Luke vii. 36. 38.) 'One of the Pharisees desired Jesus that he would eat with him; and he went into the Pharisee's house, and sat down to meat. And behold a woman in the city, which was a sinner, when she knew that Jesus sat at meat in the Pharisee's house, brought an alabaster box of ointment, and stood at his feet behind him weeping, and began to wash his feet with tears, and did wipe them with the hairs of her head, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with the ointment.' Now a reader of any judgment will need to reflect but a moment to discover, that what is here told is impossible. If Jesus and others were in our manner sitting together at table, the woman could not be behind them, when doing what is here recorded. She must in that case, on the contrary, have been under the table. The chairs, on which the guests were seated, would have effectually precluded access from behind. It is said also that she stood, while she bathed his feet with tears, wiped them with the hairs of her head, anointed and kissed them. Another manifest absurdity. On the supposition of their sitting, she must have been at least kneeling, if not lying on the floor. These inconsistencies instantly disappear, when the evangelist is allowed to speak for himself, who, instead of saying that Jesus sat down, says expressly that he lay down, ανεκλιθη. And to prevent, if possible, a circumstance being mistaken or overlooked, on which the practicability of the thing depended, he repeats it by a synonymous term in the very next verse. 'When she knew that Jesus

Jesus, washed them with the tears which flowed from her eyes, and then, having wiped them with her hair she kissed them and anointed them with very precious ointment.^c

Simon, who still retained something of the censorious spirit of his sect, seeing this woman thus busy in expressing her love and veneration for Jesus, began to think within himself, that^d he could not possibly be a prophet, otherwise he would have known the woman to be infamous, and consequently not suffered her to touch him; but our Saviour, who well understood Simon's thoughts, proposed to him a parable of a certain credlay at table,' ανακειται. The knowledge of their manner at meals makes every thing in this story level to an ordinary capacity. At their feasts, matters were commonly ordered thus: Three couches were set in the form of the Greek letter Π, the table was placed in the middle, the lower end whereof was left open, to give access to the servants, for setting and removing the dishes, and serving the guests. The other three sides were inclosed by the couches, whence it got the name of triclinium. The middle couch, which lay along the upper end of the table, and was therefore accounted the most honourable, and that which the Pharisees are said particularly to have affected, was distinguished by the name προποκλισια. (Mat. xxiii. 6.) The person intrusted with the direction of the entertainment was called αρχιτρικλινος. (John. ii. 8.) The guests lay with their feet backwards, obliquely, across the couches, which were covered, for their better accommodation, with such sort of cloth, or tapestry, as suited the quality of the entertainer. As it was necessary, for the convenience of eating, that the couches should be somewhat higher than the table, the guests have probably been raised by them three feet, and upwards, from the floor. When these particulars are taken into consideration, every circumstance of the story becomes perfectly consistent and intelligible.—Campbell on the Gospels.—ED.

^c That it was a customary thing among the ancients, especially at great entertainments, to use ointments and costly perfumes, appears from several authorities. The psalmist plainly informs us, that this was the custom of the Jews, when in acknowledgment of God's great bounty to him, he declares, 'Thou hast prepared a table for me; thou hast anointed my head with oil, and my cup shall be full;' (Ps. xxiii. 5.) The scholiast upon Aristophanes acquaints us with the same custom among the Greeks, when he makes it a rule that they who invite to an entertainment should bring forth to their guests crowns and ointments. And that among the Romans the like usage prevailed, is evident from that sharp, jocular epigram in Martial b. iii. 'I confess Master, that thou hast given the guests plenty of ointment, but no victuals have they tasted, it is an inconsistent thing for a man to have scented locks and a hungry belly—yes, Fabullus, he who is supperless and perfumed seems to me something like a corpse.'—The general custom indeed, upon these occasions, was, to anoint the head, and very seldom the feet: but, besides that the latter was a token of more humility, and no less esteem in this woman, she could not perhaps have an opportunity of coming at our Saviour's head, without giving some disturbance to the company.—Hammond's Annotations.

^d Though the Jewish religion permitted harlots of their own nation to enjoy all the privileges of other women, except that their oblations were rejected as impure, yet the Pharisees, who pretended to a greater degree of sanctity than others, would not admit them to civil usage, or the common benefits of society, and thought religion itself, and the honour of every prophet concerned in this preciseness. This was the reason of Simon's making this objection within himself. But therein he draws three false conclusions: 1st, That had Jesus been a prophet, he must have known what the woman was; as if prophets knew every thing, and were able to look into the secrets of the heart. 2dly, That as this woman was a sinner, our Saviour should not have suffered her to touch him; as if the external touch of a person engaged in any vicious course could communicate pollution to one that was innocent. And, 3dly, That this woman, whom he knew to be a sinner some time before, was still in the same condition; as if it were not in the power of God at any time to touch the heart, and in a moment to inspire sincere repentance.—Calmel's Commentary.

itor who had two debtors, one of whom owed him ten times as much as the other, but because both of them were insolvent, he frankly forgave them both; and then, gaining from him a confession, that the debtor to whom the larger sum was forgiven, would, in gratitude, be bound to love the creditor most, he turned to the woman, and, by way of application, not only apologized both for her behaviour and his own, but reproached his host likewise, for having omitted some instances of respect and civility which this contemptible woman, as he esteemed her, had abundantly supplied. And therefore, in return for such uncommon kindness, he gave her a full pardon and absolution of her sins, which some in the company seemed to resent, as an invasion of the divine prerogative; but that gave him no manner of uneasiness.

Upon his leaving Nain, he made a progress, for some months, round other parts of Galilee, accompanied with his apostles, and several devout women, whom he cured of sundry diseases, and who, in gratitude, attended his person, and, out of their own substance, administered a to his necessities: till returning at length to his own city Capernaum, such multitudes of people, upon the rumour of his being come again, resorted to him, that neither he nor his disciples could find time to eat. But 'his meat was to do the will of God,' by healing the sick and relieving the oppressed; and therefore, as soon as a poor demoniac, both blind and dumb, was brought before him, he immediately restored him both to his speech and eyesight, insomuch that all who saw it were greatly astonished, and, with a general voice, declared that the person who did such wonderful works could be no other than the promised Messiah.

The Pharisees, however, and doctors of the law, who came from Jerusalem, gave another turn to this miracle. They ascribed it to the power of the devil, b even to Beelzebub, c the chief of the devils; and therefore our a It was customary, says St Jerome on Mat. xxvii. 55, among the Jews, for women, and especially for widows, to minister necessities to their teachers; and this without any scandal or imputation upon their honour. Our Saviour lays it down as a general rule, that 'the labourer is worthy of his hire,' (Luke x. 7.); and the apostle accounts it no more than justice, that they who sow to others spiritual things, should be allowed to reap their carnal things. (1 Cor. ix. 11.) Of what condition or quality these women were that attended our Lord, we are not told. They might be virgins, widows, or wives, who had an allowance for themselves from their husbands: however, it could be no injustice done their families, to give unto him, who was Lord of all that they and their husbands possessed; and who, though he was rich, yet, for our sakes became poor, that we, through his poverty, might be rich.' (2 Cor. viii. 9.)—Whitby's and Poole's Annotations.

b That which made the Pharisees thus calumniate our Saviour's miracles, was their finding the people induced by them to believe that he was the Son of David, (Mat. xii. 23.) which was but another word for the Messiah, the king of the Jews. For, though they might have some apprehensions, that if this belief obtained, it might possibly bring the power of the Romans upon them (John xi. 48.); yet their chief fear was, that the greatness of his miracles and excellence of his doctrine would put an end to their credit and authority among the people, since they were conscious to themselves, that they could not vie with him in either.—Whitby's Annotations.

c By several passages in the gospel it seems evident, that the Jews at this time had a notion of a kind of empire, and subordination among the infernal powers, and that the prince of this empire was called Beelzebub. Beelzebub signifies properly the god of flies; but why a name of so mean an import should denote the head of the apostate angels, is not so easy a matter to determine, unless we will admit of this conjecture, namely, that as the people of Ekron had an idol which they styled Beel-samen, that is, the God of heaven, by other nations called Jupiter Olympius, the Jews, who used to give nicknames, or names of contempt, to all false gods, called it sometimes Beelzebub, or the god-fly, because these heathens worshipped it under the figure of that insect, and sometimes Beelzebub, or the god of ordure, because some sort of flies delight to feed on excrements. However this be, it is certain that the apostles, in several places of their writings, seem to insinuate, that among the apostate spirits there was one superior to the rest, whom therefore they call 'the prince of darkness,' (Luke xxii. 53.) 'the prince of this world,' (John xii. 31.) and 'the prince of the power of the air,' (Eph. ii. 2.) who, in the days of Tobit, went under the name of Asmodeus, (c. iii. 8.) and is now by the Jews generally called Sammael, and by the Christians Lucifer.—Beausobre's Annotations, and Calmet's Commentary.

d The argument which our Saviour employs against the Jews upon this occasion is what we call ad hominem. He supposes, as they did, that among evil spirits there was a form of government, which was to last unto the end of the world, and in it a certain subordination, which made it subsist; and from this principle he argues, "that it was impossible that an empire divided against itself should last long; incongruous to think, that a prince, who knew his own interest, would send part of his forces to engage his own generals, and compel them to surrender to the enemy what they had lately taken from them; and therefore a thing utterly incredible, that the prince of the devils should give orders to other inferior devils to quit the bodies which they had taken possession of, and consequently that he should expel any in the name or by the authority of Beelzebub."—Calmet's Commentary.

e That it was customary among the Jews to cast out devils by the invocation of the name of the Most High, we may learn from Justin Martyr, who, in his dialogue with Trypho, tells him, "that if any Jew exorcised a devil in the name of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, perhaps he would obey him?" from what Irenæus tells us, namely, "that by the invocation of the name of God, even before the advent of our Lord, men were saved from evil spirits, and all kinds of demons;" and from what Origen (contra Cels.) affirms, namely, "that the name of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob being used by the Jews, in the incantation of devils, did great miracles;" and if this was a common practice among the Jews, then will the force of our Saviour's argument be this: "You make no doubt, but that your exorcists, who use the name of God, do eject devils by virtue of that name; and how partial is it then in you, to pass an unjust censure upon me, in whom you see far greater evidences of the finger of God, in my casting out all manner of evil spirits, and healing all kinds of diseases?"—Whitby's Annotations.

A. M. 4035. A. D. 31; OR, A. M. 5440. A. D. 29. FROM MAT. xii. 1—xvii. 14, MARK ii. 23—ix. 14. LUKE vi. 1—ix. 37. JOHN v. 1—vii. 1.

ulous and obdurate, more impure and wicked, more hypocritical and blasphemous than they were before, would bring upon them too a more lamentable destruction.”

All this, however, hindered not the Scribes and Pharisees from demanding of our Saviour some new sign or miracle in evidence of his mission; but as he had given them a sufficient number of these already, he only referred them to one, that would not come to pass till after his death, namely, that of Jonas, whose deliverance from the whale's ^a belly, after three days' confinement was an eminent type of his resurrection, after as long a continuance ^b of his body in the bowels of the earth: and thence he took occasion to remind them, “that the inhabitants of Nineveh, ^c a pagan city, and also the queen of Sheba ^d should rise up in judgment ^e against that generation, and condemn it, because the former repented at the preaching of Jonas, and the latter took a vast journey to partake of the benefits of Solomon's wisdom; whereas they refused to hearken to one who was incon- testibly ^f greater than either Jonas or Solomon.”

^a The word in the original signifies not a whale, but any large fish; and some naturalists are of opinion, that it was not a whale, whose gullet is too narrow for that purpose, but rather that the Greeks call the lamia, or dog-fish, as we showed elsewhere, whose throat is more capacious, that swallowed up Jonah; however, this fish may either have been the lamia, as was supposed, or the shark, both of which are found in the Mediterranean. Whales do not inhabit that sea.—ED.

^b But how can our Saviour be said to have continued as long in the grave, as Jonah did in the whale's belly, when there were no more than two nights, and one whole day, between his death and his resurrection? Now for a resolution of this, we must observe, 1st, That the Hebrews began their computation of a natural day from the evening or night preceding; so that, from one sunset to another sunset, they reckoned a complete day, even as Moses does, when he says, ‘the evening and the morning were the first day,’ Gen. i. 5. 2dly, That it is a common thing with them, as well as other nations, to put part of a day for the whole; so that, whatever is done in any part of the day, is properly enough said to be done on that day: and, 3dly, That they usually reckon that to be done in so many days, or so many days and nights, which begins in any part of the first, and ends in any part of the last day. Now, allowing this manner of computation, and reckoning that the first day began on Thursday at sunset, and ended upon Friday at sunset; since our Saviour died on Friday about three in the afternoon, by putting a part for the whole, here we have one day. Saturday is allowed on all hands to be another; and, since the third day began on Saturday at sunset, and our Saviour rose on the morning following, that part of the day being likewise put for the whole, is fairly computed for the third. The Hebrew child, according to law, was to be circumcised the eighth day, but then the day of its birth and of its circumcision, were both counted; and, in like manner, if we reckon the day on which Christ died for one, and that on which he rose for another, including withal the night belonging to the former, we may properly enough say, that, in imitation of the prophet Jonah, ‘he was three days and three nights in the heart of the earth.’—Whitby's and Hammond's Annotations, and Bishop Kidder's Demonstration, b. i. c. 8.

^c This city is generally supposed to have been built by Nimrod, was situate upon the river Tigris, and famous once for being the metropolis of the first, that is, the Assyrian empire.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^d Sheba, or Saba, is a province of Arabia Felix, lying to the south of Judea, and on the extreme part of the continent, and, being bounded by the ocean, is therefore said to be ‘the utmost part of the earth.’—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^e This is spoken in allusion to a custom among the Jews and Romans, which was, for the witnesses to rise from their seats, when they accused criminals, or gave any evidence against them.—Beausobre's Annotations.

^f Since God had promised Solomon, that as there was none like him before him, so after him none should arise like him for wisdom, (1 Kings iii. 12.) our Saviour's declaring that in this respect he was greater than Solomon, must be plainly avowing himself to be more than man.—Whitby's Annotations.—Our Lord chooses on this occasion rather to insinuate, than to affirm the dignity of his character; and to afford matter of reflection to the attentive among his disciples, without furnishing his declared enemies with a handle for contradiction.—Dr Campbell.—ED.

^g The words in the text are, ‘his mother and his brethren,’ Mat. xii. 46; but as the word brethren, according to the language of the Jews, (Gen. xxix. 12; Lev. x. 4.) is of great latitude, these brothers are supposed to be either Joseph's sons by a former wife, and so our Saviour's brothers-in-law, or the children of Mary, the wife of Cleophas, and so his cousins-german. There is, indeed, a tradition in the church, that before his espousing the virgin Mary, Joseph had another wife, whose name was Ischa, by whom he had six children, four sons, James, Joseph, Simon, and Jude, and two daughters, whose names, some say, were Esther and Thamar, others Mary and Salome. But whoever compares Mat. xiii. 55—xxvii. 56. Mark xv. 40, and John xix. 25, together, will find, that the four persons there said to be our Saviour's brothers, were the sons of Mary, the wife of Cleophas, (or Alpheus, for the name is all one,) and sister to the blessed Virgin; and so these brothers of his, as we said, were no more than his cousins-german. Others, however, strenuously maintain the former opinion, namely, that Mary the mother of Jesus was their mother, that is, their stepmother, and they consequently his brothers-in-law; and that, 1st, because this opinion retains the proper signification of the word brothers, in which the Jews always seem to use it, when they speak of our Lord's brothers and sisters: and 2dly, because it agrees with the sense of antiquity, which, ever before St Jerome's time, (says the learned Pearson,) looked upon them as the brothers of our Lord, who lived with his mother, and are therefore so frequently found together, Mat. xii. 46. John ii. 12.—Calmet's Commentary, and Beausobre's and Whitby's Annotations.

^h We have another speech of our Saviour's, much of the same import with this. For when a certain woman in the company, upon hearing his excellent doctrine, broke out into this exclamation, ‘blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps which thou hast sucked!’ his reply is, ‘yea, rather blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it,’ (Luke xi. 27. 28.) for ‘whoever shall do the will of my Father, who is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother,’ (Mat. xii. 50.) which texts do not derogate any thing from the honour truly due to the blessed virgin, as the mother of the Messiah; but only show the folly of some who exalt her above Christ, whom, considered only as his mother, Christ himself seems here to set beneath every true believer; though, considered as a believer likewise, she has a just title to pre-eminence; and it is by that she is infinitely more happy than if she had only been his mother according to the flesh.—Chrysostom, hom. 45; Calmet's Commentary, and Pool's Annotations.

parables, an usual way of instruction among the Jews, but what he had not practised before, thereby to engage the attention, and accommodate himself to the capacity of those that heard him. By the parable of the sower, he represented the different successes of the gospel, according to the different dispositions of its hearers; by the tares growing among the good seed, the mixture of the wicked and godly under the same profession of Christianity; by the grain of mustard seed, and the little piece of leaven, the wonderful increase and propagation of the gospel from small beginnings; by the treasure in the field, and the pearl of great price, the inestimable benefits that would accrue to the true professors of religion; but that the profession of it would include a mixed multitude, and be therefore like a net cast into the sea, which incloses fishes of all kinds, some good and some bad, the good to be preserved, but the bad cast away. This is the explanation which our Lord gave his disciples of these several parables; and when, by their answer, he perceived that they understood them all, he concluded his discourse with one similitude more, namely, that 'every gospel-teacher ought to resemble a well furnished house-keeper,^a who brings all things out of his repository, both old and new, according to the occasions of his guests.'²

He had not continued long in Capernaum, before he resolved to cross the lake or sea of Galilee, and to that purpose had ordered his disciples to prepare a vessel for him: but just as he was going on board, a certain scribe^b came, and offered to attend him wherever he

^a And what this house-keeper was in his own family, that should every minister of the gospel be in the church of Christ. He should be thoroughly instructed in the word of God, and capable of amassing a plentiful provision of all knowledge, both sacred and profane. 'To bring out of his treasure,' or store-house, 'things new and old,' was a kind of proverbial saying among the Hebrews, and denoted a man's giving a plentiful or liberal entertainment to his friends, and such as came about him. And therefore, as the householder, if a man of substance and sufficiency, of a large stock, and as large a mind, will entertain his friends and guests with plenty, and variety of provisions, answerable to the difference of men's palates, as well as to the difference of the seasons; so our gospel-scribe, or teacher, in the entertainment of his spiritual guests, is not always to set before them only the main substantials of religion, whether for belief or practice, but, as the matter shall require, to add also illustration to the one, and enforcement to the other, sometimes persuading, sometimes terrifying; and accordingly addressing himself to the afflicted and desponding with gospel lenitives, and to the hard and obstinate, with legal corrosives; and, since the relish of all is not the same, he is to apply to the vulgar, with plain familiar similitudes, and to the learned, with greater choice of language, and coolness of argument, and so suit his discourses to the various circumstances, tempers, and apprehensions of his hearers.—Calmet's Commentary; and South's Sermons, vol. iv.

^b What might possibly be the motive of this scribe's offering to attend our Saviour, the conjectures of commentators have been different. Some think, that he did it with a sincere desire to become his disciple; others, with a design to turn spy upon him; some, out of a spirit of vanity, to distinguish himself, by being a retainer to a master in so great reputation among the people; others, out of a principle of self-interest, that he might obtain some post of honour and advantage, upon our Lord's advancement to his kingdom. This, indeed, seems to be the most probable ground of his resolution; and accordingly the design of our Saviour's answer is to discourage him from being his disciple upon such secular views, 'The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his own head,' (Mat. vii. 20.) and therefore much less any accommodation or prospect of preferment for his followers.—Calmet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^c It is generally supposed that Luke has given this branch of the history, chap. ix. 57, but it appears to be a very different passage. For here Jesus was beside the sea of Galilee; there he was passing through Samaria. Here a scribe being present, when he ordered the disciples to carry him to the other side, offers to accompany him; there one comes running to him, as he travelled on the road, and of his own accord said that he would follow him. It is true, the answer given to both was the same; but it might easily be so, on supposition that the men had the same sentiments and dispositions. Sir Isaac Newton, however, supposing with most harmony writers, that the two evangelists are speaking of the same transaction, thinks that Jesus was now crossing the lake in his way to the feast of tabernacles, mentioned John vii. 2. But the circumstances both of time and place, distinctly marked by the two historians, overturn his hypothesis entirely.—Macknight's Harmony, vol. i. 180.—Ed.

^d The words in the text are, 'Let the dead bury the dead,' (Mat. viii. 22.) which is a form of speech common in all sorts of authors, when in the same place they use the same words twice, though very frequently in different senses. Thus the psalmist, speaking of God, says, 'with the froward thou shalt show thyself froward,' (Ps. xviii. 26.) even as Moses introduces God speaking of himself, 'if ye walk contrary to me, I will also walk contrary to you.' (Lev. xxvi. 23, 24.) where the words froward and contrary, as they relate to God, denote the punishments which he intended to bring upon the obstinate, and are the rather used, because the same words went before. And, in like manner, 'let the dead bury their dead, but follow thou me,' may signify, 'let others bury the dead; thou hast work of more consequence to do.' It must not be dissembled, however, that by the dead, both sacred and profane authors do frequently mean, not only those who, in a natural sense, are dead, but those likewise who in a spiritual sense are so, by being 'alienated from the life of God, and dead in trespasses and sins.' Thus Clemens of Alexandria tells us, that the philosophy of the barbarians called those dead, who deserted their doctrines, and subjected their minds to sensual pleasures, which Philo calls the death of the soul, entombed in passions and all manner of wickedness. And therefore the full import of our Saviour's words must be, 'Let those who are unconcerned for the things of God, and unfit to engage in promoting them, perform such offices, which they can do as well as others; but thou who hast begun to follow me, and to attend upon the kingdom of God, go on with resolution, and without allowing thyself any avocation from that work;' hereby teaching us, that they who are called to the preaching of the gospel, and the salvation of souls, should not suffer any earthly business, which may be done as well by others, who are unfit to be employed in spirituals, to give them the least impediment or molestation.—Hammond's and Whitby's Annotations.

^e 'To put the hand to the plough,' is a proverbial saying not only among the Greeks and Hebrews, but many other nations, and denotes in general the beginning of any enterprise. This our Saviour applies to spiritual husbandry; and thereby gives us to understand, that as he who undertakes to plough, should not look behind him, for fear of making his furrows crooked or unequal; so he that engages in the ministry of the gospel should not suffer himself to be encumbered with much serving about other matters, but, in the language of the apostle, 'forgetting those things that are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Jesus Christ.' (Phil. iii. 13, 14.)—Whitby's Annotations, and Calmet's Commentary.

A. M. 403. A. D. 31, OR A. M. 6410. A. D. 29. FROM MAT. xii. 1—xvii. 11. MARK ii. 23—ix. 14. LUKE vi. 1—ix. 37. JOHN v. 1—vh. 1.

While the ship was under sail, and Jesus asleep in the stern, there arose a most terrible storm, so violent and impetuous that the whole ship was almost swallowed up by the waves. Hereupon his disciples, in great consternation, awoke him; and when he arose, at his rebuking the waves, they obeyed his command, and immediately composed themselves into a profound calm, ^a to the no small astonishment of every one that saw it.

The next morning, as our Lord landed on the east side of the lake, in that part of the province of Trachonitis, ^b which is called 'the country of the Gadarenes,' ^c two demoniacs, ^d most grievously distracted, with some

^a The stilling of the raging of the sea was so peculiar a prerogative of God (Ps. lxxxix. 9. and cvii. 25, 29.) that it is not at all to be wondered that our Saviour's disciples should be convinced of a divine power residing in him who was able to do this with the breath of his command.—Whitby's Annotations.

^b This country, which is so called by the Greeks from its rough and craggy mountains, together with Iturea, made in our Saviour's time one tetrarchy, that is, one fourth part or rather division (for they were not equal parts) of the kingdom of Herod the Great when he died. It was anciently called Argob, (Deut. iii. 13.) and, according to the best account, is bounded to the east by Arabia Deserta; to the west, by Batanaa; to the south, by Iturea; and to the north by the country of Damascus; and as it was a province full of rocky hills, which served for an harbour to a great number of thieves and robbers, it often found employment for Herod the Great, as we may see in the history of Josephus, to expel them.—Wells' Geog. of the New Test., and Whitby's Table.—The singularly rocky country described by Burekhardt, on the south of Damascus, called El Ledja, corresponds in a remarkable manner with Trachonitis, as described by Josephus and Strabo.—Ed.

^c This, in St Matthew, is called the country of the Gergesenes, because it lay in the neighbourhood of the two cities, Gadara and Gergesa, which were both situated within the district of Decapolis. Gadara, which took its name from the tribe of Gad, to whom it fell by lot in the division of the land, was a famous city beyond Jordan, the capital of Parea, as Josephus (Jewish War, b. v. c. 3.) tells us, and stood eastward of the sea of Tiberias, about sixty furlongs from the shore. Gergesa was a place of some importance likewise, according to the same historian; and the adjacency of these two towns made the evangelists call the country that lay between them sometimes by one name and sometimes by another.—Wells' Geog. of the New Test.—Gadara was one of the ten cities of the Decapolis; and, according to an article in the twenty-sixth volume of the Quarterly Review, which uses the authority of Mr Bankes, is at present found under the name of Oomkais: where are extensive ruins, and numerous caverns on the east side of the hill, which are the ancient tombs; in many of which Burekhardt found sarcophagi. This traveller expresses himself doubtful as to what city these ruins belong: his editor, however, considers Oomkais to be Gamala; and that Gadara was situated at the hot springs at the foot of the hill. Mr Buckingham has given a very good description of this place; mistaking it, however, as appears, for Gamala.—Mansford's Gazetteer, p. 178.—Ed.

^d There is some difference between the evangelists in their account of this cure: for whereas St Mark (v. 2.) and St Luke (viii. 27.) take notice only of one demoniac, St Matthew (viii. 28.) makes mention of two. Now, to reconcile this seeming difference, Dr Lightfoot ingeniously conjectures that one of these two was a Gergesen, and a Jew, and so in casting the devil out of him, our Lord did no more than what he had frequently done in Judea; but the other a Gadaren, that is, one of an heathen city, as Josephus testifies; for which reason St Mark and St Luke take chiefly notice of him, as a more remarkable instance, because he and the Syrophenician woman were the only two heathens we read of that our Saviour cured. But there is a farther reason for the evangelist's taking notice of one rather than the other, and that is, that the one, in his behaviour, was more remarkable than the other; was possessed of an unclean spirit, called himself legion, and could not be bound with fetters or chains; went about naked, and cutting himself with poor rags about them, came running towards him, and fell at his feet, and worshipped him. Hideous spectacles were they both; but one, much fiercer than the other, made dismal outcries both day and night, and cut his flesh with sharp stones; and though he had been often bound with fetters and chains, yet he as often broke them to pieces, ranging, with his companion, among the rocks ^e and tombs, and so very furious and outrageous, that no traveller durst pass that way. Upon their approach to Jesus, the devils who spake by their mouths, declared him to be the Son of God, and expressed their fear of his being come to ^f torment them before their time. They acknowledged their number to be vastly great, and, if he cast them out of the possessed persons, implored him to suffer them to enter ^g into stones; and when he was cured, distinguished himself, by desiring to follow Christ: circumstances all which St Matthew omits, but St Mark and St Luke have particularly related, and, upon these accounts, might very likely think that he fell more properly under their consideration than the other.—Whitby's and Beausobre's Annotations.

^e The tombs which the evangelists here mention are said to be in the mountains, and in the wilderness. For the custom of the Jews was, to have their tombs, like so many little cells, cut out in the sides of caverns, and hollow parts of rocks and mountains, at some distance from their towns, and usually in very lonely and desert places: "hence they often served as places of shelter to the houseless wanderer, or such poor wretches as lepers or demoniacs, who were driven from human habitations; places indeed which might seem not unsuitable to the latter, since the ancients supposed that evil demons hovered about sepulchres."—Dr Bloomfield.—Mr Buckingham tells us that the account given in the gospel of the habitation of the demoniac out of whom the legion of devils was cast, struck him very forcibly while wandering among savage mountains and surrounded by tombs, still used as houses by individuals and even by whole families. A finer occasion for expressing the passions of madness in all their violence, contrasted with the serene virtue and benevolence of him who went about continually doing good, could hardly be chosen for the pencil of an artist; and a faithful delineation of the rugged and wild majesty of the mountain scenery on the one hand, with the still calm of the lake on the other, would give an additional charm to the picture.—Buckingham's Travels.—Ed.

^f St Jerome, upon the passage now before us, is apt to imagine, that as slaves, who have a long while run from their master, no sooner see his face, but they bethink themselves of the punishment which they have deserved; so the devils, finding our Saviour upon earth, thought at first sight that he was come to judge and condemn them; and therefore they ask, 'Art thou come hither to torment us before the time?' that is, before the time of the last judgment, when they expect no other than to be eternally punished, or, as the scripture expresses it, 'to be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone for ever.'—Cabnet's Commentary.

^g In Luke viii. 31, it is said, that 'the devils besought him that he would not command them to go out into the deep.' The word βυσσος, rendered deep, signifies, in this passage, the place where wicked spirits are punished; as it does likewise, Rev. xx. 3, where it is translated the bottomless pit. Properly it denotes a place without a bottom, or so deep that it cannot be fathomed. The Greeks described their Tartarus in this manner; and the Jews, when they wrote Greek, did not scruple to adopt their expressions, because they were universally understood. Besides, the Hebrew language did not furnish proper words for these ideas, which was the reason that the first Christians also, when they had occasion to speak of the state of evil spirits, made use of terms purely Greek, such as ἄδης, ταρταροσσος, &c. (See 2 Pet. ii. 4.) Mark says the devils begged that Jesus would not send them out of the country. To explain this circumstance, some pretend that particular genii preside over particular regions, founding their opinion on Dan. x. 13, 20. And because the prophet speaks there of angels contending with one another, and of Michael's assisting one of the parties, a herd of swine that were feeding on the mountains not far off. Accordingly he permitted them: whereupon the whole herd, to the number of two thousand, ran violently upon the rocks, and casting themselves headlong into the lake, were all drowned and utterly lost.

The keepers of the swine fled in the utmost fright, and reported this strange accident in the city of Gadara and the neighbouring villages, which brought great multitudes to the place, where they found the man, who had been the more furious of the two, sitting at our Saviour's feet, clothed, and in his perfect senses. But, whether it was that they took amiss the destruction of the swine, or thought themselves unworthy of his divine presence, so it was that they intreated our Lord to depart out of their country; which accordingly he did; ^a but, instead of permitting the man, out of whom he had cast the most devils, to go along with him, as he desired, he ordered him ^b 'to return to his house, and his friends, and there to declare what wonderful things the Lord had done for him.'

As soon as our Lord had repassed the lake, and was returned to Capernaum, the people came flocking about him as usual; and, while he was teaching them, one Jairus, ^b a chief ruler of the synagogue, falling prostrate

(ver. 13.) they think the war was waged between good and bad genii. For as kingdoms and provinces are supposed to be committed to the care of benign tutelar powers, so the evil genii have their provinces assigned to them by their chieftain, in which they are to do all the mischief they can to mankind. Pursuant to this hypothesis, its abettors fancy that the band of evil spirits which tormented these miserable men were stationed in this part of the country to oppose Christ, and so begged that they might not be expelled, thinking they could do more mischief here than elsewhere. But whatever be in this, certain it is, that by making such a request, the devils acknowledged that it was not in the power even of a legion of them, to do any mischief to so contemptible a creature as a swine without Christ's permission, far less could they destroy the man in whom they lodged. The whole of this history teaches us to rely on the providence of God, and not to live in fear of evil spirits. They are under the strictest restraint, and cannot hurt us without the divine permission.—Macknight's Harmony, vol. i. 188—Ed.

^a One reason, as some imagine, why this man desired to be with Christ, was his fear lest the devil, at his departure, might seize upon him again; and it was partly to avoid the suspicion of vain glory, whereof our Lord might have given some umbrage, had he carried about with him all those upon whom his greatest miracles were wrought, and partly to show, that in his absence he was able to protect such as believe and trust in him, from the malice of evil spirits, that he would not accept of his company.—Whitby's Annotations.

^b Some learned men are of opinion, that this ruler of the synagogue was the president of the consistory of the twenty-three judges, who were appointed in every city to punish such offences as were not capital; but it is more generally thought, that he was not a civil magistrate, but a leading man in the synagogue of Capernaum, who had, in a great measure, under his direction such things as related to the service of God. We are to observe, however, that the word ἀρχισυναγωγος is sometimes taken, in a strict sense, for the person who was the president, the head and master of the synagogue, who, according to this acceptance, was but one; and, at other times, in a larger sense, so as to comprehend the presbyters, and elders likewise, in which sense the rulers of the synagogue were more than one. How many they were, is no where defined because that depended upon the largeness of the city, and the number of those who frequented the place of divine worship; only we may observe, that Jairus was not the chief president, because he is called 'one of the rulers of the synagogue,' (Mark v. 22.)—Fringia de Regim. Synag. h. ii. c. 11; Cabnet's Commentary, and Hammond's and Whitby's Annotations.

at his feet, humbly besought him to come and cure his daughter, who was at the point of death; not doubting but that, if he laid his hands upon her, she would instantly recover. The forwardness of the ruler's faith claimed our Saviour's compassion and assistance; and therefore he immediately rose, and followed him: but, as he was on the way, and pressed with great throngs of people, a certain woman, ^c who had been diseased with an unnatural flux of blood for twelve years, and, in hopes of a cure, had in vain spent all her estate upon physicians, being now confident, that if she could but come to touch the hem ^d of his garment, she should be healed, pressed forward; and having got a touch of it privately, as she thought, found herself perfectly sound. But she was not unknown to Jesus; and, therefore, when he, perceiving that ^e 'virtue was gone out of him,' turned about in the throng, and demanded who it was that ^f had touched

^c The case of this woman was a very afflicting one: 1. Because of the nature of her malady; it was such as could not be made public, without exposing her to shame and contempt. 2. It was an inveterate disorder; it had lasted twelve years. 3. It was continual; she appears to have had no interval of health. 4. Her disorder was aggravated by the medicines she used—she suffered much, &c. 5. Her malady was ruinous both to her health and circumstances—she spent all that she had. 6. She was now brought to the last point of wretchedness, want, and despair; she was growing worse, and had neither money nor goods to make another experiment to procure her health. 7. She was brought so low by her disorder as to be incapable of earning any thing to support her wretched life a little longer. It has been said, and the saying is a good one, "man's extremity is God's opportunity." Never could the power and goodness of God be shown in a more difficult and distressful case. And now Jesus comes and she is healed.—A. Clarke on Mark v. 23.

^d Mark ix. 20. This woman having probably been a constant witness of the many wonderful miracles wrought by Christ, was convinced that he was a divine person, and that every thing belonging to him was sacred: and therefore, as, according to the custom of the eastern nations, to kiss the fringe of any consecrated robe, (Arabian Nights, vol. iv. p. 236.) was an act of the most profound reverence, so by touching the hem of our Saviour's garment she was persuaded that she should not only pay him the greatest respect, but dispose him to pity her, and heal her disease; which was instantly done. The garment of Christ, in consequence of the humble appearance which he made upon earth, was not ornamented with that striking appendage which usually adorned the borders of the eastern garments, a beautiful fringe. Had his garment been in the prevailing fashion of the east, the woman probably would have been represented as touching the fringe of his garment, instead of its hem.—Ed.

^e Hence it is evident, that the virtue, whereby our Saviour did these miraculous cures, was not communicated to him, but resided in him, and consequently proves that he was God. For the virtue whereby the prophets and apostles did their cures is ascribed to God: as when it is said, that 'God did special miracles by the hand of Paul, (Acts xix. 11.) but the miracles done by Christ are imputed to 'the virtue which went out of him, and healed all that sought to touch him,' (Luke vi. 19.) 'The virtue's going out of him,' however, is a popular expression, which must not be taken in its literal sense, as if it were a quality distinct from the person of Christ, and what might pass from him to another; because the divine power residing in him was incapable of any alienation or diminution, be the cures he performed ever so many, ever so miraculous; and therefore the only meaning of the expression must be, that it went out, with regard to us, or according to our conceptions and apprehensions of things, when it discovered and manifested itself in the cure of some disease, or any other outward effects.—Whitby's Annotations, and Cabnet's Commentary.

^f Our Saviour's disciples, we find, admired at his asking this question, (Mark v. 31.) but the reason for his doing so, we may suppose, was to discover to the people the greatness of the miracle, which, without this examination, might have gone off without him? The poor woman came trembling, and falling down at his feet, declared to all the company, both the cause and miraculous effects of her touching him, which he was so far from blaming, that he commended her faith, and imputed her cure to the wonderful strength of it.

During this transaction, the delay proved fatal, as one might imagine, to Jairus; for a message was brought him, that his daughter was actually dead, and therefore there was no occasion to give Jesus any farther trouble; but our Saviour, who overheard what the messenger said, bid the father not fear, but only believe, and then he should find the blessed effects of his faith in the recovery of his daughter: but he had scarce spoke these words, when approaching the house, he found the musicians ^a and mourners already come, who were deploring her death with melancholy tones and loud lamentations, according to the custom of those times. He desired them however, as he went in, to cease their funeral ceremonies, because at that time, ^b there was no occasion for them; and so, with the young woman's parents, and Peter, and James, and John, going into the chamber, he approached the bed where she lay, and taking her by the hand, commanded her to arise; at which powerful word she immediately revived, and walked round the room, to the no small amazement of her parents. At his departure, he ordered them to give her something to eat, and left a strict charge with them that they should make the miracle a secret; but their joy was too great to conceal what, being known; to show them the strength and virtue of the woman's faith and confidence in his power; and thence to convince Jairus, who began a little to stagger in his faith, that he was able to revive his daughter, even though she was dead, if he did but believe.—Calmel's Commentary, and Beausobre's Annotations.

^a In all the books of the Old Testament, there is not the least hint given us of any musical instruments employed in funerals. We read indeed of a good deal of mourning for the dead, of mourners hired on purpose, and of the dismal ditties which these people sung, to excite sorrow in others: but the use of music was reckoned an incongruous thing, and nowise comporting with the solemnity of this sad season. Among heathen authors there is frequent mention made of it, as a thing long in use, both with the Greeks and Romans; and therefore we may presume, that from these nations it was that the Jews borrowed, and adopted it into their funeral ceremonies. That among them it was in use in our Saviour's time, at least among persons of the better rank, is plain from the passage now before us: that it was an established custom in the time of Josephus, is evident from his own testimony; and that it grew into a kind of superstitious use, in the times following, is evident from what the rabbins enjoin, namely, that none, even of the meaner sort, should, at the funeral of a wife, have fewer than two flutes, besides the voices of old women, who, by their sad modulation, were to extort lamentation from others.—Selden's Uxor. Hebr. b. iii. c. 8. Hammond's Annotations, and Calmel's Commentary.

^b The reason which our Saviour gives for this, is,—That 'the maid was not dead, but asleep,' (Mat. ix. 24.) Now, in several places in the New Testament especially, death is called a sleep, (John xi. 11. Acts vii. 60. 1 Cor. xv. 6. &c.) and therefore our Saviour only makes use of this word of a softer signification, not so much with a design to impose upon those to whom he directed his speech, as to testify his humility, and great modesty, in his desire to conceal his divine power. The persons he spoke to were certainly those who were preparing for her interment, and performing the funeral rites belonging to it; and therefore he only intimates, that she was not so dead as they accounted her, that is, not to come to life again before the resurrection; but that her death was no more than what he could remove with the same facility as another might be awakened out of sleep.—Whitby's, and Poole's Annotations.

in gratitude for so great a mercy, they thought they were obliged to divulge.

In his return from Jairus, our Lord was followed in the streets by two blind men, imploring his aid, who, as soon as he had entered the house, came after him, and when he had cured them, were dismissed with a strict charge to conceal the miracle, which, out of the abundance of their joy, they could not do. And no sooner were the blind men gone, but the people brought to him a dumb man possessed with a devil, which when he had cast out, the person immediately recovered his speech, to the great astonishment of the multitude, who unanimously acknowledged that the like had never been in Israel; only the Pharisees persisted in their old malice, and insinuated to the people, as formerly, that he ejected devils by the help of some supreme devil, who had the rest under his control, and with whom he was confederate.

After a short stay at Capernaum, our Lord departed, with his disciples, into some other parts of Galilee. About a year before, he had been barbarously treated by the inhabitants of Nazareth, the place of his education; and yet, notwithstanding this, he was resolved once more to make them a fresh tender of mercy. To this purpose he went into their synagogue on the sabbath-day, and taught the people; but, instead of being converted to the faith, though they were astonished at his abilities, they were scandalized at his person, and began to upbraid him with the meanness ^c of his parentage and employment, as they had done before; insomuch, that being sensible that ^d 'a prophet never wanted honour but in his own country,' he did not abide with them long: nor did he work any miracles there, except the cure of a few sick persons; by reason of their infidelity. ^e

Upon his departure from Nazareth, he visited most of the cities and villages of Galilee, teaching in the synagogues, preaching the gospel, and curing all kinds of diseases among the people; and as he observed, one day, the numerous throngs and multitudes that resorted to him, he looked upon them with an eye of pity and compassion, as so many sheep dispersed and destitute of shepherds; and from thence formed a resolution to ^c The word πικρὸν is of general signification, and denotes any worker, either in wood, metal, or stone; but the tradition of the church has all along been that our blessed Saviour was, what our translation has specified, a carpenter; and Justin Martyr assures us, that he made ploughs and yokes, which at that time were the carpenter's business. However this be, it is certain that by the Jewish canons, all parents were bound to teach their children some trade: that their most celebrated rabbins thought it a great reproach not to be of some profession; and that there was a peculiar reason, why our Saviour should be of one, and that no very liberal one neither, even to take off all suspicion of his being bred up in curious arts, which his enemies at all times were forward enough to say, notwithstanding the disadvantages of his education.—Beausobre's and Whitby's Annotations.

^d This was a common proverb among other nations, as well as the Jews; and therefore Ari-tides was wont to say, that 'a philosopher was never worse than at home.'—Grotius on Mat. xiii. 57.

^e Our Saviour could not work miracles among his countrymen the Nazarenes, says Theophylact, not because he wanted power, but because the subjects of the miracles were unbelieving, and therefore, as Whitby says, wanted the condition on which alone it was fit he should heal them; Christ could not, consistently with the rule on which he invariably acted in performing miracles, namely, to require faith in his divine mission, perform these miracles among the Nazarenes.—Bloomfield.—Ed.

send out his twelve apostles, by two and two together, into the more distant parts of Judea, whilst himself continued preaching in Galilee, and the places adjacent.

To this purpose ^a he invested them with a full power to cure all diseases, eject devils, and even raise the dead. ^b He gave them instructions in what manner they were to behave in the places whither they went; but forbade them, at the same time, to address themselves to any of the Gentiles, or Samaritans, but only to the lost ^c sheep of the house of Israel. He told them the consequences of their ministry, which, after his death more especially, instead of entitling them to temporal advantages, would expose them to sundry kinds of persecutions; but for their encouragement, he acquainted them, that those who rejected their message should be treated with severity, at least at the righteous judgment of God; whereas those that received them kindly, and gave, were it but a cup of cold water, to the least of his disciples, for their Master's sake, should in no wise miss of their reward. With this commission the apostles went into all the parts of Palestine, where the Jews inhabited, preaching the gospel, and the doctrine of repentance as part of it, working miracles for its confirmation, and ^d anointing

^a Among all the accounts which the heathens have given us of their famous magicians, and workers of wonders, there are none to be found who ever pretended to a power to delegate their virtue to others, or to impart their power to them, upon the invocation of their names, or belief of their doctrine. Hence Arnobius, (advers. Gentes, b. i.) having summed up the miracles which our Saviour did, adds, that he not only did them by his power, but permitted many others to do them by invocation of his name, nor did he any peculiar and astonishing miracles himself, that he did not enable his little ones, and even rustics, to perform. Whereupon he asks those he writes to, Did ever that Jupiter, whom the Romans worship in their capitol, give the like power to any mortal? And then concludes this to be a demonstration of a truly divine power: for, to transfer your miraculous power to a man, and to give authority and strength to a creature to do that which you alone can do, is an infallible evidence of one who hath power over all, and the causes of all things at his beck.—Whitby's Annotations.

^b The clause 'raise the dead' (Mat. x. 8.) is rejected by the generality of critics, as it is wanting in many ancient copies of authority, and also as it does not appear that the disciples raised any dead persons previous to our Lord's resurrection. Other critics, however, defend the clause, and it would appear that the evidences for and against it are pretty nearly balanced. If it be retained, it may be considered as having a reference to events which were not to take place till after our Lord's resurrection, when his apostles received a more extensive commission.—Ed.

^c He calls all Israel sheep, though they were not obedient to the voice of the shepherds as being all chosen people. He calls them lost sheep, because they were in great danger of being lost and ruined by the ignorance and wickedness of their guides; and to them the apostles were sent, because they were the children of the kingdom. (Mat. viii. 12,) to whom the promise of the Messiah was made, (Gen. xvii. 1.) and of whom as concerning the flesh he came, (Rom. ix. 5;) and therefore it was the divine will, that they should be first honoured with the preaching of the gospel, and alone enjoy the ministry of Jesus Christ, and his disciples, while he continued upon earth. But, upon their rejecting of so great salvation, the apostle's commission was enlarged. For 'it was necessary,' says St Paul to the Jews, 'that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but seeing you put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles.' (Acts xiii. 46.)—Whitby's and Beausobre's Annotations.

^d That it was usual with the Jews to prescribe oil as a proper thing to anoint the sick, in order to their recovery, Dr Lightfoot, upon Mark vi. 13, has fully proved; nor can we think that the apostles, having no command from Christ to do so, would have used this ceremony, had it not been customary among their

the sick, for a token of their recovery, whilst our Lord continued the course of his ministry in Galilee.

It was now about a year since Herod Antipas had committed John the Baptist close prisoner to the castle Machærus,^e and upon the return of his birthday,^f having made a splendid entertainment for the lords and chief officers of his dominions, he was infinitely pleased with the dancing of a young lady, daughter to his unlawful wife Herodias,^g inasmuch that, in the height of his mirth and jollity, he promised, with the addition of an oath, to grant her whatever she demanded,^h though it amounted to half of his dominions. Unwilling to lose so fair an opportunity, she immediately consulted with her mother what favour to ask, who, being prompted by the height of her malice and revenge, named the head of John the Baptist ⁱ to be given her; which the daughter accordingly countrypmen: but whether they did it symbolically, in hopes of obtaining to the patient the oil of gladness, or only medicinally, it is certain, that the virtue which attended it, when used by the apostles, could not be natural and inherent in the oil, but must be supernatural, and derived from him who sent them, because this unction always produced a certain and constant cure in those that were anointed.—Whitby's Annotations.

^e Both the city and fort that were called by this name, were situated beyond Jordan, about two leagues from that river, on the north-east side of the lake Asphaltites, or Dead Sea, and not far distant from the place where the river discharges itself into it. It was in the hands of Aretas, king of Arabia, when he married his daughter to Herod Antipas; but how it afterwards came into Herod's possession, as it certainly was when he beheaded John the Baptist, we have no account from history.—Calmet's Commentary.

^f That it was an usual custom with kings to celebrate the day of their birth, and that of their accession to the throne, for the word may be applied to either, with great solemnity, we have an example as old as Pharaoh, (Gen. xl. 20,) nor need we doubt but that, on such joyful occasions, there were music and dancing, and all manner of diversions to entertain the company; but that persons of the first rank and distinction should act any part in these diversions, was a rare and unwonted thing; and therefore St Chrysostom, (in Mat. hom. xlix.) is of opinion, that Herodias, foreseeing what would happen, forced this young lady upon a thing which would have better become an actress upon the stage.—Calmet's Commentary.

^g This Herodias, as Josephus relates the matter, in contempt of the laws of her country, was married again to Herod, the natural brother of her husband, separating herself from him whilst living, although he had a child by her; so that being guilty both of incest and adultery, she might well be called his unlawful wife.—Antiq. b. xviii. c. 17.

^h An offer like this we find Ahasuerus, a great Persian monarch, making Queen Esther, chap. v. 3.

ⁱ It may not be improper here to take notice of the remarkable providence of God, in avenging the death of this righteous man upon Herod, Herodias, and her daughter. 1st, As the war between Herod and Aretas, king of Arabia, was occasioned by Herod's wicked contract with Herodias to eject his daughter, who was his lawful wife, and to marry her who was his brother Philip's; so Josephus declares, that the Jews looked upon his putting John to death as the cause of the miscarriage of his army, God being angry with him for the death of John the Baptist. 2d, Envyng the glory of her brother Agrippa, upon whom Caligula had conferred the title of a king, Herodias prevailed with her husband to repair to Rome, in order to request the like favour of the emperor; but the emperor, having received a bad impression against him, instead of granting what he desired, deprived him of his government, and banished both her and him to Lyons in France, where they lived ingloriously, and died miserably; and this, according to Josephus, (Antiq. b. xviii. c. 9.) was done in punishment of her envy, and of her readiness to hearken to her solicitations. And, 3d, Of her daughter, it is related, that as she was going over the ice in winter, the ice broke, and let her in up to the head, which, upon the meeting of the ice again, was severed from her body. And this story, if it be true, as it is confidently told us by Nicephorus, Hist. Eccl. b. i. c. 20, is a demand of the king, in the presence of the whole assembly.

This strange request at first caused an exceeding damp upon the king's spirits; ^a but having recovered himself, out of a pretended reverence to his oath, and respect to his nobility then present, he sent an executioner, ^b who beheaded ^c John, and brought his head in a charger to the young lady, which she presented to her mother; but, as for his body, his disciples, when they came to hear of his death, took care ^d to bury it, and to bring Jesus the news of the tragical fate that had befallen their Master.

^a Herod was no more than a tetrarch, or one of those four among whom his father's kingdom was divided; but St Mark, (vi. 14.) gives him the title of a king, as himself no doubt was fond enough of it, and perhaps, in the provinces under his dominions, was generally called by it. Why he came to be concerned at the young lady's desiring so strange a boon as that of the Baptist's head, is no wonder. The very mention of such a thing from such a person, and in such an assembly, was enough to shock any man of less than uncommon barbarity; but then the evangelists inform us, that Herod had conceived a good opinion of the Baptist, as a just and holy man, and when he heard him, as he did it very gladly, in many things he followed his advice, (Mark vi. 20.) and not only so, but feared the resentment of the people likewise, with whom he was in high esteem, when they should come to be informed of the cause and circumstances of his death, (Mat. xiv. 5.) There might, however, be another reason, less observed, for Herod's concern upon this occasion. It was now his birth-day; and it was usual, even among heathen princes, at such a time to be gay and merry, to think of no ill omens, to surcease all contentions, and not so much as to deprive of life even condemned criminals, on that day when the sovereign of the country received his, lest they should offend or sadden the genius that presided over their nativity; and therefore it is more than probable that Herod, who was more than half a pagan, might have the same notion of the thing. But if he had not, it can hardly be thought but that such an execution would damp the joy of the meeting, and procure him more enemies among the thinking part of the company, than the non-performance of a wicked and illegal oath could have done.—Hammond's Annotations and Calnet's Commentary.

^b The word σπικυλάτης, which we render executioner, in the history of the Roman emperors, signifies a soldier of the guard; and among the Jews, Romans, Chaldeans, and Egyptians, it was customary for one of the king's guard to be the executioner of those whom he had condemned to death.—Hammond's Annotations.

^c Thus died the great forerunner of our blessed Saviour, about two years and three months after his entrance upon his public ministry, in the thirty-fifth year of his age, and was the first who suffered upon the account of the gospel, though seldom called the first martyr. "He was indeed a man," according to the character which Josephus gives of him, "endued with all virtue, who exhorted the Jews to the practice of justice towards men, and piety towards God, and also to baptism, which would become acceptable to God, if they renounced their sins, and to the cleanness of their bodies added the purity of their souls."—Antiq. b. xviii. c. 7.

^d When Herodias had got the Baptist's head in her possession, it is said, that she thrust his tongue through with her bodkin, and for fear that the head, if buried with the body, should be reunited, and rise again to disturb her unlawful lust, and disquiet Herod's conscience, she buried it in her own palace; but where his disciples buried his body, the evangelists have not informed us; only we are so told, that in the time of Julian the apostate, his tomb was shown at Samaria, where the inhabitants of the country opened it, and burnt part of his bones; but the rest were saved by some Christians, that carried them to one Philip, an abbot at Jerusalem, who presented them to St Athanasius; but some time after, when Theodosius built a church in honour of the Baptist, in the place where the temple of Serapis stood, A. D. 396, these holy relics were reposit in it. Though what became of his head we nowhere read; only the Abbot

About the same time that Jesus was informed of John's death by his disciples, his own apostles returned from their several journeys, and gave him an account of all their transactions. The fame of the miracles which our Saviour, both by himself and his apostles, had wrought, gave Herod some ground to think, that the person who did them was John, whom he had unjustly murdered, and who now very probably ^e was risen from the dead to revenge his blood upon him; and therefore, knowing the subtlety and cruelty of that prince, our Saviour ordered his apostles to prepare a vessel, wherein he, and they only, might cross the sea of Galilee, and retire for a little while from the multitude to a desert near Bethsaida. But in vain was it for him to think of concealing himself: the people, seeing where he took shipping, ran after him on foot by the lake side, and, though they had a great circuit of land to take, were got into the desert almost as soon as he; which singular instance of their zeal so affected his compassion, that though he came to that place for the sake of retirement, he could no longer withhold his presence from them; but, ascending a mountain, and taking his disciples with him, he there first instructed them in several things concerning the kingdom of God, and having afterwards cured their sick and diseased, he, at last, fed them all, to the number of five thousand men, besides women and children, with five barley-loaves, and two small fishes, having at first invoked a blessing ^f

Villeloin tells us in his Memoirs, that he saw one at Amiens, but that this was the fifth or sixth head of the Baptist that, in the course of his travels, he had the honour to kiss.—Theodoret. Hist. Eccl. b. iii. c. 3. Ruffin. Hist. c. 27. and Calnet's Dictionary under the word.

^e Erasmus indeed thinks, that as Herod was of the sect of the Sadducees, who denied the immortality of the soul, (comp. Mat. xvi. 6. Mark viii. 15.) he might say by way of irony to his servants, (Mat. xiv. 2.) 'This is John the Baptist: he is risen from the dead;' ridiculing the notions of the vulgar, and those who joined in that opinion. And the solution might have passed, had not Herod been perplexed on this occasion, Luke ver. 7. The image of the Baptist, whom he wrongfully put to death, presented itself often to his thoughts, and tormented him. Therefore, when it was reported that he was risen from the dead, and was working miracles, Herod feared some punishment would be inflicted on him for his crime, and in the confusion of his thoughts, said, that John was risen from the dead, notwithstanding he was a Sadducee. Nay, he might say this, although he had heard of Jesus and his miracles before, there being nothing more common, than for persons in vehement perturbation to talk inconsistently. Besides, it is no easy matter to arrive at a steady belief of so great an absurdity as the annihilation of the human mind. The being of a God, the immortality of the soul, the rewards and punishments of a future state, with the other great principles of natural religion, often obtrude themselves upon unbelievers, in spite of all their efforts to banish them, and leave a sting behind them in the conscience, whose pain, however it may be concealed, cannot easily be allayed. Of this, Herod is a remarkable example. For, notwithstanding he was a king, his conscience made itself heard and felt amidst all the noise, the hurry, the flatteries, and the debaucheries of a court.—MacKnight's Harmony.—Ep.

^f The evangelists make use of two words upon this occasion, 'blessing,' and 'giving thanks;' and by the former of these some interpreters understand the multiplying virtue, which he then commanded down upon the sustenance that he was going to give to the people, and its marvellous increase in the hands of the distributors, whereby it became a repast sufficient for so large a multitude: though others think that he did no more than what we call 'saying grace,' that is, thanked God for his bountiful provision of all things, and begged his blessing upon what he was going to dispense among the people, that it might tend to the wholesome nourishment of their bodies. However this upon them, and that with a plenty so exuberant, that the very fragments ^a which remained filled twelve baskets.

This miraculous multiplication made such an impression upon the multitude, that they no longer doubted of his being the Messiah, and were therefore resolved to set him up for their king by main force; but he, knowing the mischief of such a design, constrained his disciples, who were forward enough perhaps to join in the thing, immediately to take shipping, and to pass by Bethsaida ^b to Capernaum, whilst himself dismissed the multitude; and, when he had so done, continued, till after midnight, in meditation and prayer.

In the mean time, the ship where the apostles were on board was tossed with a great storm in the middle of the lake. The waves ran so high, and the wind was so contrary, that as soon as morning appeared, they had not got much above a league on their voyage, when our Saviour came walking ^c upon the surface of the sea, and drew near towards the ship. This strange appearance, ^d which they took for a spirit, increased their fear not a little. Our Lord indeed, to dispel it, told them who he

he, it is enough to warrant the indifferent use of these two words, that the forms of address to Almighty God, upon the use of his gifts for our refreshment, have usually been of a mixed nature, as consisting partly of praises, and partly of petitions; because the end of such devotions is manifestly twofold, namely, to render our acknowledgments to God for his liberality, and then to beg of him that the good creatures which he hath given us may be sanctified to our use.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels. vol. ii.

^a It was a sufficient reason for our Saviour's ordering the fragments to be gathered up and put into baskets, that from them might appear both the reality of the miracle and the exceeding greatness of the increase; but because our Lord assigns another, by saying, 'Gather up the fragments, that nothing may be lost,' he hath herein showed us that all reserving for the future is not unlawful; that charity is very consistent with frugality; indeed, not only that they may, but that they should go together; for God will be sure to make a mighty difference between the virtue and the specious extreme beyond it; between the liberal and the lavish man.—Ibid.

^b St Mark tells us, that our Saviour ordered his apostles to cross the sea, and wait for him on the other side at Bethsaida. (vi. 45.) St John writes, that accordingly they entered into the ship, but instead of going where they were directed, they steered their course towards Capernaum, (chap. vi. 17.) and yet after all, if we will believe St Matthew, they landed at last, neither at Bethsaida, nor Capernaum, but in the country of Genesareth, (chap. xiv. 34.) Now, to reconcile this, we need only remember what all the evangelists tell us, namely, that while the apostles were on board, there arose a strong gale of wind, which, blowing them from the north, proved, in a manner, quite contrary to them, so that, instead of making the port of Bethsaida, which is on the north coast of the sea of Galilee, the next morning they found themselves on the opposite side, not far from Tiberias, and to the south of Capernaum. Though therefore our Saviour ordered them to go to Bethsaida, yet they could not do it, because the wind was against them. Their next attempt therefore was to get to Capernaum; but even that they could not do; but being forced to yield to the storm, were carried a good way below to the south of it, from whence they just touched at Nazareth, and thence proceeded to Capernaum.—Calmet's Commentary.

^c Among several other instances of God's omnipotence, Job mentions this as one, that 'he treadeth upon the waves of the sea,' Job ix. 8.

^d It was a common opinion among the Jews, that spirits did sometimes appear clothed in a human form; but what put the apostles at this time in the greater fright, was their imagining, that those who appeared at night, were usually evil spirits, and that this, which they now saw, might possibly be the demon who had raised the storm.—Beausobre's Annotations.

was; but Peter, still doubtful, wanted a demonstration, which when he permitted him to try, and the apostle, upon the experiment, was ready to sink, he graciously reached out his hand, and, with a gentle rebuke for the weakness of his faith, setting him again upon the top of the waves, walked along with him to the vessel; which they had no sooner entered, but the winds, knowing their duty to their sovereign, ceased. This the rest of the disciples observing, came and adored Jesus, acknowledging his omnipotence, and admiring the divinity of his power and person; and as it was not long before the ship gained the port, great numbers out of the country, as soon as they understood that he was arrived, brought their sick and diseased on beds, and laid them before him in the streets, beseeching him to permit them only to touch the border of his garment, and as many as touched him were made whole.

The multitudes whom our Lord had miraculously fed in the desert near Bethsaida, were in expectation of finding him the next morning on the mountain; for they had seen the disciples take shipping without their Master, and no other vessel left for him: but perceiving that he was gone, as well as his disciples, and having an opportunity of other vessels from Tiberias, they passed over with all expedition to Capernaum, where they found him teaching in the synagogues; and being in no small surprise, desired to know of him how he got thither? But instead of gratifying their curiosity ^e with a direct answer, he, who knew their corrupt expectations, and that they came after him, not so much for his miraculous gifts as the gratification of their own appetites, took occasion from thence to discourse ^f to them of a certain food, different from what he had given them in the desert of Bethsaida, infinitely more deserving of their inquisition, and whereof the manna in the wilderness was no more than a figure, or a type. What this food was, he signified to them, namely, the merits of his future death and passion, which alone could be available for the obtain-

^e We may observe from several parts of the gospel, particularly from Luke xiii. 23, 24; John xii. 34, 35, that it was usual with our blessed Saviour to answer nothing to such curious questions as had no tendency to edification, but to divert the people from them, by proposing some more profitable subject.—Whitby's Annotations.

^f Our blessed Saviour, through the greatest part of the sixth chapter of St John's gospel, takes an occasion, from the multitude's coming after him out of a greedy desire to be fed, to discourse to them of spiritual blessings, under the metaphors of meat and drink; and for his apology in so doing, we may observe, that among the oriental and Jewish writers, no metaphor was more common than this; that to this purpose Solomon, in his book of Proverbs, introduces Wisdom crying in the streets, 'Come, eat of my bread, and drink of my wine, which I have mingled,' (Prov. ix. 5.) 'For they that eat me shall yet be hungry, and they that drink me shall yet be thirsty,' says the wise son of Sirach, 'for the soul,' as Plato expresses it, 'is nourished by receiving and practising good things; and wisdom, temperance, and piety, are the food of a soul that can suck them in;' that as our Saviour calls himself the bread which came down from heaven, Philo upon the words of Moses descants, 'what food can God rain down from heaven, but that heavenly wisdom which he sends down upon the soul that desires it?' That as he exhorts the people to labour for the meat that perishes not, Philo declares, that the wisdom of God is the 'nurse and nourisher of those that desire incorruptible diet.' And from hence we may perceive why our Saviour insists so much upon this metaphor, even because it was familiar to the Jews, and used by their most celebrated writers.—Whitby's Annotations.

But these sublime truths, which for the present he thought proper to couch in terms obscure and figurative enough, so grieved the intellects of his auditory, that even his disciples began to murmur, and many of his followers, mistaking the words in a literal, which he intended in a spiritual, sense, and thence inferring that he was not such a Messiah as they imagined, wholly deserted him, inasmuch that he began to suspect the fidelity of his very apostles, until Peter, in behalf of all the rest, declared their fixed purpose of adhering to him, upon full conviction that he was the Messiah, the Son of the living God. But notwithstanding this liberal and frank confession, our Lord gave them to understand, that they were not equally sound; for among the twelve whom he had selected, one of them was to prove a traitor, meaning this of Judas Iscariot, who justly deserved that name, because he afterwards betrayed him.

Whether our blessed Saviour was at Jerusalem on the third passover after his baptism, the evangelists have not informed us; but it is very probable, that he who came to fulfil all righteousness, would not neglect so great an ordinance. Upon this presumption, it is most generally believed that he was there, though very likely he might not stay long, but as soon as the festival was over, return into Galilee, ¹ because the rulers, at Jerusalem, lay in wait for an opportunity to put him to death.

Upon his return into Galilee, a certain number of Scribes and Pharisees ^a were sent from Jerusalem to be spies upon his actions, and to criticise upon his doctrine. These men observing, that, when he and his disciples were to eat, they frequently sat down without washing their hands, contrary to the common custom of the Jews, which, as they pretended, was founded upon a tradition,^b

^a The sanhedrim, which sat at Jerusalem, and was the supreme court in all religious affairs, sent messengers to John the Baptist, when he began his preaching, inquiring who he was, and by what authority he baptized, John i. 19. And as the Pharisees had charged our Saviour's disciples with a violation of the sabbath, in plucking and rubbing the ears of the corn, and himself with the same crime, in curing the sick on the sabbath day, it is not improbable that these accusations had reached Jerusalem, and that the Scribes and Pharisees, here mentioned, were emissaries sent from the sanhedrim to watch and observe our Saviour. And this seems the rather to be so, because they were so very ready, when they could find him guilty of no violation of the laws of God, to pick a quarrel with him about some rites and ceremonies of the church, which he and his disciples thought not so very necessary to be observed.—Poole's Annotations.

^b The traditions, in the Jewish church, came to gain credit, upon this presumption, that Moses, when he received the law from God on mount Sinai, which he recorded in his five books, was instructed at the same time in several things, which God enjoined him not to commit to writing, for fear that the heathens should transcribe them: that, in these things, Moses instructed his successor Joshua, and, from Joshua, they were transmitted, through the elders of the people, by oral conveyance only, until Ezra, after the return from the Babylonish captivity, collected them all together, and made the Cabbala, in seventy-two books, which was kept by Gamaliel, and others that succeeded, as heads of the sanhedrim, until the destruction of Jerusalem: that, about an hundred and twenty years after this, R. Judas, the son of Simon, composed a book of them, called the Mishna, that is, the second law, which is indeed the most ancient collection of traditions that the Jews have: that three hundred years after this, R. Jonathan, meeting with more, compiled expostulated with him the reason for so doing: but, instead of answering them directly he put another question to them, by way of recrimination, namely, why they, by their pretended traditions, ^c vacated the laws of God, particularly, that so solemn one of honouring their parents, and relieving them in their wants? And thereupon, looking upon them as so many hypocrites, ^d with whom he disdained to hold any farther converse, he turned to the multitude, and informed them, “that true them into a larger volume: and an hundred years after this, another rabbi made a collection of such as were found among the Jews who remained in Babylon: that these two, which are a kind of supplement and explication of the Mishna, are called, the one the Talmud of Jerusalem, and the other, of Babylon; and that by these, the Jews, at this day, are governed in matters ecclesiastical all the world over. In relation to the particular custom of washing before meat, their canon is, that “whosoever despiseth the washing of hands, is worthy to be excommunicated: he comes to poverty, and will be extirpated out of the world:” for, according to the sense of one of their doctors, namely, R. Aquiba, “he that takes meat with unwashed hands is worthy of death;” and therefore when the same doctor was in prison, and had not water enough both to drink and wash his hands, he chose to do the latter; because “it is better,” says he, “to die with thirst, than to transgress the tradition of the elders.” It is no wonder then that persons inured to those notions, should so readily take exception at our Saviour's omitting what were indeed, though they thought not so, matters of an indifferent nature.—Poole's, Whitby's, Hammond's, and Beausobre's Annotations; and Lightfoot on Mat. xv. 2.

^c The way whereby the Jews made the law of honouring and subsisting their father and mother of no effect, was by pretending, that whatever their parents requested of them, was a Corban, that is, that they had devoted it as a gift or offering to God, or to his temple; and whatever was thus devoted, was not to be touched, be the necessity ever so urgent. For their canon about vows was.—“That they reach even to things commanded, and take place as well in things required by the law, as things indifferent; that a man may be so bound by them, that he cannot, without great sin, do what God had commanded to be done; and that, in this case, if he makes a vow, which cannot be performed without breaking a commandment, his vow must be ratified, and the commandment violated.” This was a superstition which the Pharisees, and other doctors of the law, who had a property in the gifts and oblations that were made to the temple, thought themselves concerned to indulge; and therefore, when any pretended that their parents stood in need of their help, they told them, that if they did but acquaint them that it was a gift, or that they had vowed such a portion of their estate to sacred uses, that would, before God, excuse them from relieving them: nay, they affirmed farther, that if a man but did in a passion say, that the thing which another asked of him was a corban, though it were not actually consecrated to religious uses, this was vow enough to prevent his relieving that other person, even, putting the case, that it were his own father; unless they should absolve him from it, which they would undertake to do for so many shekels of silver, Lev. xxvii. Such abundant reason had our blessed Saviour to charge the Jewish doctors with making one of the greatest commands in the second table of the law void by their traditions concerning vows.—Poole's and Whitby's Annotations, and Pocock's Miscel. p. 415.

^d In several places of the gospel, our Lord calls the Pharisees hypocrites not only because they placed the worship of God, and a great deal of sanctity and religion, in ceremonies of human institution, and though they pretended to extraordinary purity, did all their good works to be seen of men, Mat. xxiii. 5. but more especially in this place, because, being superstitiously careful to avoid the outward pollution of the body, by abstaining from the touch of any thing which they reputed unclean, and washing their hands whenever they thought they had done so; they left that which was within, namely, their hearts and affections, full of iniquity, uncleanness, extortion, and excess, Mat. xxiii. 25. and Luke xi. 39. But from Christ's example in this particular we must not be forward to pronounce men hypocrites, because we have neither that authority, nor that knowledge of their hearts, which he had.—Whitby's Annotations.

piety did not consist in outward ceremonies, but in a sincere observance of the laws of God; that no pollution could be in what entered into a man's mouth, but only in what proceeded from it; for," as he afterwards explains the thing to his disciples, whatever we eat does not affect the mind, the only seat of defilements; for it passes into the stomach, and is soon thrown out of the body, so that, be it never so gross or unclean, it cannot pollute the eater: but all pollution is from within, from the corruption of the heart, such as impure thoughts, unchaste desires, unholy purposes, innodest and indecent speeches, &c. These are the things that leave a lasting stain upon the soul, which a thing so merely external, as omitting to wash before meat, cannot do."

This was a doctrine not well pleasing to the Pharisees, as his disciples told him; but they were a set of people whose censure he justly despised, 'blind leaders of the blind,' as he properly enough calls them, whose vain traditions, as having nothing of divine institution in them, his purpose was to abolish. And from thence, in departing to the coasts of Tyre^a and Sidon, he entered into a house, with a design to conceal himself; but a certain Syro-phenician woman, having got intelligence where he was, came, and earnestly requested of him to cure her daughter, who was sadly tormented with a devil. Our Lord, for the trial of her faith, seemed at first to take no notice of her, until his disciples, to get rid of her importunity, desired him to grant her request, and dismiss her. His ministry, he told them, was confined to Judea, nor was he properly sent to any, but the lost sheep of the house of Israel. All this the poor woman heard, but so far was she from being discouraged by such coldness, that, advancing nearer, she threw herself prostrate at his feet, imploring his help for her child; and when, in an harsh metaphor, he told her, that it was not proper to work those miracles for an heathen, which were originally designed for God's people, the Jews; the afflicted mother owned indeed the truth of what he had alleged, but then, continuing the same figure, she humbly hoped, that a poor distressed heathen might, in some small measure, partake of the mercies which were more peculiarly promised to the Jews. Which answer was so highly expressive of the woman's humility, faith, and reliance, that he granted her petition; so that, when she returned home, she found her daughter laid upon the bed, and perfectly well.

From the coasts of Sidon, our Lord passed eastward to Decapolis,^b and from thence, towards the sea of Galilee, where, in his way, he cured a deaf and dumb^c ^a For an account of the ancient and present state of Tyre and Sidon see supplement on the land of Canaan, ante pp. 341—343.—Ed.

^b It is a country in Palestine, which was so called, because it contained ten cities, some situated on the east, and others on the west side of the river Jordan; the first and principal city is Scythopolis; and the rest, according to Pliny, are, 2d, Philadelpia; 3d, Raphana; 4th, Gadara; 5th, Hippos; 6th, Dion; 7th, Pella; 8th, Gerasa; 9th, Canatha; and 10th, Damascus; though others reckon them after another manner, as Pliny himself observes, b. v. c. 18.—Cabnet's Dictionary, under the word.

^c This is a mistake. Mark (vii. 32.) does not say that the man was dumb absolutely, but that he had an impediment in his speech; for so the word μογλωλον, is rightly translated, and besides it is said, v. 35, that 'the string of his tongue was loosed and he spake plain,' evidently implying that he spoke before, although in an inarticulate or stammering manner, and that his man, by putting his fingers^d in his ears, and some of his spittle upon his tongue; and thence repairing to a mountain, he not only cured every person that was brought unto him, whatever his malady or distemper was, but, in the conclusion, fed all the multitude, which amounted to four thousand men, besides women and children, and who, for three days successively, had been attending him, with seven loaves, and a few small fishes.

Having thus dismissed the company, he embarked with his disciples for the coast of Dalmanutha;^e but no sooner was he arrived there, than the Pharisees, joining with their enemies the Sadducees, came, and demanded of him a sign from heaven, in order to convince them that he was the true Messiah: but having first upbraided them with their acuteness in discerning the face of the sky, and from thence the prognostics of fair or foul weather, and their blindness in not perceiving the manifest signs of the Messiah's coming, he remitted them, as he had done before, to the miracle of his own resurrection, and so sailed back with his disciples.

His disciples, in the hurry of their departure, had forgot to take bread with them; and therefore, when our Saviour, in their passage, gave them caution to take care of the leaven^f of the Pharisees and Sadducees, and they were ignorant enough to take his words in a literal sense, he first gently reproved the blindness of their impediment arose from the state of his tongue; so that he appears to have been, as we say, tongue-tied.—Ed.

^d Christ often made use of visible signs to represent that divine invisible virtue which was inherent in him, and which, upon that occasion, he intended to exert; and therefore, because deaf persons seem to have their ears closed, he put his fingers into the man's ears, to intimate, that, by his power, he would open them; and, because the tongue of the dumb man seems to be tied, or to cleave to the palate, therefore he moistened it with spittle, to signify that he would loose and give free motion to it. These, it is true, were not capable to effect the cure, but they had this use in them, that they excited the observation and attention of the people before whom these cures were wrought.—Whitby's and Beausobre's Annotations. Since this, and the other action mentioned, could contribute nothing to the cure (though we find such used on other occasions as Mark viii. 23, and John ix. 6.) it has been asked why our Lord used them. Such inquiries are often rash, and we are not bound in all cases to give a reason (since our Saviour's adoption of an action shows its fitness); yet here we can be at no loss. The reason was, no doubt, that assigned by Grotius and Whitby, and adopted by most recent commentators, as Kuinoel and Fritz; namely, that Christ was pleased, in condescension to human weakness, to use external actions significant of the cure to be performed; and thereby to strengthen the faith and confirm the hopes of the sick persons, and those who brought them; and, moreover, to show that the power he was about to exert resided in himself. Our Lord adopted these actions, and also the usual one of laying his hands on the sick, in order to show that he was not confined to any one particular mode.—Bloomfield's Greek Testament.—Ed.

^e What St Matthew calls Magdala, St Mark names Dalmanutha, and the reason hereof is, because these two places lay very near together, and Dalmanutha very probably within the precincts of Magdala.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament, and Beausobre's Annotations.

^f The leaven of the Pharisees was their hypocrisy, and too scrupulous observance of the traditions of their elders; and that of the Sadducees was their denial of the existence of angels and devils, the resurrection of the body, and the immortality of the soul; so that the meaning of our Saviour's caution to his apostles is:—To avoid the principles of those, who place the sum of their religion in outward performances, which avail nothing to the sanctification of the soul; and to reject all such doctrines as tended to subvert religion, by cutting off all hopes of happiness in a future state.—Cabnet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

understandings, and the shortness of their memories, who had so soon forgotten his miraculous multiplication of the loaves and fishes, at two different times, and then gave them to understand, that his words did not concern the leaven of bread, but the corrupt doctrines of the Pharisees and Sadducees.

With this discourse they lauded at Bethsaida, which, though the birth-place of several of his apostles, had by the perverseness and infidelity of its inhabitants so offended him, that, when a blind man was presented to him for cure, he would not do it in the city in the sight of the inhabitants; but taking him out of the gate, he anointed his eyes with his spittle, and laid his hands on them. The man at first saw objects indistinctly, men like trees walking; but when our Lord had laid his hands upon him the second time, he restored him to his perfect sight; and so sent him home, with a charge ^a not to return into the city, nor to discover the thing to any person belonging to that place.

From that place he departed into the coasts of Caesarea Philippi, ^b where, being minded to make some trial of his apostles' faith and proficiency, he demanded of them what opinion mankind had of him, and whom they took him to be? Some, say they, take you to be John the Baptist ^c risen from the dead; some Elias sent down from ^a The reason of our Saviour's giving the man this charge, is founded upon the infidelity of the people of Bethsaida, wherewith he upbraids them, Mat. xi. 21.

^b Caesarea Philippi, before called Paneas, and now Baniyas, was situated at the foot of mount Paneus, near the springs of the Jordan. It has been supposed, that its ancient name was Dan, or Laish; and that it was called Paneas by the Phenicians only. Eusebius, however, distinguishes Dan and Paneas as different places. Caesarea was a day's journey from Sidon, and a day and a half from Damascus. Philip the tetrarch built it, or, at least, embellished and enlarged it, and named it Caesarea, in honour of the emperor Tiberius; but afterwards, in compliment to Nero, it was called Neronias. The woman who had been troubled with an issue of blood, and was healed by our Saviour, (Mat. ix. 20. Luke vii. 43.) is said to have been of Caesarea Philippi, and to have returned thither after her cure, and erected a statue to her benefactor. The present town contains, according to Burckhardt, about 150 houses, inhabited mostly by Turks. The goddess Astarte was worshipped here, as appears from the medals extant. The Greek language was more used in this city than the Latin; yet it struck medals in each language. It seems to have been made a Roman colony; though not mentioned as such by any writer. It is likely that Caesarea Libanus was among the most forward cities to compliment Severus, since several authors report that it was his birth-place. Lampridius even says, that he was named Alexander, because his mother was delivered of him in a temple dedicated to Alexander the Great, on a festival in honour of that hero, at which she had assisted with her husband. The editor of the Modern Traveller has industriously collected and judiciously compared the several notices of this place which are found in modern writers. Palestine, pp. 353—363.—Calmet's Dictionary.—Ed.

^c Those who held that Jesus was John the Baptist risen from the dead, were of the same opinion with Herod the tetrarch, (Mat. xiv. 2.) and seem to have imbibed the notion of the Pharisees, who, according to Josephus, used to say, 'that a good man might easily return to life again.' Those who took him for Elias, ran into the general opinion of the nation, that Elias was to come before the Messiah, and anoint him when he came; and therefore, notwithstanding his doctrine and miracles, they could not conceive him to be the Messiah, so long as his mean appearance was contrary to their expectations: and those who thought him to be Jeremias, seem to have espoused the sentiment of some of their doctors, who looked upon that prophet as the head of the whole order, not improbably upon the character which God gives him, 'Before I formed thee in the belly, I knew thee, and before thou camest forth out of the womb I sanctified thee, and I or-heaven; and others Jeremias, or some other of the ancient prophets, restored to life again: but when he continued asking what their notion of him was, and Simon, ^d in the name of the rest, had made an open confession that he was Christ, the Son of the living God, he not only allowed that confession to be true, and what was confirmed by the attestation ^e of God himself, but, in allusion to the name he had given him, which signifies a rock ^f or daind thee a prophet unto the nations,' Jer. i. 5.—Hilby's and Beausobre's Annotations.

^d That the rest of the apostles knew and believed the great truth which St Peter here declares, no one can doubt, who calls to mind the attestation made of it before by John the Baptist, (John i. 31.) the frequent confessions of it by evil spirits dispossessed before their eyes, (Mark iii. 15.) and that full declaration of it in the name of the whole fraternity, 'We believe, and are sure, that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God,' John vi. 69. For which reason we find the fathers, upon this occasion, speaking of St Peter as the mouth, the tongue, the voice of the church, and a kind of foreman to the rest of the apostles; for this they might think a matter of decency and good manners, a means to prevent confusion and disorder, and a token of that union and harmony which was among them, that one man should speak for all the rest. And why that one man should be St Peter, rather than any of the rest, may very reasonably be imputed to the seniority of his age, the natural fervour of his temper, and his longer attendance upon our blessed Saviour than several of the rest had been employed in. These are sufficient reasons for his delivering the judgment of the company, and for our accounting his confession the common voice of all, to a question which had evidently been propounded to them all.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iv.

^e The words in the text are, 'Flesh and blood hath not revealed this to thee, but my Father which is heaven,' Mat. xvi. 17. But how did God reveal this to Peter? Those who pretend that he had a particular revelation, not vouchsafed to any others, without which he could not have owned Christ to have been the Son of God, must not only allow the like revelation to Nathanael, (John i. 49.) to the centurion who was present at our Lord's crucifixion, (Mat. xxvii. 54.) and to all others who made declaration of the same faith; but must likewise excuse all those Jews who did not believe in Christ, because it was not in their power so to do without this peculiar revelation. Without running ourselves into these preminurs therefore, we may reasonably conclude, that the sense of our Saviour's words is this,—"What others say of me, namely, that I am John, Elias, Jeremias, or the like, this thou hast learnt from me; but the faith which thou hast now confessed concerning me, though it required of thee a due attention to the proofs given of it; yet since those proofs are the doctrine which I teach from God, and the miracles done in confirmation of it, are apparently the finger of God, thy faith must be acknowledged to be the result, not of human wisdom, but of divine revelation. God has given thee a teachable and intelligent mind, to perceive, by my doctrine and miracles, that I am the true Messiah, notwithstanding the obscurity of my appearance, and therefore thou mayest be truly said to be taught of God, because my doctrine is the word, and my miracles are the power of God."—Hilby's Annotations and Calmet's Commentary.

^f We are now advanced to a passage on which, as the church of Rome mainly rests its doctrines of the supremacy and infallibility of the Pope, and the power of the church, we are bound to discuss the sense with especial care. Let us, then, examine the words and clauses in order, as they offer themselves. First, from the very form of expression in Κἀγὼ δὲ σοὶ λέγω, it is plain, that what is here said by Christ is meant to correspond to what had been just said by Peter. As he had declared to Jesus: Σὺ εἶ—ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, 'thou art the Christ the Son of the living God,' so Jesus says to him: Κἀγὼ δὲ σοὶ λέγω, the sense of which is: 'Moreover I also say to thee.' In the next clause ὅτι σὺ εἶ Πέτρος, 'that thou art Peter,' we are to bear in mind that Peter was not the original name of this disciple; but a surname, given to him, (as was customary with the Jewish rabbis at the baptism of proselytes.) at his conversion. And as those names were often given with allusion to some peculiar quality or disposition; so, in the case of Simon, it had reference to that zeal and firmness which he displayed; as well in first making this confession of faith in Christ, as in afterwards stone, he told Simon, "that he would make him a foundation stone, or a prime minister in building his church, building up the church and establishing the religion of Christ. For examples of this kind of Paronomasia in giving names, see Gen. xvii. 5. xxxii. 27. and compare Gen. xxvii. 36. Eurip. Phœn. 615. Æschyl. Prom. 472. Theb. 401. Agam. 670. So also Christ, in like manner, surnamed James and John Boanerges, sons of thunder. Moreover Peter, or rather Cephas, (for Πέτρος is only the name Grecized,) means, not stone, as some affirm, but rock, as Cephas often does, and πέτρος not unfrequently in the classical writers, as Herodot. ix. 55. Soph. Œd. T. 334. Callim. Hymn in Apoll. 22. So Juvencus (Hist. Ev. iii. 275.) must have understood it, who well expresses the sense thus: "Tu nomen Petri digna virtute tueris. Hac in mole mihi, Saxique in robore ponam Semper mansuras æternis mœnibus ædes." "With worthy faith dost thou maintain the name of Rock, on this structure and on the strength of this Rock will I plant my church to remain with eternal walls for ever." Moreover, σὺ εἶ may be rendered "thy name denotes." So Mark iii. 17. Βοανηργῆς ὁ ἴσταν, υἱὸς βροῦνθῆς, Boanerges, that is, 'sons of thunder.' But commentators, both ancient and modern, are not agreed as to what is meant by ἐπὶ ταύτῃ τῇ πέτρῃ, 'on this Rock.' Now that depends upon the reference which some suppose to be the confession of faith just made by Peter, while others, and indeed almost every modern expositor of any note, refer it to Peter himself: and with reason; for certainly, as is observed by Bishop Marsh (comp. View, App. p. 27.), "it would be a desperate undertaking to prove that Christ meant any other person than Peter." In fact, they can indicate no other, consistently with the rules of correct exegesis; for, not to mention that the profession had not been Peter's only, but in making it, he spoke not for himself alone, but for all the apostles, and in that quality returned answer to a question which had been addressed to them collectively: "Whom say ye that I am?" &c., the connexion subsisting in the reason given for the surname which had been bestowed on Simon, confines it to that alone; as also does the parallelism between Christ's reply to Peter, and the answer which he had given. And when the expositors above alluded to conjecture that, in pronouncing the words, Christ pointed to himself, as the great foundation, they argue upon a wholly gratuitous and very improbable supposition. Moreover, the words following καὶ σοὶ δώσω 'besides to thee I will give,' imply that there had been some previous gift or distinction. In short, the sense is: "Thou art by name Rock; that is, thy name means Rock, and suitably to that will be thy work and office; for upon thee, that is, upon thy preaching, as upon a rock, shall the foundation of the church be laid." It may, indeed, seem strange, that so natural and well-founded an interpretation should have been passed over by any. But that may be attributed partly, to the causeless fears into which protestants have been betrayed; lest, by admitting it, they should give a countenance to the papal claim of supremacy; and partly, to an idea, that such a sense would be contrary to what is elsewhere said in scripture,—namely, that Christ is the only foundation. (See I Cor. iii. 11.) But as to the first, the fear is groundless; it being, as Bishop Middleton observes, "difficult to see what advantage could be gained; unless we could evade the meaning of δώσω σοὶ τὰς κλεῖς, 'I will give to thee the keys,' which follows. And as to the latter fear, it is equally without foundation; since the two expressions are employed in two very different senses. In St Peter's case, it was very applicable; for as he was the first apostle called to the ministry, so he was the first who preached the gospel to the Jews, and also the first who preached it to the Gentiles. So that, to use the words of Bishop Pearson on the Creed, "the promise made here was punctually fulfilled, by Christ's using Peter's ministry in laying the foundation of the Christian church among both Jews and Gentiles; and in his being the first preacher to them of that faith which he here confesses, and making the first proselytes to it: for St Peter laid the first foundations of a church among the Jews, by the conversion of 3000 souls, (Acts ii. 41.) who, when they gladly had embraced St Peter's doctrine, were all baptized; and then, ver. 47, we first find mention of a Christian church. St Peter also laid the first foundation of a church among the Gentiles, by the conversion of Cornelius and his friends, Acts x. "If," says Bishop Taylor, "St Peter was chief of the apostles, and head of the church, he might fairly enough be the representative of the whole college of apostles, and receive this which should be so firmly established, that all the power and policy of its enemies should not be able, at any time, to destroy it; and that, for the more orderly gov-

promise in their right, as well as his own:—that promise, I say, which did not pertain to Peter principally and by origination, and to the rest by communication, society, and adherence; but that promise which was made to Peter first; yet not for himself, but for all the college, and for all their successors: and then made a second time to them all, without representation, but in diffusion, and performed to all alike in presence, except St Thomas." In fact, the apostles generally are, in other parts of the New Testament, called the foundation on which the church is built, as in Eph. ii. 20. and Rev. xxi. 14. as being the persons employed in erecting the church by their preaching. And what they all, more or less, did, Peter commenced the doing thereof, and might therefore be said to be the first foundation; though in matters of doctrine, the Christian church rests on the testimony, not of one, but of all.—Bloomfield's Greek Testament, Mat. xvi. 18, 19.—Ed.

a 'The gates of hell shall not prevail against it,' (Mat. xvi. 18.) may with more propriety be rendered, 'the gates of hades shall not prevail against it.' It is obvious that the term hell which occurs so often in our English bibles does not always denote the same place or thing. Dr Campbell has investigated this subject with great ability and accuracy, and has thereby done much service to the cause of sound scripture criticism. He observes that in the Hebrew scriptures the word sheol often occurs, and uniformly denotes the state of the dead in general, without regard to the virtuous or vicious characters of the persons, their happiness or misery. The Seventy have almost invariably rendered the same Hebrew word, by the Greek term hades, which means the receptacle of the dead, and ought rarely to have been translated hell in the sense in which we now use the word, namely, as the place of torment. To denote this latter place, the New Testament writers employ the Greek word γεέννα, gehenna, compounded of two Hebrew words ge hinnom, that is, 'the valley of Hinnom,' a place near Jerusalem, where children were cruelly sacrificed by fire to Moloch, and which is sometimes called Tophet. (See a subsequent part of this work.)

As in process of time this place came to be considered an emblem of hell, or the place of torment, reserved for the wicked in a future state, the name Tophet came gradually to be used in this sense, and at length to be confined to it. In this sense also the word gehenna, a synonymous term, is always to be understood in the New Testament, where it occurs about a dozen times. The confusion that has arisen on this subject has been occasioned not only by our English translators having rendered the Hebrew word Sheol, and the Greek word gehenna, frequently by the term hell; but the Greek word hades which occurs eleven times in the New Testament, is in every instance except one translated by the same English word hell, which it ought never to have been (see Jones' Biblical Cyclopaedia.) With regard to the meaning of the expression, 'gates of death (hades)' Dr Campbell observes, 'it is by death, and by it only, that the spirit enters into hades. The gate of hades is therefore a very natural periphrasis for death; insomuch that, without any positive evidence, we should naturally conclude this to be the meaning of the phrase. But we have sufficient evidence, both sacred and profane, that this is the meaning. The phrase occurs in the Septuagint, in the thanksgiving of Hezekiah, after his miraculous recovery from the mortal disease he had been seized with (Is. xxxviii. 10.) I said, 'I shall go to the gates of the grave,' εν πυλαις ἄδου. It follows, 'I am deprived of the residue of my years.' Nothing can be plainer than that πυλαι ἄδου here means death, in other words, I shall die and be deprived of the residue of my years. But, though the phrase is the same (for πυλαι ἄδου is a literal version of the Hebrew) with that used by our Lord, our translators have not liked to make Hezekiah, who was a good man, speak as if he thought himself going to hell, and have therefore rendered it the grave. Another example we have in the Wisdom of Solomon, which, though not canonical scripture, is, in a question of criticism, a good authority, (Hisd. xvi. 13.) 'Thou hast power of life and death, thou ledest to the gates of hades, εις πύλας ἄδου, and bringest up again.' This passage is as little susceptible of doubt as the former. The classical use of this phrase is the same with that of the inspired writers. Homer makes Achilles say, as rendered by our English poet, (Iliad i. 312.)

ernment of it, he would give him the keys of the kingdom of heaven, so that his sentence, whenever it should regularly exclude or admit any person into the bosom of the church upon earth, should in like manner be ratified and confirmed in heaven." But then, to prevent the ill use that might be made of this discovery, he strictly charged his apostles ^a not to declare to any man, that he was the Messiah.

Perceiving, by this discourse with Peter, that his disciples had got a right notion of his office and divinity, he began thenceforward to prepare their minds for his sufferings, and to talk more openly of his death and resurrection. One day, therefore, as he was insisting on the sufferings which he was to undergo at Jerusalem,^b and Peter, unable to endure a thought so disagreeable to the dignity of his Master, desired him to desist,^c he gave him a very sharp rebuke,^d as a person whose advice crossed his gracious purposes of man's redemption, and savoured of nothing but worldly grandeur; and therefore, to extinguish in them all notions of a temporal kingdom, he called his disciples, and told them, that "whoever pretended to possess his religion, should take up his cross,^e or patiently submit to all manner of persecutions, in sure and certain hope of a happy immortality, which he would procure for his followers, when he was in his kingdom, in which some, that were then present among them, ere it was long, but certainly before the day of their death,^f should see him happily instated."

that is, I hate him as death, or I hate him mortally. To say then that the gates of hades shall not prevail against the church, is, in other words, to say, It shall never die, it shall never be extinct. Le Clerc, though meaning the same thing (as appears by his note,) has expressed it inaccurately: 'Les portes de la mort ne la surmonteront point;' the gates of death shall not surmount it. We see at once how appositely death is called the gates of hades. But what should we call the gates of death? Not death itself, surely. They must be diseases; for by these we are brought to death. But in this sense we cannot apply the promise. For many direful diseases has the church been afflicted with, if the introduction of the grossest errors, the most superstitious practices, and senseless disputes, are to be accounted such; but they have not hitherto proved mortal, and we have reason to believe never shall.—Dr Campbell's Preliminary Dissertation vi. part ii. sect. 17.—Ed.

^a In several parts of the gospel we find our Saviour enjoining the people whom he had cured, not to make any publication of his miracles, (Mat. viii. 4. and ix. 30.) but it is an injunction of a particular nature, not to discover that he was the Christ, though this was an article necessary for every man to know and believe in order to his salvation. Now, though this was a point necessary for all to know, yet the apostles were not the proper persons at this time to declare it, because it might look like a kind of confederacy between them, if they should prove too lavish in the commendations of their Master. It would much better become his infinite wisdom, therefore, to find out himself a proper opportunity for the discovery of this great truth, without drawing the envy of the Pharisees upon him, and obstructing the progress of the gospel, which could hardly be believed, considering the low circumstances wherein he appeared; and which, had it been believed, might have encouraged the attempt of the Jews to come, and make him a king, John vi. 15. What therefore our Saviour says to his three apostles, in relation to his transfiguration, that they should 'tell no man of it, until he was risen from the dead,' (Mat. xvii. 9.) is applicable to this passage likewise. For, after his resurrection, they were by office to be his witnesses, and to declare to others that he was the Christ, because they could then do it, not only without suspicion of confederacy, but with great advantages and success, after that Christ had taken possession of his kingdom, and had testified this, by sitting down at the right hand of power, and, by sending down upon them the Holy Ghost, to enable them to confirm their testimony.—Pool's, Beausobre's and Whitby's Annotations.

^b Jerusalem was the place where this tragedy was to be acted, because, as our Lord observes, a prophet could not suffer out of that city, (Luke xiii. 33,) for there sat the sanhedrim that was to try him; and there lived the Roman governor who had the power of life and death, and was to condemn him.—Whitby's Annotations.

^c Peter's words in the Greek are ἰλάωσ' σοι, Κύριε, (Mat. xvi. 22,) which we may render propitius esto tibi, Domine, favour thyself, or be kind to thyself. "Since the rulers at Jerusalem have such malevolent designs against thee, why shouldst thou think of going any more among them? If they intend to evil entreat thee, and take away thy life, be thou kind and favourable to thyself; avoid the danger by keeping at a distance from it, and consult thine own preservation by continuing here." This seems to be the proper sense of St Peter's words, and they were doubtless spoken with a good intention, and singular affection for his Master; but still they argued great weakness in him, in pretending to contradict one whom he had just before acknowledged to be the Christ, the Son of God, and denote him ignorant of the redemption of mankind by that death which God in his wise counsel had determined.—Pool's Annotations; and Young's Sermons, vol. ii.

^d The words of our Saviour upon this occasion are,—'get thee behind me, Satan; thou art an offence to me,' (Mat. xvi. 23.) Not that we are to think, that our Saviour ever imagined that St Peter, in this advice, had any pernicious designs against him, as the great enemy of mankind has, when he tempts and deludes them into sin; but his only meaning is, that his interposition in this affair was very unreasonable, and highly repugnant to his design of coming into the world, which was to save it. "Thou thinkest perhaps," says he, "Peter, that in this thy advice thou showest thy kindness to me, as a friend that respects my welfare, and art tender of my preservation; but, instead of that, thou art an adversary to me, (for so the word Satan signifies, Num. xxii. 32. 2 Sam. xix. 23. 1 Kings v. 4. &c.,) in thy endeavouring to draw me aside from doing what is my Father's will and command, (John x. 18.) I told thee that I must suffer; that such is the determinate counsel of God, and such my fixed purpose and resolution; and therefore all advice to the contrary is so far from pleasing, that it is an offence to me; I cannot away with it; and therefore get thee behind me, Satan; for, though there is no malice in thy intention, yet imprudently hast thou run upon the same advice, that Satan uses the most successfully of all others to undo me by, and that is, the advice of self-indulgence. For favour thyself is the most artificial of all the suggestions of the devil; because that being made specious with the pretences of reason and justice, and sweetened by its agreeableness to that of self-love, with which all men do naturally abound, it seldom fails of being swallowed, though poison and death lurk under it."—Pool's and Whitby's Annotations; Cabinet's Commentary and Young's Sermons, vol. ii.

^e Among several nations, it was a custom for the criminal to bear the cross whereon he was to suffer, to the place of execution; (Lipsius de Cruce, b. ii. c. 65.) and, in allusion to this, our Saviour makes use of the phrase, to denote our cheerfully bearing those trials and persecutions which the divine providence brings upon us in the execution of our duty, and our adherence to his most holy religion.—Pool's and Beausobre's Annotations.

^f Our Saviour's words are these:—'Verily I say unto you, there are some of them, who are standing here, who shall not taste of death, until they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom,' Mat. xvi. 28. "Of the various interpretations of this verse, the most easy and natural is, that some of Christ's disciples should live to see him fully enter upon, that is, establish that spiritual and mediatorial reign, at the consummation of which he will come in the glory of his Father, to reward every man according to his works, (Mat. xvi. 27.) And he did thus establish it by his resurrection and ascension, by the diffusion of the Holy Ghost, by the gift of miraculous powers, by the triumphant success of the gospel, and the punishment of the unbelieving Jews, by the destruction of their city and polity; which St John at least lived to witness."—Holden's Christian Expounder of the New Testament.

^g What St Luke calls ὡσεὶ ἡμέραι ὀκτώ, 'about eight days,'

hearts of his disciples, as well as to instruct them more fully in the nature of his kingdom, thought it not improper to give some of them at least a specimen of his future glory; and accordingly, taking with him his three most intimate apostles, Peter, James, and John, he ascended a high mountain, ^a and there, while he was employed in prayer, he was suddenly transformed into another kind of appearance; for a bright lustre darted from his face, more glorious than the sun, and a dazzling splendour, piercing from his body through his garment, made them appear whiter than snow, and more radiant than the light. During this heavenly scene there appeared Moses and Elias, clothed with all the brightness and majesty of a glorified state, familiarly conversing with him, and discoursing of his death and sufferings.

While the intercourse continued between these three, Peter, and his two fellow apostles, were fallen asleep; but waking just before their departure, they were exceedingly surprised and terrified at the sight of so much glory and majesty. Peter indeed begged of his Master, that they might continue in that happy place, and erect three tents, one for him, and the other two for Moses and Elias: but while he was thus talking, scarce knowing what he said in his fright and transport, a bright and shining cloud suddenly came over them, and a voice from thence proclaimed, 'This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him.' Upon which the apostles were seized with a greater consternation than ever, and fell prostrate upon the ground; but upon our Lord's touching and encouraging them, they looked up, and saw none but him; for the other two were vanished.

chap. ix. 28, St Matthew and St Mark make 'after six days:' but the reason of this seeming disagreement is, that the two last evangelists compute only the entire days between our Saviour's discourse, and his going up into the mount, and therefore style them six: whereas St Luke, including both the days of his discourse and his ascent, calls them eight days. And this is evident from the word orai which, when any sum is mentioned, is always added to signify, that it is not exact, but wants something to make it complete, as may be seen in Mat. xiv. 21. Luke i. 56.—iii. 23.—xxiii. 44. John iv. 6.—xix. 14. Acts ii. 41, &c. —Whitby's Annotations.

^a An opinion has been entertained among Christians since the days of Jerome, that mount Tabor was the scene of the transfiguration. On the eastern part of the hill are the remains of a strong castle; and within the precincts of it is the grotto, in which are three altars in memory of the three tabernacles, that St Peter proposed to build, and where the Latin friars always perform mass on the anniversary of the transfiguration. It is said there was a magnificent church built here by Helena, which was a cathedral when this town was made a bishop's see. On the side of the hill they show a church in a grot, where they say Christ charged his disciples not to tell what things they had seen till he should be glorified. It is very doubtful, however, whether this tradition be well founded, or whether it has not, as Mr Maundrell and other writers suspect, originated in the misinterpretation of a very common Greek phrase. Our Saviour is said to have taken with him Peter, James, and John, and brought them into a high mountain 'apart;' from which it has been rather hastily inferred that the description must apply to Tabor, the only insulated and solitary hill in the neighbourhood. We may remark with the traveller just named, that the conclusion may possibly be true, but that the argument used to prove it seems incompetent; because the term 'apart' most likely relates to the withdrawing and retirement of the persons here spoken of, and not to the situation of the mountain. In fact, it means nothing more than that our Lord and his three disciples betook themselves to a private place for the purpose of devotion.—Edinburgh Cabinet Library, Palestine, pp. 306—309. For a description of Tabor, see note a. p. 402.—Ed.

As they descended the mount, he strictly commanded them not to tell any man what strange things they had seen until he was risen from the dead. They were ready to obey his commands, but did not rightly understand his last words; ^b and therefore they had some altercations among themselves concerning the meaning of his rising from the dead: and another difficulty they had to solve; for having seen Elias with our Saviour upon the mount, they could not forbear asking him, what reason the Scribes and Pharisees had for asserting that that prophet was to come upon the earth before the Messiah? To which our Saviour replied, that these Jewish doctors were not mistaken in their notion, because Elias was in effect come already, and had received the same bad treatment from his countrymen that himself in a short time was to expect; from whence they perceived, that by the Elias he spoke of he plainly intended John the Baptist.

St John, according to the general sense of antiquity, having perused the other evangelists, and observed in what particulars they were defective, at the persuasion of the other bishops of Asia, was prevailed upon to write his gospel as a supplement to their omissions. Whoever will give himself the trouble to compare his history with that of the other evangelists, will find this notion in a great measure verified. For, not to mention other particulars, our Saviour's miracles, antecedent to his resurrection, as they are recorded by St John, are no more than eight. 1st, His turning water into wine at the marriage of Cana in Galilee. 2d, His telling the Samaritan woman the secrets of her life. 3d, His healing the nobleman's son at Capernaum. 4th, His curing the lame man at the pool of Bethesda. 5th, His feeding five thousand men with five barley loaves and two fishes. 6th, His walking upon the surface of the water, and calming the storm at sea. 7th, His giving sight to a blind man by anointing his eyes with clay. And 8th, His raising Lazarus from the dead. Now, all these are omitted by the former evangelists, except the 5th and 6th, which St John seems to have recorded chiefly to introduce a moral discourse which our Saviour took occasion to make to the people, and which the other sacred penmen had omitted; which is a plain argument that the intent of St John's gospel was to supply the defects of ^b The doctrine of the general resurrection they could not but understand; for that the Pharisees believed, (Acts xxiv. 15.) and of that Martha makes acknowledgment, (John xi. 24;) nor could they be ignorant of the meaning of any particular man's rising from the dead; for of that they had instances in the Old Testament, and had lately seen an example of it in the gates of Naim, (Luke vii. 15.) But being taught out of the law, that Christ was to abide for ever, (John xii. 34.) and that of his kingdom there should be no end, (Luke i. 33.) they could not tell how to reconcile his death, which was to be previous to his resurrection to the predictions of the prophets, and their own conceptions of his temporal kingdom; and therefore we may observe, that when Christ was dead, their hopes died with him: 'we trusted that it had been he who should have redeemed Israel' (Luke xxiv. 21.) but that at his resurrection they revived again, which made them ask, 'wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?' (Acts i. 6.)—Whitby's Annotations.

A. M. 4035. A. D. 31; OR, A. M. 5140. A. D. 29. FROM MAT. xii. 1—xvii. 14. MARK ii. 23—ix. 14. LUKE vi. 1—ix. 37. JOHN v. 1—vii. 1.

the other three; and that therefore their silence is no manner of argument against St John's account of the pool of Bethesda.

It may seem a little strange, indeed, that Josephus should give us no account of it, especially when the sanative virtue of its waters, occasioned by so extraordinary a means, could not but redound to the honour of his country.¹ But when it is considered that the like omissions have been frequently made by other historians, who in their writings have neglected to insert several considerable matters of antiquity, merely because they were so familiar and well known to them.² When it is considered that Josephus, in particular, wrote his history for the information of the Greeks and learned Romans, who were heathens, and for fear of shocking their belief, is very tender of dwelling too much upon miracles: when it is considered, that he is entirely silent in several other instances that bear some relation to our Saviour Christ; that he does not so much as intimate the slaughter of the infants at Bethlehem, mentioned by St Matthew,³ nor give any clear account of the Roman census or taxation, which occasioned our Lord to be born at Bethlehem, as it is recorded by St Luke:⁴ when it is considered, that the miraculous cure of the impotent man by Jesus had so visible a connexion, that he could not, in decency, give an account of the one without making some mention of the other; and therefore chose rather to decline the history of both: and, lastly, when it is considered, that this pool, according to⁵ Tertullian, "ceased to be beneficial to the Jews, upon their final perseverance in blasphemy and infidelity against Christ;" there is no wonder at all that Josephus, who was very defective in other matters, and no great lover of miracles, should omit giving us an account of a pool, whose virtue was extinct and gone when first he wrote his Antiquities, and which he could not well make mention of, without giving an implicit honour to Christ.

That, upon the death of our blessed Saviour, this pool might lose its sanative quality, is no improbable conjecture, because the Jews no longer deserved such a peculiar blessing; but when at first it came to be impregnated with it, is not a matter of so easy solution. The words in the text are, that "an angel went down," κατὰ καιρὸν, 'at a certain season,' which⁷ a learned author chooses rather to render 'at the season,' that is, of the passover, 'and troubled the water;' from whence he infers, that the first time of this supernatural moving of the water, and consequently of the pool's receiving a miraculous healing quality, was at this passover; which was the second after the commencement of our Saviour's public ministry: and the reason he assigns for its being this rather than any other passover, is,—"That our Saviour, having gone through all the cities of Galilee, and most of the other parts of the country of Judea, preaching and healing diseases, came up to Jerusalem at the passover, with an intent to fix his abode there; that, to prepare his way before him, God might give this pool an healing quality,⁸ thereby to show the Jews, in a typical manner, that the messenger of the covenant was coming among them, to 'open a fountain⁹ to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness;' but that, instead of giving him a kind reception, they took counsel together how they might take away his life, which made him withdraw himself from them, and, upon his departure, the miraculous virtue of the water ceased."⁷ The only objection against this hypothesis is, that it makes the miracle of no more than a week or ten days' continuance, which is too short a space for so great a company as is here represented, to be gathered together; to have taken up their abode, as it were, in the apartments of this hospital; and to be acquainted so perfectly, as the paralytic, in his discourse with our Saviour, seems to be, with the nature of the pool, and the manner of its preternatural perturbation. And therefore, to follow the generality of commentators, though we should suppose, that its medicinal virtue began at the time of this second passover, yet we may still adhere to the opinion of Tertullian, and say, that, at certain times at least, it continued with the Jews, and a singular blessing it was, until they had filled the measure of their iniquity,¹⁰ by denying the Holy One, and the Just, and by killing the Prince of Life.

How the waters of this pool came by their sanative quality, opinions, in some measure, have been divided. Our¹¹ learned Hammond, who sometimes affects a singularity of interpretation, supposes, that the waters became medicinal by being impregnated with a healing warmth from the blood and entrails of the sacrificed beasts that were washed there, and that the angel in the text is not to be understood of any of those celestial beings that are usually distinguished by that name, but only of a common messenger, namely, an officer or servant of the priests, who, at a proper season, was sent by him to stir the pool. The great¹² Bartholine supposes, that these waters were naturally medicinal, and that their commotion was occasioned by an extraordinary fermentation of some mineral in them; and therefore he makes the angel no more than a divine power, which originally gave this efficacy, though it was exerted in a natural way. But besides that the word ἀγγελοῦ seldom occurs in the former, and never in this sense, in any historical narrative in scripture, there are these plain objections against both hypotheses, namely,¹³ That, be the waters impregnated with what ingredient we please, had their operation been mechanical, they must necessarily have cured more than one person, at every commotion or fermentation; and yet they never can be supposed of efficacy enough to cure all manner of diseases in an instant, and at one single immersion, as the waters of Bethesda are represented to do: and therefore, waving all such groundless suppositions, we may be allowed to set the authority of an ancient father of the church against these modern names, and say, "That the angel, which descended at a certain season, gave the water its medicinal virtue; for the nature of the water was not sanative in itself, if it had, cures would have always happened, but the whole depended on the virtue communicated to it by the angel."⁷

Now the true reason why the virtue thus communicated to the water by the operation of an angel, was effectual only to the curing of one person at one time, was to evince the miraculousness of the cure. Had many been cured at once, the sceptic might have imputed their cures to the natural virtue of the water, and, upon this supposition, been emboldened to ask, "Where is the wonder of this? Do not many medicinal baths cure various kinds of diseases, and multitudes of such as labour under each disease, provided their case be curable? Had one only indeed been cured, the first that could get in after the troubling of the water, there would have been then a great and real miracle: but now the numbers make the fact suspicious. To make it appear a miracle indeed, its effects should have been confined and limited to particular times and persons, and otherwise so circumstantiated, as that the power of God, and not of blind nature, might have been apparent in it." But all this language is effectually silenced by the method which the wise providence of God took in this case, and the miracle established upon such evident conviction, as the mouth of infidelity itself cannot gainsay.^a

^a The nature and manner of the cures performed here, and the times of their performance, as a subject of great interest, has exercised the speculations of most commentators. As to the nature of the cures, or the sensible means, if any, employed in effecting them, as the whole is represented as a special miracle, second causes are out of the question: all that was required on the part of the patient, let his case be what it might, being the mere act of immersion; the water having at other times no power to convey any specific benefit. We are consequently released from all such unscriptural and unphilosophical opinions as that entertained by Dr Hammond; who ascribes the medicinal properties of the pool to the stirring up of the blood and entrails of the slaughtered animals, and other filth contained in it: which, as observed by Dr Jennings, must make the bath so foul and fetid, that it would be more likely to poison than to cure. But this part of the inquiry involves another question, which although not essential either to the truth or to the right understanding of the history, has acquired an accidental importance, namely, the mode by which the miraculous but transient virtue was conveyed to the water. An angel is said to have gone down on these occasions into the pool, and to have troubled or agitated the water: the visible and supernatural effect being probably, as conjectured by Grotius, Lightfoot, and Doddridge, caused by an invisible and celestial agent: this mode of expression, in fact, implying a conviction, common with the Jews, that such things were effected by the ministration of angels. From the omission, however, in some ancient manuscripts, of the fourth verse of this chapter, and its being found in another in the shape of a marginal note, it has been contended by some, that this part of the narrative has been inserted without authority, in support of a popular superstition. The case of this disputed text is thus stated by Bishop Marsh, in his notes on Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament: "The Codex Ephrem (a very ancient Greek MS. of the New Testament in the Royal Library at Paris) has many marginal notes written in uncial letters, without accents. This proves what has been sometimes doubted, that marginal notes were made in the most ancient MSS., and that this practice prevailed in the early ages of Christianity. But these marginal scholia seem to have been confined to such MSS. as were in the hands of private persons; while those which have been used for church service, such as the Codex Bezae, are without them. It is likewise remarkable, that in this MS., the disputed, or rather spurious text of John v. 4, is written, not in the text, but in a marginal scholion. Now, as this verse is totally omitted in the Codex Bezae and the Codex Vaticanus, which are the two most ancient MSS. now extant; as it is likewise omitted in the Codex Ephrem (which is inferior in age to the Codex Bezae), but written in the margin as a scholion; is written in more modern MSS. in the text, but marked with an asterisk, or obelus, as suspicious; and in MSS. still more modern is written without any mark; we see the various gradations by which it has acquired its place in our present text; and have proof positive, that the verse was originally nothing more than a marginal scholion, and of course spurious. Other passages likewise in the Greek Testament owe their present existence in the printed editions to the same cause." But the rejection of the fourth verse as spurious, so long as the seventh remains an undisputed portion of the sacred text, is of very little importance; for here the two principal facts which the fourth verse relates, namely, the miraculous agitation of the water, and the single cure, which of course must also have been miraculous, are both implied. It matters not, indeed, in this view of the case, whether an angel was known, or only inferred, to have been present. It was the belief of the Jews, a belief warranted by numerous instances of the kind recorded in their scriptures, that every supernatural occurrence was effected by the agency of a heavenly messenger, or angel, specially appointed for that purpose; and it is as easy to conceive, that, in the present instance, the water was moved, and the healing virtue imparted to it, by an angel, as that these miraculous effects were caused in any other way. Admitting then the spuriousness of the disputed text as proved, neither the character nor the credibility of the miracle are thereby affected; the seventh verse implies as much of the statement of the fourth as it is necessary for us to know. And with respect to the means by which the miracle was accomplished, the revealed mode in which it has pleased the Almighty that supernatural events should frequently be brought about, and the belief of the Jewish church on this subject, leave it highly probable that the same mode was adopted in the present instance, although the evangelist has been silent on the subject. With respect to the times at which the miracle was performed, some confine it to a particular season; as, for instance, to that of the festival mentioned in the first verse. But the original implies no fixed and particular season: much less one of so rare occurrence as an annual feast. The words κατα καιρον, which are rendered in our translation 'at a certain season,' imply as well, according to time, or from time to time, or at times; on occasion, or occasionally: καθ' ημεραν, 'with the day,' or 'daily' (Acts ii. 46, 47); κατ' εναυτον, 'from year to year,' or 'year by year' (Heb. ix. 25; x. 1); κατ' οικον, 'from house to house' (Acts ii. 46); κατ' εικοσα ημετεραν και καθ' ορισμουν (Sept.), 'in,' or 'according to, our image and our likeness.' The precise time of the angel's visit was thus perhaps uncertain. At whatever time, however, and under whatever circumstances, this visit was made, we have reason to believe, from the terms employed, and from the benevolent object of the visit itself, that it was more frequently repeated than once in a year. Thus one happy individual at least, on each occasion, was relieved perhaps from agonising pain, and restored to health and his friends. But then, how many must have returned to their homes, bearing their diseases back with them, with the addition of fatigue and disappointment! True: but let it be remembered, that every one of these disappointed sufferers of Jerusalem possessed an advantage over the sick of all other places, and one which even we, at the present day, with all the means which the improved state of medical science can furnish, do not possess, namely, the knowledge, that let his case be ever so desperate, there existed a certain cure; which, although he had not been so fortunate as to find on this occasion, the ensuing one would renew the opportunity of obtaining. Thus hope was kept alive, pain mitigated, and faith exercised; and it is probable, that none who visited the pool duly impressed with their own helplessness, the greatness of the gift, and the power and goodness of the Giver, failed, sooner or later, of receiving the reward of their faith and perseverance. It is further to be observed, that, from the simple style of living of the ancient Jews, diseases were comparatively few; the number furnished by the population of Jerusalem bearing, in all probability, no proportion to that found in a similar population in civilized society at the present day. So that, supposing all the cases which had failed of obtaining relief elsewhere to have resorted to this last resource, and that in the aggregate they were justly entitled 'a great multitude,' the number might not have been so great as to preclude the chance of each being healed in course of time. Neither Philo nor Josephus notice this miracle; but that, as observed by Dr Macknight, in no way affects its credi-

is evident from the sense of all that were about them, who were actually carrying the one to his burial, and making preparation for the funeral of the other; so that had not our blessed Saviour been confident of the divine virtue residing in him, whereby he was able to recover them to life again, it would have been madness in him to have attempted to do it.

“He might suppose, perhaps, that there was a mistake in the people that were about them, and that these two young persons might possibly be in a lethargic state.” But, besides the folly of presuming upon a thing, which scarce happens once in a century, how could he tell, that, upon his touching the bier of the one, or the hand of the other, and calling upon them, they would instantly awake? And if they did not awake at his call, his whole pretensions of being a prophet sent from God, with a power to restore life to the dead, must as effectually have been ruined, as if the persons here supposed in a lethargy only, had actually been dead. But now, if we examine a little into our Lord’s conduct in both these cases, we shall find that he acted not upon any supposition of mistake in the people, but out of the fulness of the Godhead that dwelt in him bodily. He, coming to the city of Nain, attended with his disciples, meets at the gate the funeral of a certain young man, the only son of a woman that was a widow. The consideration of her destitute condition moved his compassion indeed; but, for all that, he might have let the funeral pass. None of the company either asked or challenged him to raise the dead youth: it was entirely his own offer; and an offer that no wise man, who set up for a prophet, would have ever made, had he not been conscious, as we find he was, that he was able to perform it.

While he was at Capernaum, a person of some note requests of him to go and heal his daughter, who was at the point of death. Before he could get to the house, a messenger comes, and acquaints the father that she was actually dead.¹ Here our Lord had a fair opportunity to excuse himself; for, though he might pretend to cure diseases, which was all that Jairus requested of him, yet it did not therefore follow that he was to raise the dead. But, instead of retracting, he offers, of his own accord, to go forward, and tells the father, as he afterwards did, that he would raise her to life again:² be not afraid; only believe, says he, and she shall be made whole, which he could never have said from any other principle than a consciousness of that³ almighty power whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself.

But, though our Lord was conscious of his divine power, yet, upon his coming to the ruler’s house, instead of making any ostentatious boast of it, we find him, by the modesty of his expression, the maid is not dead, but sleepeth, endeavouring to conceal it. It is, in a great measure, indeed, owing to his modesty, and great humility, that, instead of proclaiming, he requires the people so frequently to suppress the fame of his marvellous works: but in the present case he might have some regard to the character of Jairus, as ruler of the synagogue, and, by this advice of silence, dispense with his speaking publicly of a miracle, which might possibly draw the malice of the Scribes and Pharisees upon him, as well as upon himself. In the case of his raising Lazarus, we find, that, ⁴ ‘because, by reason of him many of the Jews went away, and believed on Jesus, the chief priests consulted,’ not only how to destroy Jesus, but ‘to put Lazarus likewise to death:’ and much of the same design might have been suspected, which our Saviour, by this kind caution, endeavoured to prevent, if it once came to their knowledge, that so great a man as a governor of a synagogue, by the miraculous recovery of his daughter, had forsaken the religion of his ancestors, and was become a convert to the Christian faith.

Gadara was one of the cities beyond Jordan, belonging to the country called Decapolis, which was sometimes in the hands of the Jews, and sometimes of the Syrians, but, at this time, was inhabited by both. The Syrians were heathens, and, consequently, made use of swine, not only for food, but for sacrifices likewise: and it is not improbable, that the Jews of the country might be tempted to feed swine, by the advantage they made in selling them to their heathen neighbours.⁵ This was against a prohibition of their law, it is true; but laws, we know, are not always observed, and perhaps least of all at Gadara, which, being in the extremities of the Jewish territories, and under the jurisdiction of heathens, left the Jews without any restraint upon them, but that of conscience, which is too frequently violated for the sake of gain.

To bring the matter then to a narrow compass. The swine which were destroyed, in consequence of the permission which our Saviour gave the evil spirits to enter into them, belonged either to the Jews, or Gentiles of Gadara: if they belonged to the Jews, it cannot be denied, but they were justly punished for breaking their own laws and constitutions, which forbade them to keep any; nor can our Saviour’s right of inflicting the punishment be called in question, because it was a received maxim among the Jews, that any person invested with the character of a prophet, and acting by the Spirit of God, might, without the assistance of a magistrate, put the laws in execution against offenders: and therefore, we, who acknowledge our Jesus to have been more than a prophet, can never be at a loss to account for his exercising an authority among the Jews, which, according to their own confession, was allowable in the lowest of that order. But, if the heathens of Gadara were the owners of these swine, our Saviour might be induced to permit the devils to enter into them, not only to teach them the sacredness of the Jewish laws, which they, on account of the prohibition of swine’s flesh, may be supposed to have ridiculed; but to cure them likewise of their idolatrous worship of demons, and to engage them to embrace the Christian faith. For when they saw our Lord’s power over such a multitude of devils, exhibited in their possession of such a number of swine, had they made a right application of the miracle, they could not but perceive the truth and divinity of his doctrine, and bility; as these writers have omitted other and greater transactions, which they had an opportunity of knowing. the madness of their worshipping such impure spirits, as were both cast out of the men at his command, and could not enter into the swine without his permission.

They could not but perceive, I say, that our Saviour was a prophet sent from heaven; that what he did was by a commission from God; and, consequently, that he could not be guilty of any injustice in the destruction of the swine, which, upon this supposition, was not his act, but the act of providence. He indeed, as a man, had no right to destroy the people's swine; but God, who is the supreme proprietor of the whole earth, most certainly had; and shall we then complain of him for such a punishment as this, when every day we see more surprising instances before our eyes? When we see him laying whole nations waste with pestilence, with famine, and with earthquakes, shall we confess his sovereign authority in these cases, and yet, upon the loss of two thousand swine, cry out, and say, why hast thou done this? The heathens themselves, upon the supposition of a providence, will acknowledge this to be unreasonable; nor can our Saviour, as acting by a divine commission, ever be justly blamed, because he once or twice did the same thing which God does every day.

But, after all, whether the proprietors were Jews or Gentiles, ¹ the words in the text do not imply, that our Saviour was either principal or accessory to the destruction of the swine. St Mark, indeed, tells us, that 'he gave the devils leave;' and St Luke, that 'he suffered them' to enter into the swine; but by this is meant no more, than that he did not prevent them; that he did not interpose his divine power, in order to hinder them from entering; but, if this made our Saviour a sharer in the destruction of the swine, by parity of reason, it will make God, because he permits it, answerable for all the evil that is done under the sun. Thus, whether we suppose the Jews or heathens owners of the herd of swine, our Saviour's permitting the devils to enter into them made him not accessory to their destruction; or, if it be said, that he did it with a punitive intent, it was either to make the Jews suffer for the breach of their law, or the heathens for their obstinate idolatry; which his character of a prophet, and the testimony of his being the Son of the most High, without all controversy, authorized him to do.

To know the true end and design of our Saviour's transfiguration, it may not be improper to look back a little into the context, where we find, that after Peter's confessing him to be ² 'the Christ, the Son of the living God, from that time he began to show unto his disciples, how that he must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders, and chief priests, and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day.' Nor was this all; for he foretold them, that they likewise were to suffer many grievous persecutions for his name's sake; and therefore he recommended to them the unpleasant doctrines of ³ 'self-denial, and taking up the cross, and following him,' with this great, though distant, encouragement, that ⁴ 'when the Son of Man should come in the glory of his Father, with his angels, he should reward every one according to his works.'

These predictions, doctrines, and promises, were so contrary to the expectations of his disciples, who hoped in him to have a temporal prince and deliverer, a restorer of the decayed state of Israel, and promoter of themselves to great honours and employments, that our Saviour thought proper, not many days after, in order to revive their faith and trust in him, and ⁵ to fortify their minds against what was likely to ensue, to take as many with him into the mount, as made up a legal evidence, and there to give them ocular conviction of what he had promised, in recompense of what they were to suffer, by assuming, for a while, the lustre ^a and appearance of a glorified body; which so raised their drooping hearts, that we find St Peter immediately declaring, ⁶ 'Lord, it is good for us to be here; and, if thou wilt, let us make here three tabernacles, one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias.' For the design of these words is, not only to secure his Master, by staying in that retreat, from the sufferings and death, which would be the consequence of his going up to Jerusalem, as St Chrysostom and others understand it, but to express likewise the pleasure and satisfaction he took in this transfiguration, and glorified company; and how he resumed fresh spirits and comforts from a miracle, which was emblematical of the glorious state, not of Christ only, but of all good Christians, after their resurrection.

The only instance we have in scripture of any transfiguration like unto this, is in the case of Moses, ⁷ after he had been forty days and forty nights with God on mount Sinai; for, upon his descent, we are told, 'that the skin of his face so shone, that the children of Israel were afraid to come nigh him; and therefore he put a veil on his face, while he talked with them.' That our blessed Lord, in the act of his transfiguration, might probably have respect to this preceding one of Moses, and, both in the nature of the change, and the place where it was wrought, design some conformity thereunto, is what we are at liberty to suppose; and consequently can account why the scene of this transaction was in a mountain, rather than a valley: and why the three apostles, Peter, James, and John, and not the whole multitude, were allowed to be spectators of it, we have several reasons to allege.

For besides that this was a vouchsafement, fit only to be communicated to such as were of his more immediate confidence, and stood in the highest degree of his esteem; to such as, for their zeal and affection to him, were honoured and distinguished ⁸ with a peculiar title, and, after his resurrection, appointed by providence to be the great pillars of his church; and besides, that it would have looked like vanity and ostentation in him to have taken the multitude into the mount, and there made a public sight of his miracles, which was the thing he always carefully declined: besides this, I say, there seems to be ^a This is the proper meaning of the word μεταμορφώθη. For μορφή, both in the Old and New Testaments, doth not signify the essence or constituent properties of a man, but only his external shape or appearance: as when it is said of Belshazzar, (Dan. v. 10.) and of Daniel, (chap. viii. 28.) that ἡ μορφή ἠλλιώθη, their forms were changed; of Nebuchadnezzar, that ἡ μορφή μου ἐπίστρεψεν ἐπ' ἐμέ, 'my form returned to me,' (Dan. iv. 36.) and of Christ that he appeared to two of his disciples ἐν ἑτέρῃ μορφῇ, 'in another form,' (Mark xvi. 12.) and therefore the word which is derived from it, can extend no further than to a change of the outward form or appearance only.—Whitby on Phil. ii. 6.

St Peter, who himself was one of those who were with him on the holy mount, gives us this account of it. ¹ 'We have not followed cunningly devised fables,' says he, 'when we made known unto you the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of his majesty; for he received from God the Father, honour and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.' Now, ² by his majesty in this place, most properly is to be understood that lustre and radiancy wherein he appeared, when his 'face shone as the sun, and his garments,' pierced through with the beams that were darted from his body, 'became white as light.'³ For to shine as the sun, is a phrase expressing something belonging to celestial majesty; and white and splendid garments are proper for kings, and ⁴royal ministers of the heavenly court. And, in like manner, by the 'excellent glory', from whence the voice proceeded, can be meant nothing but the bright and shining cloud that then appeared, which the Jews call the shechinah, and is made up, as most imagine, of an host of angels, the constant symbol of the divine presence; and how great and magnificent this symbol is, we may, in some measure, learn from the vision of the prophet Daniel: ⁵'the ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like pure wool. His throne was like the fiery flames, and his wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream had issue from before him; thousands of thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him.'

Supposing then that this was the manner of our Saviour's transfiguration; that not only, in his own person, he was arrayed with all his glory and lustre, but had likewise an angelic host surrounding him, two of the greatest prophets of ancient ages attending him, and a voice from heaven, declaring him to be the well-beloved Son of God: while the multitude stood by, and saw and heard all this, it would have been almost unavoidable, but that, upon such conviction of his being the Messiah, ⁶'they would have taken him by force, and made him a king.' But since, as our Saviour tells us, his ⁷'kingdom was not of this world,' nor to come with the pomp and observation which the Jews expected; and since one of his great concerns was, that no disturbance of the civil government should be occasioned by him, or laid to his charge, he wisely made choice of three only, but these the principal of his apostles, to whom he exhibited a specimen of his future glory; which had he done to the multitude, it might probably have occasioned a general insurrection; and, as he came down from the mount, he charged them, 'that they should tell the vision to no man, till after his resurrection.'

From the word, ὄραμα which we render vision, some have supposed that Moses and Elias were not there in their proper persons, but that the apostles, in their fancy and imagination, had only a strong idea or impression of them; or, at most, that their spectres, or some sha-dowy resemblance of them, only were there. Since the evangelists, however, speak of them in a personal character and capacity; since they represent them as talking with Christ, and speaking of his decease, which he was to accomplish at Jerusalem; since they tell us, that when they were come out of the ecstasy into which this vision had cast them, they saw two men standing with him; it is much more probable to think, that Moses and Elias were really there, and that God had, somewhere or other, from the time of their departure out of this world, preserved both their bodies to this end. The scriptures, indeed, are express as to Elias, that he was translated into heaven by the ministry of angels resembling ⁸a chariot of fire, and horses of fire; and it is a pretty general opinion, ⁹both among Jewish and Christian authors taken, as is supposed, from some apocryphal book, that Moses did not die, but was translated into heaven, or some terrestrial paradise, in the same manner as were Enoch and Elias. There is a passage in St Jude, where ¹⁰Michael the archangel is said to contend with the devil, and dispute about the body of Moses which, if taken in a literal sense, will greatly favour this opinion; for if we can but suppose that ¹¹the contest between this good and evil angel concerning Moses's body, related not to its burial, as some will have it, but its assumption into heaven, or some other place of happiness, which the devil might oppose, and urge the obligation of his dying the common death of all men, for this reason more especially, because he had once taken away the life of an Egyptian: if we can but suppose, I say, that the contest arose upon this subject, then we may easily conceive both how Moses might subsist in a separate state from the time of his assumption, and how he, together with Elias, might be dispatched from thence upon this occasion, to set off the lustre of our Lord's transfiguration, by their appearing at the same time in their resplendent robes of glory.

And indeed, if this was the purpose of their errand, what subject can we suppose so proper, and so well becoming the conversation of three such illustrious persons, as the redemption of mankind by the death and passion of the Son of God? What these two ancient prophets had in their times imperfectly revealed, nay what the angels of heaven desire at all times to look into, namely, the harmony of the divine attributes in this stupendous work, ¹²the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God, and ¹³'the breadth, and length, and depth, and height, of the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge; ¹⁴mysteries which have been hid from ages, and from generations, but are now made manifest to the saints: ¹⁵these were the sublime subjects, for these are implied in ¹⁶their speaking of Christ's decease, of their conversation at this interview; and, in comparison of these, how jejune and worthless are all the wise sayings of philosophers, or compositions of human wit? With good reason, therefore, might the great apostle of the Gentiles, who himself was no mean proficient in what the world falsely calls knowledge, instead of the ¹⁶excellence of speech and wisdom, determine to know nothing among his Corinthians, 'but Jesus Christ, and him crucified;' for ¹ 'we preach Christ crucified,' says he, 'unto the Jews a stumbling-block, and unto the Greeks foolishness; but unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God; for ² of God he is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption.'

The scriptures, upon all occasions, acquaint us, that the Baptist, through the whole course of his ministry, had borne constant and ample testimony to our Saviour's divine mission; that he exhorted those who came to him to rest their faith, not on himself, but on him that should come after him; and that as soon as he was acquainted who he was, by a visible descent of the Holy Ghost, and a voice from heaven, he made it his business to dispose the Jews in general, and his own disciples in particular, to receive and reverence him, by testifying every where, that he was the Son of God, the Lamb of God, who came from above, and spake the words of God, and to whom God had not given the Spirit by measure. And yet after all this, ³ some are of opinion, that the Baptist might have the same conception of Christ's temporal kingdom that the rest of the Jewish nation had; and that his long and irksome imprisonment might by this time have tempted him to doubt, whether he, who by birth was his relation, and from whose assistance, very probably, he expected a deliverance, was in reality the Messiah. ⁴ It seems, however, not a little injurious to the character of the Baptist, to suppose either his constancy so shaken, or his behaviour so inconsistent with itself, as, after such open and solemn declaration, to admit of any doubt, whether our Lord were he that should come, that is, the long promised and universally expected Messiah. And therefore ^a the safest way is, to conclude, that he did

^a Few questions have been more debated than the purpose of John's sending this message to Jesus. Some ancients and many moderns think that he sent in order to satisfy certain doubts which had occurred to his mind during his confinement. But surely his view of the descent of the holy Ghost at Christ's baptism, the testimony he then heard from heaven, the divine impulse by which he recognised Jesus as 'the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world,' and his own reiterated testimonies forbid such a supposition: and to imagine that John's confinement should have affected the strength of his resolves, or drawn from him the language of fretful remonstrance, or peevish complaint, would do great injustice to so noble a character. In short, the opinion has been shown to be utterly untenable by Chrys., Euthem., Theophyl., and Greg., of the ancients; and of the moderns, Hamm., Whithy, Doddr., Bp. Atterbury, and Mr Benson (Hulsean Lectures, 1820, pp. 60—67.); who maintain, that John sent for the satisfaction of his disciples, who, mortified at seeing their master imprisoned for preaching the coming of the Messiah; and disappointed that he whom he testified to be such, should make no such claim; nor make any attempt to deliver his forerunner: stumbling, too, at the humbleness of Jesus's birth, and the lowliness of his station; and offended at his difference in character from their own ascetic master, had entertained doubts as to his Messiahship. Against them, therefore, and not against John, the rebuke is levelled. It should seem that for their satisfaction John had sent; and as they would not heed his repeated endeavours to remove their doubts, he resolved to refer them to Christ himself, for the removal of their scruples; and that our Lord, well aware of his intention, took the surest means of fixing the wavering minds of his disciples, by displaying such not send this message with a design to satisfy any scruples of his own, but purely for the sake and conviction of his disciples who brought it; to set them right in their notions, and confirm them in the belief of Jesus, and so turn them over to their proper and better master, now that himself was upon the point of leaving the world. And this was the rather necessary, because their immoderate zeal, and partial respect for the Baptist, had hitherto made them averse to Jesus, and envious at his honour and miracles. What John had discoursed to them formerly upon this subject had made but little impression upon them; and therefore, in compassion to their infirmities, he condescended to have their scruples propounded in his own name; and our Saviour's method of resolving them, which was by showing them that the miracles which he wrought were the same kind that the Messiah was to do, gave so great satisfaction, that when their former master was gone, they repaired to him with the melancholy news of his death, and, according to the received tradition, for ever after became his constant disciples.

supernatural endowments as should completely answer to the predicted character of the Messiah; and then sent them to their master for the application. With respect to the reply itself, both the manner and the matter of it are highly deserving of attention. As to the former, it is, as Bp. Atterbury observes, not direct and positive, but so ordered only, as to give them an occasion of answering the question themselves, which they had proposed to Christ. As to the latter, the learned prelate, with his usual taste, ably points out the gradation to be observed in the particulars, and the appositeness of it in relation to the inquiries. So that the words, 'Go show John,' &c., may mean, 'You come to learn of me whether I am the Messiah. Your master has often told you I am he, but you will not believe him. To him you should have gone as my forerunner: to me it belongs not so properly to proclaim my own titles, which might excite your suspicion. Behold therefore the testimony of God! for the works which I am doing before your eyes bear witness that the Father hath sent me.' The description of the works in question is so framed as to be taken from a prophecy of Isaiah lxi. 1. and xxxv. 5. 6. of the Messiah. Thus it is as if our Lord had said, 'Ye believe not the Baptist's testimony, that I am he who should come. Yet surely Isaiah, whom ye so reverence, and upon whose authority ye have received the Baptist himself, will obtain credence with you; and he has thus prophesied of me.'—Bloomfield's Greek Testament on Mat. xi. 3.

^b The Jews, above all nations, delighted in this way of reasoning. Their books, at this day, are full of such parables as our Saviour used; and are generally introduced in a form of speech not unlike his. 'Whereunto shall I liken such or such a thing? Nay, in the talmudical treatises, such as the treatise Killaim, there is a dispute of sowing upon the rocks and stones, and of mixing wheat and tares together; and in Peah, a tract in the Jerusalem Talmud, there is mention made of a tree of mustard-seed, which one might climb up into, like other trees. So that our Saviour was by no means to blame, but rather highly to be commended, for pursuing this parabolical way of teaching morality, which was the most celebrated method among the Jews. For his farther vindication, however, some have observed, that what our Saviour delivered in this manner did not contain the fundamental precepts and doctrines of the gospel, for these were taught with sufficient clearness in the 5th, 6th, and 7th chapters of St Matthew, but only the mysteries relating to the progress of the gospel, and the event of it among the Jews and Gentiles; and the Jews themselves acknowledge, that the predictions of this nature were usually taught in allegorical and emblematical expressions, being not so necessary to be known, that a man must discover his ignorance, who pretends to assert that our blessed Saviour attempted any innovation, when he first began to instruct the people in a parabolical way; since several of his discourses of this kind, particularly that ¹ of the rich glutton, and ² of the foolish virgins, ³ are acknowledged to be borrowed from the writings of their rabbins.

The truth is, ⁴ the eastern way of reasoning was so different from that of the west, that the soundest philosophy of Greece or Rome would have been mere jargon and cant at Jerusalem. The only method of reasoning, which was agreeable to the Jewish taste, was to usher in a handsome simile, or story, apposite to the matter in hand; to apply a smart saying of some ancient worthy; or to bring good proof from their law, or ancient tradition; but to go to prove morality to them, as Plato or Tully do, from the eternal rules of justice, from the rectitude and honourableness of virtue, and the depravity and turpitude of vice, would have been such a way of talking, as the wisest men of their way of education would have greatly despised; and therefore our blessed Saviour, who was well acquainted with the temper and customs of the people with whom he conversed, took care that his way of instructing them should be such as was most agreeable to their education, and consequently such as would tend more to their edification, than if he had introduced the philosophic method of morality, which was only in use in such nations as were destitute of the benefits of a divine revelation.

The heathens indeed couched their religious mysteries under fables and allegories, out of a principle both of fear and policy, to conceal them from the contempt of the vulgar, and to excite the study and curiosity of the learned. But in this latter design they seem to be mistaken, because the learned could no sooner look into the matters hid under these fables, but they must have discovered their shame, absurdity, and ridiculousness. The design of our Lord's speaking to the people in parables was quite contrary to this, as himself declares, namely, ⁵ 'because they seeing see not, and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand,' which words, ^a both in sacred and profane authors, are a proverbial expression, concerning men so wicked and so slothful, that either they attend not to, or will not follow, the clearest intimations and convictions of their duty; and therefore, to awaken their attention, and make the stronger impression upon them, our Saviour was forced to have recourse to parables.

This passage, indeed, in the other evangelists that mention it, seems to bear a different sense, ⁶ 'unto them that are without, all these things are done in parables, that seeing they may see, and not perceive, and hearing they may hear, and not understand;' or, as it is in St Luke, ⁷ 'that seeing they might not see, and hearing they might not understand;' as if our Lord had spoken to the multitudes in parables, that is, in a plain and familiar way, on purpose that they might not understand him, which, besides the contradiction, seems to include a spice of malevolence, where there never was any. ⁸ But all this is occasioned by the mistake of our translators, who, both in St Mark and St Luke have rendered the word ὅρα, by that, which should have been because; for this gives the words a quite different turn: in St Mark, 'because seeing they do see, and not perceive,' and in St Luke, 'because seeing they see not, and hearing they understand not.' The natural import of which is this,—
 "That the Jews, by reason of their prejudices, not being able to understand the great mysteries of the gospel, our Saviour, out of love to their souls, accommodated himself to their capacities, by speaking to them in parables, that is, in metaphors and similitudes, borrowed from things temporal and corporeal, in order to bring them to a more competent understanding, of his doctrine." ^b

⁸ Howell's History, in the Notes.

^b The passage which the author here attempts to explain is thus paraphrased by Doddridge.—“And he replying said unto them, I thus express myself in parables, because, though it is granted, through the divine goodness, to you, whose hearts are open to receive the truth in the love of it, to know and understand the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, which have been long concealed; yet it is not granted to others, who are prejudiced against them, but they are justly suffered to continue unacquainted with them: and therefore to them that are without, and who are strangers, through their own neglect and folly, to what they might before have learned, all these things are now involved in parables and figures: which, though they affect the mind of the attentive hearer, and promote his edification, are disregarded by the rest, and only looked upon as an empty amusement. For to every one who hath any talent committed to him, and shows that he hath it by his diligent improvement of it, yet more shall be given, and he shall have a still greater abundance of means for his further improvement; but even that which he already hath shall be taken away from the slothful creature, and be withdrawn from him who acts like one who hath not any thing to improve. (compare Luke viii. 18.) Thus wise men deal with their servants; and thus God will generally act in dispensing opportunities of a religious nature. And therefore, on this very principle do I now speak to them in parables, whereas I have formerly used the plainest manner of discourse: because seeing, they see not; and hearing, they hear not, neither do they understand; inasmuch as they do not honestly use the faculties that God has given them, but are like persons that have their eyes and ears, and yet will neither see nor hear. So that it is in just displeasure that I preach to them in this obscure language, that what has been their crime may be their punishment; that seeing my miracles, they may see the outward act, but not perceive the evidence arising from them; and hearing my discourses, they may indeed hear the sound of them, but not understand their true intent and meaning; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins shall be forgiven them, which to many of these people they never shall. And thus in them is the prophecy of Isaias most exactly fulfilled, (Isa. vi. 9, 10.) which indeed was originally intended to include them, and saith, ‘By hearing, you shall hear,’ (or you may still go on to hear with eagerness,) but you shall not understand; and seeing you shall see, or you may still go on to see, but you shall not perceive. For, like a wretch who has besotted and stupified himself with riot, the heart or intellectual faculty of this people is, as it were, grown stiff with fatness, and they hear with heavy ears, and draw up their eyes

^a To this purpose the prophet Jeremiah, to a revolting and rebellious people, which had cast off the fear of God, speaks in this wise: ‘hear now this, ye foolish people, and without understanding, which have eyes, and see not, which have ears, and hear not,’ chap. v. 21. And in like manner God speaks to Ezekiel: ‘Son of man, thou dwellest in the midst of a rebellious house, which have eyes to see, and see not; that have ears to hear, and hear not, for they are a rebellious house,’ chap. xii. 2. Philo uses the phrase in the same signification: for, speaking of those that were addicted to wine, and sensual pleasures, he says, ὁρῶντες, οὐκ ὁρῶσι, καὶ ἀκούοντες, οὐκ ἀκούουσιν, ‘they seeing, see not, and hearing, do not hear;’ and Demosthenes mentions it as a common proverb, ὁρῶντας, μὴ ὁρᾶν, καὶ ἀκούοντας, μὴ ἀκοῦν.—Whitby's Annotations on Mat. xiii.

¹ 'To you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but not to them,' does not therefore imply, that our Saviour's parables were dark and obscure, and that by speaking to the people in this manner, he had a design to conceal any truth that was requisite for them to know; but only, that he made a fuller discovery of his doctrine to his disciples, than it was necessary at that time to make to the multitude; that he instructed them in private, and enlarged upon the sense of his parables, and let them into the knowledge of several things, that were not yet proper to be communicated to all, because they were his peculiar friends, and his constant as if they were more than half asleep; so that one would imagine they were afraid lest at any time they should happen to be roused, so as to see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their hearts, and should be converted, and I should heal and save them. I therefore justly leave them to their own obstinacy, and direct thee, O Isaiah, to methods which I know will increase it."—Doddridge's Family Expositor, end of sect. 65. On the same subject Doddridge has the following notes:—A late learned writer has endeavoured to prove that Christ's use of parables was not in displeasure, but in tender condescension to their aversion to truths delivered in a less pleasing manner: but this is in effect supposing both Mark, (chap. iv. 12.) and Luke (chap. viii. 10.) to have reported what our Lord says in a sense directly contrary to what he intended; for they say in so many words, it was that the multitude might not perceive, nor understand; and it also makes Mat. xiii. 12. both foreign and opposite to the purpose for which it was spoken. We must therefore submit to the difficulties which attend this natural interpretation; which are much lessened by considering that this happened after Christ had upbraided and threatened the neighbouring places, (from whence doubtless the greatest part of the multitude came,) which was some time before this sermon; (see Mat. xi. 20—24. s. 58.) And it is not improbable, that the scribes and Pharisees, who had so vilely blasphemed him this very morning, (Mat. xii. 24.) might with an ill purpose have gathered a company of their associates and creatures about Christ to insnare him; which, if it were the case, will fully account for such a reserve.—It signifies little to plead on the other side, that these parables are plain. Their being so to us, is no proof they were so to these hearers: and since the apostles themselves did not understand even that of the sower, it is no wonder if the rest were unintelligible to the careless and captious hearer.—Consistent with all this is what was said of the advantages attending this method, to those who were honest and attentive; in the paraphrase on Mark iv. 2. Seeing you shall see, but you shall not perceive. This is a just translation of the original, both here and in Isaiah; and is another considerable argument for the interpretation here given of the whole context.—A pious and learned friend, by whose kind animadversions I have been led to insert some additional notes in this work, has urged several arguments to prove that this clause should be rendered, 'seeing, &c., you WILL not perceive.' But on the mature review of this passage both in Isaiah and the several places where it occurs in the New Testament, I cannot apprehend that it was spoken merely by way of complaint, but think it plain that it was intended also as a prediction; (compare Mark iv. 12; Luke viii. 10; John xii. 40; Acts xxviii. 26, 27; Rom. xi. 8.) Now in predictions, we generally render the future form, "Such or such a thing SHALL happen," though we only mean to express the certainty of the event, without denying the freedom of the moral agents concerned in it, or detracting from it in any degree. (Ibid. notes (k) and (l).) The correction of the received translation which the author proposes in Mark iv. 12. and Luke viii. 10. does not rest upon sufficient ground, and is evidently introduced to get rid of an apparent difficulty, which is removed by the above extract from Doddridge. Dr Boothroyd follows the received translation of the passage, and Dr Bloomfield contends that the ha does not signify because, but with the design that, eo consilio ut, and observes that the sense of Mark iv. 1. 2. is: "'To the multitude, all things are propounded by the intervention of parables; with the intent that, as the prophet says, since they have eyes and years perfect, and yet see not, nor understand, they may not repent and obtain forgiveness of their sins.'"—Ed.

companions; were more disposed to receive his doctrine; were afterwards to be the preachers of it; and at length to seal the truth of it with their blood.

They were honest and well-designing men; but it would be doing too great a compliment to their understanding, to say, that there was any thing extraordinary, until they were endued from above, in their sagacity and penetration: and therefore we are not to impute it to the obscurity of our Saviour's parables, that we find his disciples so frequently at a loss for the meaning of them, since some of them were quoted from Jewish authors, and many of them taken from the most obvious and common things, but we should rather impute it to their natural dulness and want of apprehension, as we find our Saviour himself does, when, upon their requesting him to expound the plain parable of the sower, he could not forbear saying, with admiration, ² 'Know ye not this parable, and how then shall ye know all parables?'

It was not then to cloud and obscure, but rather illustrate and enforce his meaning, that our Lord delivered himself so frequently in parables; and the reason why he refused to gratify the Pharisees in their desire of a sign from heaven, was, because he had already done miracles enough to satisfy them, had not their obstinacy been proof against all conviction. In that very chapter ³ wherein they make this insolent demand, they had seen, before their faces, ⁴ a withered hand made whole, and, ⁵ upon the ejection of a devil, a blind and dumb man restored to his sight and speech; but observe the turn which their resolute infidelity gives to the miracles: ⁶ 'this fellow does not cast out devils, but by Beelzebub, the prince of the devils;' and yet these very men have the modesty, in a few verses after, to come to the person they had just before reviled and blasphemed at this rate, with this arrogant demand; ⁷ 'Master, we would see a sign from thee.' After such an affront, would it have become the meekest man upon earth to gratify these men in any request whatever? But much more, would it have become the majesty of the Son of God to prostitute his divine power, merely to satisfy the curiosity, for that was all they wanted to have satisfied, of such abandoned miscreants?

The sign, which they wanted to see, may be supposed to be, either such ⁸ a shower of manna, as Moses; or such ⁹ a clap of thunder, as Samuel; or ¹⁰ such a fall of fire, as Elijah; or ¹¹ such an arrest of the sun, as Joshua once called for. Now, supposing that our Saviour had been flexible enough to humour them in their unreasonable request, ¹² what grounds have we to think, that these aerial or celestial prodigies would have wrought in them any more conviction than those miracles, which were uncontested, done in their presence, within their feeling, and compass of examination? These, we see, they imputed to a diabolical power, and much more might they do it to those that were at so vast a distance, since they could not be ignorant of what is said of the prince of the power of the air in the book of Job, namely, that the fire, which fell from heaven, and consumed that holy man's substance, as well as the wind which overturned the house, where his children were met together, were the effects of Satan's procuring.

What notions the ancient Jews had of the power of magic, we cannot positively say; but it is certain, that the heathen magicians made it their boast, ^a that they could stop the course of the sun, moon, and stars, turn them into darkness, as they pleased, and make them obey their voice: and, if the Pharisees had the like notions of these things, their demanding a sign from heaven was to no manner of purpose; because, upon their own supposition, that our Lord acted by a magical power, what they desired him to do, was not above the sphere of his ability, and, if they thought it so, it could never have wrought in them any good conviction; because the same hardness of heart, and hatred of him, would have kept them under the same persuasion still, that all his wonders, whether above or below, whether in heaven or on earth, whether on human or celestial bodies, were done by the assistance of the devil.

Since then no sign that the Pharisees could ask, even had our Saviour condescended to work it, would have been effectual to their conviction, our Saviour was not unkind in remitting them to one, that would not fail of convincing them, that what he did was not by a diabolical but divine power. For, since it was agreed on all hands, that a person, when dead, whatever he had in his lifetime, could not then have the devil at his command; if, after they had crucified him, they should find him restored to life again, this would be a sign wherein there could be no fallacy; that as his restoration was from the hand of God, so his commission had all along been from the same; and ¹ that, as Jonas's miraculous escape from the whale's belly, wherewith the Ninevites were doubtless acquainted, was a powerful means to confirm to them the truth of his prophetic office; so now, though all Christ's miracles, while living, prevailed but little, yet, after his death and resurrection from the grave, he would then be credited, in the same manner as Jonas was; ² 'he would then draw all men after him,' and the very Pharisees themselves would be prevailed upon to acknowledge his divine mission. This is the sense of his comparing himself so often with the prophet Jonas: and that the chief priests and Pharisees understood the comparison in this sense, is manifest from what they say to Pilate: ³ 'Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, after three days I will rise again;' for I no where remember, that he made any declaration to the chief priests and Pharisees, though he did it frequently to his apostles, of his intended resurrection after three days, but only in this comparison of himself to Jonas.

Had human wisdom indeed been consulted in the election of Christ's apostles, it would have made choice of the profoundest rabbins, the acutest philosophers, and the most powerful orators, who, by the strength of reason, and arts of eloquence, might have triumphed over the minds of men, grappled with the stubbornness of the Jews, and baffled the fine notions and speculations of the Greeks and Romans; but then it must be allowed, that one argument for the proof of the divinity of the Christian religion had been lost. Nay, it might have been objected, 'that no wonder, indeed, that this religion should thrive so well in the world, when it had all human advantages to assist it, and was supported and carried on by the united force of the reason and eloquence of such renowned scholars.' But now, by making choice of weak and illiterate persons to be his apostles, and first publishers of the gospel, our Lord has taken an effectual means, that ⁴ 'our faith should not stand,' as St Paul expresses it, 'in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God,' because 'their speech and their preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in the demonstration of the Spirit, and of power.'

And, indeed, what less than a divine power could have enabled a few illiterate mechanics, who had no art, no address of their own, to propagate a new and unheard-of religion, contrary to the laws every where established, and contrary to man's natural passions and appetites, with such a wonderful success, as, in the space of twenty or thirty years, to extend it over all the principal parts of the Roman empire, and, in the next age, to fill all places, cities, and islands, castles and boroughs, palaces and senates, courts and camps, with multitudes of converts, as the great apologist, Tertullian, justly glories? Doubtless, if ever there was an intervention of divine power in human affairs, it was here, 'when ⁵ God chose the foolish and weak things of the world to confound the wise and mighty,' and when simplicity and ignorance not only had the advantage, but absolutely triumphed over all the wit, and learning, and power, and policy of the world.

That therefore the mighty force of Christianity, to make its way through the greatest obstacles, might more evidently appear, the instruments which our Saviour employed in the propagation of it, so far as their own abilities, either natural or acquired, were concerned, were the meanest that can be imagined, but, by an extraordinary communication of his blessed Spirit to them, he inspired them with the gift of languages, that they might be able to address themselves to people of all nations; with the power of working miracles, that they might be able to confirm the truth of the doctrine which they taught; and, upon all emergencies, ⁶ 'with such a mouth and wisdom, as all their adversaries were not able to gainsay or resist.'

These, and several other gifts extraordinary, did more than supply the natural defects which the apostles laboured under in the execution of so great a work; but now that these gifts are withdrawn, our religion established, and the canon of the holy scriptures completed, their successors have a different province to manage. Instead of travelling all the world over, and compassing sea and land to gain proselytes to the Christian faith, their duty is, to keep in order the things that are settled, and ⁷ 'to feed the flock of God that is among them, taking the oversight thereof, not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; not as lords over God's inheritance, but as examples to their flocks;' and, instead of delivering to their respective churches such writings as might, in all ages, be the pillar and foundation of truth, their business is to study the scriptures, which they have received, to defend their authority, and expound their sense; ¹ 'to preach the word,' as the apostle to Timothy specifies their office; 'to be instant in season, and out of season; to reprove, rebuke, and exhort, with all long-suffering and doctrine;' and what compass of learning and share of influence among the people are requisite to a due discharge of all this, 'as ² a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of God,' wants no detail of arguments to prove, since we find the great apostle St Paul, amidst all the gifts that were then dispensed to the church, and the particular revelations which were vouchsafed him, upon the consideration of the weightiness of his office, crying out, and saying, ³ 'who is sufficient for these things?' Upon the whole, therefore, we may observe, that it was highly requisite, that the apostles and first publishers of the gospel, and the present ministers and preachers of it, should be men of different characters and abilities; that the former of these, for the more effectual discharge of their office, should have several kinds of gifts supernatural, the latter no more than was the product of their own labour and acquisition; or, to speak in the phrase of the scripture, that as, at first, our Saviour ⁴ 'gave some apostles; some prophets; and some evangelists;' so now he should appoint some 'rulers, some pastors, and some teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ; till we all come, in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.'

⁵ That anger, considered in itself, and upon all occasions whatever, is unlawful, neither the most rigid philosophers, nor the most severe Christians, have ever been able to prove. It is one of those passions that are implanted in us by the God of nature. The first motions of it seem to be mechanical, and the hastiness or slowness of it depends, in a great measure, upon the temper of the body, and the animal spirits: so far then as it is natural, we dare not account it criminal, for fear of making God, who hath implanted it in us, the author of sin. Those who define it 'a desire of revenge,' or of doing evil to another, purely because he has done so to us, make it indeed a sinful passion, and a plain violation of that command which requires us ⁶ 'not to avenge ourselves, but rather give place unto wrath;' but if it be considered ⁷ as proceeding upon a desire of obtaining satisfaction for some injury done to us, or to those for whom we are concerned, the honour of God, the reverence due to the laws, the love of virtue, and the protection of good men, may make this not only innocent, but highly necessary and commendable. There is a tameness of spirit that justly deserves censure; and in some cases we even do not well unless we are angry: and for this reason, I make no doubt it was, ⁸ that our blessed Saviour, on some occasions, suffered himself to be seen in some degrees of this passion, namely to evince the lawfulness of it, and, by his example, to confute the doctrine of those heathen stoics, who condemned the use of all passions, and were for making those natural tendencies which God has given us altogether superfluous.

For religion admits of no such paradoxical notions; when it requires us to be ⁹ slow to wrath, it allows of the passion upon a just provocation, and only blames him ¹⁰ who is angry with his brother without a cause; and when it gives us this caution, ¹¹ 'be angry and sin not, let not the sun go down upon your wrath,' it supposes the thing itself warrantable, and only prohibits the excess or long duration of it. It is the rash, causeless, and continued anger, that our holy religion condemns: but who shall say, that our Saviour's resentment to the Pharisees was not upon good grounds, when they, by their traditions, had made void the moral law, excused men from doing what God had commanded, and laid upon them other unnecessary burdens, which he had no where enjoined? When the pride and arrogance of their sect, and their contempt and hatred of all that contradicted them, made it necessary for him to use some smartness in his reprehensions, thereby to excite them to sensibility of their errors, they ¹² had consulted with the Herodians how they might destroy him; the works which he did by the finger of God, they had ascribed to a diabolical power; and therefore no wonder that he should look upon them with indignation, because of the hardness of their hearts. But when there was no such cause for any degree of anger, and where the glory of God was not immediately concerned, his whole life was the most perfect pattern of meekness and patience, according to that prediction concerning him, ¹³ 'he shall not cry, nor lift up, nor cause his voice to be heard in the streets, a bruised reed shall he not break, and the smoking flax shall he not quench.'

But how comes it then, that St Mark, in his gospel, represents our Saviour a person that was supposed ¹⁴ to be beside himself? Various are the significations which are given to the word ἐξίστην in this place; but there are three that bid fairest for the solution of that difficulty. ¹⁵ In the preceding verse it is said, that the multitude came so fast upon him, that he had not time to take any food to recruit his spirits; and thereupon some interpreters would have the word signify his fainting through hunger, or being in danger of falling into a deliquium by spending his spirits, and taking no manner of refreshment to revive them. ¹⁶ Others had rather mean by the word such an ecstasy, or transport of mind, as those who are moved with a vehement zeal, or prophetic spirit, are wont to be affected with; and consequently that his friends' apprehensions were, that, in the execution of his prophetic office, that is, in his preaching and instructing the people, he expended his strength too much, forgetful of that care and preservation which he ought to have had of himself. But for my part I cannot see why the word may not here be taken in its common and ordinary sense, for what is called madness and distraction. We acknowledge, indeed, that our Lord, neither in his actions nor gestures, showed ever any symptoms of a disordered mind: nor could his relations, from any behaviour of his, conceive any such thing of him: but then the words in the text, ἐλεγον γὰρ, 'for they said,' may not relate to his friends, but to other people who had raised this report of him. The Pharisees had given out that he had a devil, and did all these miracles by a confederacy with him: and others who did not run to this length of blasphemy, said nevertheless that he was mad, and his head turned; and when this came to his friends' ears, they, out of a charitable design perhaps, went to apprehend him, supposing that he might possibly be under some such disorder; and not rightly understanding the end of his mission, as the evangelist¹ informs us, that some of his kindred did not believe in him. And indeed,² if we consider with ourselves how common a thing it is to look upon those who think or speak, or act in a manner different from other people, as fools and madmen; how this was the fate³ of the young prophet before Jehu's companions, and of St Paul⁴ before Festus; we shall not think it strange that our Lord should fall under the same opprobrious imputation, or that his relations, who had no true conception of him or his office, hearing of this rumour, should endeavour to get him into their custody, and so prevent his exposing himself to the scorn and derision of those that hated him. For though some of the people were of opinion, that 'he spake as never man spake,'⁵ yet many of them said, he has a devil, and is mad, why hear ye him?⁶

The name of Peter or Cephas, as it is in the Syriac, our blessed Lord gave to Simon, when his brother Andrew first brought them together; and in allusion to this name it is, that he calls him the rock, or stone, upon which he intended to build his church. Some indeed by this rock think, that our Saviour intends himself,⁷ and that, in uttering these words, he pointed at his own person, as he seems to have done upon another like occasion, when he speaks to the Jews,⁸ destroy this temple, meaning his own body, and in three days I will raise it up: but the sense seems abstruse, and the transition abrupt, that our⁹ Saviour, speaking to Peter, and calling him a rock, should, with the same breath, pass to himself, and yet not say, upon myself but upon this rock, and St Peter was the only rock he mentioned, will I build my church.¹⁰ Others therefore would rather have St Peter's faith and confession to be the rock here spoken of, as it must be acknowledged indeed, that, in this confession of his, the sum and substance of the Christian doctrine is comprised; but then it should be considered, that as our Lord, without all doubt, meant to say something singular to St Peter, as a reward of his frank confession of him, if this confession was all the rock he intended, here was nothing particular said to the apostle, and yet, at the same time, the whole grace of the allusion to his name was entirely lost. It is reasonable therefore to think,¹¹ that as our Saviour here directs his speech, not to the whole college of the apostles, but to St Peter only, and seems to promise him something peculiar as the reward of his liberal confession, the sense of the expression should be, that he would, in a more eminent manner, make use of his ministry, in laying the first foundation of the Christian church, both among the Jews and Gentiles, as we find he did the former,¹⁰ in his most efficacious sermon at the day of pentecost, and the latter,¹¹ in the conversion of Cornelius and his company.

There is a passage in Isaiah, which, as some imagine, helps us to the knowledge of what our Saviour means 'by the keys of the kingdom of heaven;'^b it is where God foretells Eliakim,¹² that he 'will call him and clothe him with the robe of Shebna, (who¹³ was over the household,) and strengthen him with his girdle, and commit his government into his hand and lay the key of the house of David^c upon his shoulder,' &c. Now, because the

^b On this subject Bishop Horsley has the following excellent remarks. St Peter's custody of the keys was a temporary, not a perpetual authority: its object was not individuals, but the whole human race. The kingdom of heaven upon earth is the true church of God. It is now, therefore, the Christian church;—formerly the Jewish church was that kingdom. The true church is represented in this text, as in many passages of holy writ, under the image of a walled city, to be entered only at the gates. Under the Mosaic economy these gates were shut, and particular persons only could obtain admittance,—Israelites by birth, or by legal incorporation. The locks of these gates were the rites of the Mosaic law, which obstructed the entrance of aliens. But, after our Lord's ascension, and the descent of the Holy Ghost, the keys of the city were given to St Peter, by that vision which taught him, and authorised him to teach others, that all distinctions of one nation from another were at an end. By virtue of this special commission, the great apostle applied the key, pushed back the bolt of the lock, and threw the gates of the city open for the admission of the whole gentile world, in the instance of Cornelius and his family. To this, and to this only, our Lord prophetically alludes, when he promises to St Peter the custody of the keys. With this, the second article of the promise, the authority to loose and bind, is closely connected. This again being, by virtue of our rule of interpretation, peculiar to St Peter, must be a distinct thing from the perpetual standing power of discipline, conveyed upon a later occasion to the church in general, in the same figurative terms. St Peter was the first instrument of providence in dissolving the obligation of the Mosaic law in the ceremonial, and of binding it in the moral part. The rescript, indeed, for that purpose, was drawn by St James, and confirmed by the authority of the apostles, in general, under the direction of the Holy Ghost; but the Holy Ghost moved the apostles to this great business by the suggestion and the persuasion of St Peter, as we read in the fifteenth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles. And this was his particular and personal commission to bind and loose. I must not quit this part of my subject without observing, that no authority over the rest of the apostles was given to St Peter, by the promise made to him, in either or in both its branches; nor was any right conveyed to him, which could descend from him to his successors in any see. The promise was indeed simply a prediction that he would be selected to be the first instrument in a great work of providence, which was of such a nature as to be done once for all; and, being done, it cannot be repeated. The great apostle fulfilled his commission in his lifetime. He applied his key,—he turned back the lock,—he loosed and he bound. The gates of the kingdom of heaven are thrown open,—the ceremonial law is abrogated—the moral is confirmed; and the successors of St Peter, in the see of Rome, can give neither furtherance nor obstruction to the business.—Horsley's Sermons.—Ed.

^a Promising that the gates of hell shall not prevail against his church, our Lord promises not only perpetuity to the church, to the last moment of the world's existence, notwithstanding the successive mortality of all its members in all ages, but what is much more, a final triumph over the power of the grave. Firmly as the gates of hades may be barred, they shall have no power to confine his departed saints, when the last trump shall sound, key was an ensign of great honour and power, and what the chief stewards in princes' palaces usually wore, as an indication of their office, our Saviour makes use of this expression, to denote that authority and jurisdiction wherewith he invested the apostles and their successors in the administration of the affairs of his church. But, besides the key of government, there is¹ the key of knowledge, which the scribes and Pharisees are blamed for having taken away; and therefore as the use of a key is to open a door or gate, we should rather think the import of Christ's promise here to Peter is,² that he should be the person who should first open the mysteries of the gospel-dispensation, both to Jew and Gentile; by the power of his preaching, make the first converts among both; and, by the rite of baptism, receive such converts into the pale of the Christian church: and by the binding and loosing which follow, though some are willing to extend them to the power of excommunication and absolution, I should rather be inclined to think, that, according to the language then in use among the Jews, our Saviour means the forbidding or permitting such and such things; that³ he is here declaring his will, that his apostles should settle the affairs of his church by virtue of their infallible Spirit; should determine what was lawful or unlawful for Christians to do, and that such their determinations should be ratified in heaven; "whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, that is, declare, to be forbidden, shall expose the man that commits it to punishment; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, or declare to be lawful now, though formerly forbidden, shall be allowed to be done, without any one's incurring my displeasure."⁴ So that in this sense the words are a foundation of our faith and obedience to the doctrines and commands of the apostles, and of the cessation of the ritual precepts of the law of Moses.

According to this exposition, the sense of our Lord's promise to Peter, supposing it personal, and directed to him only, will be this—⁴ "Thy name signifies a rock, and, suitable to that name shall be thy work and office; for upon thee, that is, upon the strength of thy preaching, shall the foundation of my church be laid. Thee I will appoint to make the first converts, both of Jews and Gentiles, to my holy religion, and, by the ordinance of baptism to admit them into the communion of saints; and to thee I will give power to enact laws, for the good government of my church; to determine what is proper or improper to be done, and to release my people from the observation of legal ceremonies."⁵

This is the full force of our Saviour's speech to Peter; and yet it neither denotes nor implies any oecumenical, pastoral power in him, much less in his successors, above the rest of the apostles. For, if he be here called the rock, or foundation-stone, the same honour is attributed to the rest, where it is said, that⁵ 'we are built upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone.' If he had the power of the keys intrusted with him, and thereby admitted the first converts, both Jews and Gentiles, into the Christian church; both James and John exercised the same office, in converting those of the circumcision; and St Paul opened the kingdom of heaven to many more Gentiles than ever he did. If he had authority to discharge the converts he made from the observation of the ceremonial law, St Paul, without doubt, had the same with regard to this, and perhaps a clearer notion of the Christian liberty, than St Peter seems to have had, when he gave occasion to the other to⁶ withstand him to the face, and so frequently to declare, 'that we are not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ;' and, whatever the sense of binding and loosing may be, it is certain, that the same power and authority was given, in as ample a manner to all the apostles in general, where it is said,⁷ 'whatsoever YE shall bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever YE shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven;' and again⁸ 'whosoever sins YE remit, they are remitted unto them, and whosoever sins YE retain, they are retained.' So wisely did our blessed Saviour settle an equality among his apostles, that⁹ 'there might be no schism in his church,' but that¹⁰ 'in him all the building fitly framed together,' as the apostle continues the metaphor, 'might grow unto an holy temple in the Lord!'

Nothing certainly can be plainer in scripture, than that the sin against the Holy Ghost, which our Saviour mentions as a sin unpardonable, is to be understood of the Pharisees imputing the miracles, which he wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost, to the power of the devil; and yet, I know not how, a great many learned men have made shift to mistake it.¹¹ A denial of Christ's divinity, a denial of his religion for fear of suffering, a wilful opposition to the truth, a malicious envying other men's graces, gross relapses into sin, or final impenitence, and perseverance therein, have, some by one, and some by others, been made the characteristics of this sin; and yet the very occasion of our Saviour's discourse concerning it cannot but give us quite different conceptions.

¹² He had just now healed one possessed of a devil, blind and dumb, whereat the people were much amazed, and began to say among themselves, 'is not this the son of David?' that is, the promised Messiah: which when the Pharisees understood, they gave this vile and malicious turn to the miracle, 'this fellow does not cast out devils, but by Beelzebub, the prince of the devils.' This calumny our Saviour undertook to confute, by showing how unlikely a thing it was, that the devil should lend him his power to use it against himself; and then proceeds to discourse of this sin,¹³ 'wherefore I say unto you, all manner of sin and blasphemy,' which is of another nature, 'shall be forgiven unto men, but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto them.' The Pharisees therefore are the persons charged with the sin, and the sin is, their attributing what was done by the finger of God to a diabolical power.

though our Saviour entered upon this discourse, because the Pharisees imputed his miracles to a confederacy with Satan, yet his chief design was to deter his hearers from blaspheming the ensuing dispensation of the Holy Ghost, which, upon his resurrection and ascension, he had promised to send down from heaven: so that this sin against the Holy Ghost neither was, nor could be committed, when our Saviour spake these words, not until the time that its miraculous gifts were communicated to the apostles, which was on the day of Pentecost. But, besides that our blessed Saviour had not as yet made mention either of his own ascension, or of the mission of the Holy Ghost, since the power, whereby both he and his apostles wrought their miracles, proceeded from the same divine Spirit, a reviling this power, when our Saviour did the miracle, must be blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, as much as it was when his apostles did it; and so the difference amounts to nothing.

² God, no doubt, can, if he will, work so powerfully upon the minds of men by his grace and Spirit, as to convince the most obstinate; and, supposing them to be convinced, and repent, it cannot be denied, but that they would be forgiven: and therefore, when our Saviour says, that such 'as blaspheme against the Holy Ghost, shall not be forgiven,' it is reasonable to suppose, that he means, that when men are come to such a degree of inveterate malice, God, as he justly may, will withdraw his grace from them, and leave them to the bent of their perverse minds, which will insensibly engage them in a further opposition to the truth, and sink them finally into perdition; so that being deserted of God, and, for want of the necessary aid of his grace, continuing finally impenitent, they become incapable of forgiveness 'both in this world, and in that which is to come.' The short then of all is this, that the sin against the Holy Ghost is unpardonable, not because there is not a sufficiency of merit in Christ to atone for it, or of mercy in God the Father to forgive it, but because those who commit it are of such a refractory and incorrigible spirit, that they resist the last and utmost means of their conviction, and, consequently, neither will nor can repent; especially, if God in judgment, as it sometimes happens, and ³ 'because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved, should send upon them a strong delusion, that they might believe a lie.'

That which has made some passages in the 6th chapter of St John's gospel, and especially the command of ⁴ 'eating the flesh, and drinking the blood of the Son of Man,' a matter of so much perplexity, is the want of attending to the occasion of his discourse, and the figurative forms of expression that were then in use in the eastern nations. Our Lord, it seems, but the day before, ⁵ had fed a great number of people with a very small matter of provisions. The day following they resort to him, in hopes of the same bounteous supply. Our Lord, who knew their design, rebuked their greedy appetite. They, in return, reminded him of Moses's liberality, much superior to his, in providing them manna for the space of forty years. Hereupon our Lord took occasion to acquaint them, ⁶ 'that he was the bread of God, which came down from heaven,' ⁷ a highly preferable to manna; forasmuch as that gave only their forefathers a transitory, but this an everlasting life to the whole world: for ⁸ 'he that cometh to me,' continues he, 'shall never hunger; and he that believeth in me shall never thirst;' and again, ⁹ 'I am the living (or rather life-giving) bread, which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever, and the bread that I will give him is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world.' ¹⁰ For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed: he that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day.

Now, whosoever considers the genius of the eastern languages, abounding in lofty, and sometimes abstruse, figures, and how common a thing it was, among the Jews especially, to use the metaphors of eating and drinking in a spiritual sense, namely, to denote the exercise or α There is a beautiful gradation observable in our Lord's discourse. The first time that he called himself the bread of life, (John vi. 35.) he assigned the reason of the name somewhat obscurely. 'He that cometh to me shall never hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst.' The second time that he called himself 'the bread of life,' verse 47, he spake to the same purpose as before, but more plainly; 'he that believeth on me, hath everlasting life;' therefore 'I am the bread of life.' And by connecting this with his affirmation, verse 46, that he was the only teacher of mankind that had ever personally seen and been taught of the Father, he insinuated that he gave life to men by his doctrine, being on that account also the bread of life. The third time he called himself bread, he added to the name the epithet of living, not only because he gives life to men by raising them from the dead, and making them eternally happy, but because he giveth them this life by means of his human nature, which was not an inanimate thing like the manna, but a living substance. For he told them plainly that the bread or meat which he would give them was his flesh, which he would give for the life of the world, and spake of men's eating it, in order to its having that effect. But the meaning of this expression he had directed them to before, when in calling himself the bread of life, he always joined believing on him, as necessary to men's living by him. Wherefore, to eat, in the remaining part of this discourse, is to believe. —Macknight's Harmony.—Ed.

improvement of any of the intellectual faculties of the soul, will not be much surpris'd at our Saviour's expressing himself in this manner. ¹ 'Ho, every one that thirsteth,' says the prophet, exhorting the people to hear his instructions, 'come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat, yea, come buy wine and milk, without money and without price; and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness.' To the same purpose we frequently find Philo calling wisdom and virtue the food of the soul, which nourishes it to eternal life; and ² the Talmudists telling us, "that all the eating and drinking which is mentioned in the book of Ecclesiastes, relates to the observation of the law, and good works;" nay, manna, in particular, according to the sense of some Jewish authors, was an eminent type of Christ; and therefore, "the good man," ³ says Philo, "lifts up his eyes to heaven, looking to the manna, the divine and heavenly λόγος, the incorruptible food of the soul, that loves God;" and if this was the Jews' sense of things, our Saviour was guilty of no presumption in styling himself the 'true bread which came down from heaven,' nor of any absurdity in insisting upon a metaphor which so frequently occurred in the best of their authors. The only question is, whether our Saviour's words in this place are to be taken in a literal or metaphorical sense? that is, whether they relate to a corporeal or spiritual eating his flesh?

There is something so shocking in the very notion of one man's eating the flesh of another, that when the Jews heard our Saviour, as they imagined, discourse at this rate, they might well say, ⁴ "How can this man give us his flesh to eat?" ⁵ Will he cut it to pieces, and distribute to every one of us a share? It is no agreeable thought to eat human flesh; but, supposing we could bring ourselves to that, how could he multiply himself into so many parts, as that each of us might have one? Or how could himself subsist, if he should, in this barbarous and inhuman manner, cut and mangle his own body?" This seems to be the reasoning of the Jews upon the case: ⁶ but, on all hands, it is agreed, that they mistook the sense of our Saviour's words, and fancied such a meaning in them as he never intended; whereas, had the literal sense been the proper and intended meaning, it is certain, that they imposed no false construction upon what he said; since, upon this supposition, he intended that his human flesh should properly be eaten, and they, in their questioning the truth of what he said, meant no more.

We may observe farther, that when our Saviour knew within himself that the abstruseness of his discourse upon this subject had given some disgust to his disciples, ⁷ 'he said unto them, Does this offend you? What, and if you should see the Son of Man ascend up where he was before?' The only sense of which words can be, ⁸ "Are you offended that I thus speak of giving you my flesh to eat? Do you look on this expression now as a thing so very absurd and unintelligible? What then will you think of it, when this body is removed hence into heaven? that is, How will you then be scared, and think it still more difficult, and more impossible to apprehend, how ye shall then eat my flesh, and drink my blood, provided ye go on to understand my words in a gross and carnal manner?" For St Athanasius has well observed, that our Saviour here mentions his ascent into heaven, that he might divert his disciples from entertaining a carnal sense of his words: and therefore his argument is,—“Since it will be then impossible for you to eat my flesh corporeally, when it is so far removed from you; by this you may perceive, that my purpose is, that you should understand my words in a spiritual sense.”

We may observe again, that when several disciples revolted upon the account of this hard saying, as ⁹ it is called, and our Saviour was apprehensive that his apostles might do the like, St Peter, in the name of the rest, answers him, ¹⁰ 'Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life;' whereas had he understood our Saviour as speaking here of oral manducation, his answer very probably would have been to this effect: "Whatsoever appearance there may be of inhumanity, absurdness, and impossibility, in eating thy natural flesh, and drinking thy blood, yet we believe it because thou hast said it, who art truth itself, and able to make good thy words." But since we hear nothing from him of this tendency, we may reasonably conclude, that he had no such notion of our Saviour's words. And indeed our Saviour, one would think, had done enough to explain his own meaning, when he tells us, that the eating which he intends is ¹¹ believing on him, and that it was such an eating as would make a man ¹² live for ever; that ¹³ flesh, if we could eat it, profiteth nothing, since the soul can only be nourished by spiritual food; and that therefore the words which he spake unto them were spirit, that is, were to be understood in a spiritual sense, otherwise they would not be conducive to eternal life: and therefore ¹⁴ Eusebius introduces our Saviour as thus addressing his disciples, "Do not think that I speak of that flesh where-with I am compassed, as if you must eat of that; neither imagine that I command you to drink my bodily blood, but understand well, that the words which I have spoken unto you, they are spirit and life." For, as St Austin ¹⁵ lays down the rule for the exposition of scripture-phrases, "if the saying be preceptive, either forbidding a wicked action, or enjoining a good one, it is no figurative speech; but if it seems to command any wickedness, or to forbid what is profitable and good, it is figurative." Accordingly this saying, "except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, seems to command a wicked thing, and is therefore a figure, enjoining us to communicate in the passion of our love, and sweetly and profitably remember, that his flesh was wounded and crucified for us." ¹⁶ In this sense, his flesh and blood are ἀληθῶς, truly meat and drink; because the eating of this flesh by faith in his salutary passion doth nourish the soul to life eternal; and the drinking of his blood by faith, as that which was shed for the remission of sins does refresh the person thirsting after righteousness, and convey into him a principle of living well, and of living for ever. ^a

Thus we have gone through the several objections that are usually made to the facts contained in the evangelical history of this period; and, if it would be of any farther satisfaction to those that delight to make them, we might show, that whatever is recorded of our blessed Saviour, the like, in one instance or other, the heathens themselves have acknowledged in their deified heroes and great men: ¹ that the same power of curing all kinds of diseases the Greeks ascribe to their Æsculapius, and the Egyptians to their Serapis and Isis. That Hadrian, according ² to Spartianus, was cured of fever, by the touch of a certain blind man: that Sesostris, king of Egypt, upon offering a sacrifice to the god Mnevis, was restored to his eyesight: that Vespasian, if we may believe Tacitus, cured a man of his lameness, and another of his blindness, by anointing his eyes with spittle, in the manner that our Saviour did: and that Apollonius Tyaneus, whom ³ Philostratus sets up as a powerful rival of our Lord's miracles, cured a young man that was possessed with a devil; and when he had restored him to his right senses, received him into the number of his disciples. Simplicius, in his dissertations upon Epictetus, seems to promise to all pious and wise men the power of calming the waves of the sea; and how Neptune rebuked and allayed the winds, which, without his permission, had raised a tempestuous storm, is a story well known, and well set off in ⁴ Virgil. Every poet almost mentions this same Neptune's riding in his chariot on the surface of the sea; and the tradition is, that to his son Euphemus, and his nephew Orion, he gave the faculty of walking upon it without fear of sinking. Nothing can be more common among the fictions of these writers, than the transfiguration of their gods upon one occasion or other; and that our Saviour's method of electing his disciples might not want a precedent in profane history, ⁵ we are told that the famous eastern philosopher Confucius, out of the three thousand followers that he had, made choice of seventy-two of principal note, and, out of these, of twelve only to be his more immediate companions, and to whom he committed the hidden mysteries of his eating, &c., there is a reference to the eucharist, or not. The affirmative was maintained by most ancients, and is by most moderns, especially the Romanist interpreters: while the negative has been adopted by many of the most eminent expositors, of the ancient ones by Tertull., Clem., Alex., Origen, Cyrill, Chrys., and Augustine: and of the moderns, by Grot., Whitby, Wolf, Lampe, Tittm., and Kuin., who show that the context will not permit us to take the words of the eucharist. (See Recess. Synop. and Tittm.) But though they successfully prove that by eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ, must here be meant securing to ourselves the benefits of the sacrifices of Christ by a true and lively faith, yet that will not prove that there is no reference by allusion to the eucharist. Hence I would, with Dr Hey and Mr Holden, steer a middle course, and take the passage primarily of the propitiatory sacrifice of Christ, and the benefits thence derived by faith; and secondarily, as a prophetic intimation of the advantages to be derived from a worthy participation of the sacrament of the Lord's supper; since the two have so close a relation one to the other, that the mention of the one must suggest the other. Thus in speaking of the offering of his body, our Lord may be supposed to have had reference, by anticipation, to that sacrament, soon to be instituted, in which, to the end of time, that sacrifice would be typified and its benefit, applied.—Bloomfield's Greek Testament.—Ed.

philosophy: but our happiness is, that the credibility of the scripture history wants no such weak supports as these.

CHAP. III. Of the Prophecies relating to the Messiah, and their accomplishment in our blessed Saviour.

ONE great evidence of our Saviour's divine mission, and, consequently, of the truth of his religion, is the completion of the ancient prophecies, relating to the Messiah, in his person, doctrine, and miracles. He indeed makes more frequent appeal to his miracles: ⁶ 'The works which the Father hath given me to finish,' says he, 'the same works that I do, bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me.' But since, at the same time, he lays claim to the character of being the person spoken of by Moses and the prophets, when he bids the people ⁷ 'search the Scriptures, because they testified of him;' it is certain, that his title to the Messiahship must be tried by the testimony of the prophets; and all the miraculous works which he did, will not prove him to be the Messenger of the covenant, whom God was to send, unless the several predictions, which his servants the prophets gave of that renowned person, are found to unite and agree in him. It can hardly be thought, but that God almighty, who designed such an inestimable benefit for mankind, as the sending his own Son into the world for the redemption of it, should give some previous notice of his coming, and draw his picture, as it were, so much to the life and likeness, that, when the original should be brought to view, it might be known and distinguished by it. It is acknowledged, I think, on all hands, that the prophets, at sundry times, and in divers manners, have done this; ⁸ that each of them, in his turn, has drawn out a feature, if I may so say, and left some masterly stroke behind him of this great personage that was to come from heaven; that one has described his parentage, another the time, another the place, and another the uncommon manner of his birth; that some have taken notice of the most remarkable actions and events of his life, and several of the most minute and altogether singular circumstances of his death; that by some his resurrection is foretold, by others his ascent to the throne of God, and by others, the perpetual duration of his kingdom. And, if the prophets are allowed to have done this, our only inquiry is, Whether the lineaments, which they, in their several capacities, have drawn of the promised Messiah, when all brought together, be answerable to the account, which the evangelists have given us in their history of the blessed Jesus?

We readily own indeed, that there is a great obscurity in the ancient prophecies.^a They are generally penned in

⁸ Stanhope's Sermons at Boyle's lecture.

^a There has been much complaint about the obscurity of prophecy. But the absurdity of the complaint has been so often exposed, and is so palpable to the reflecting mind, that it cannot be necessary to say much respecting it. The language of prophecy might be so clear and ambiguous as altogether to defeat its own object. Were it as explicit as seems to be demanded, an individual, placed in favourable circumstances for the purpose,

A. M. 4035. A. D. 31; OR, A. M. 5440. A. D. 29. FROM MAT. xii. 1—xvii. 14. MARK ii. 23—ix. 14. LUKE vi. 1—ix. 37. JOHN v. 1—vii. 1.

a very exalted style, and abound with so many bold metaphors, and hyperbolical expressions, so many allegories and parables, and other abstruse forms of speech, as make it very difficult for the interpreters of scripture to discover their true scope or meaning. The prophecies relating to the Messiah are still more obscure; because, as they consider him in the different capacities of his humiliation and exaltation, unless this distinction is taken along with us, when we apply them to one and the same person, they will seem to load his character with contradictions. But still, since it is acknowledged, that the great design of prophecy was to acquaint the world with the Messiah, and that upon whatever particular occasions God sent his messengers, he always made this one part of their errand, we can hardly believe, that he would multiply these messages to no purpose; or, when he pretended to reveal this matter to them, mock them with unintelligible words, and leave them as much in the dark as he found them. He might indeed, for wise purposes, ¹ multiply visions, and use similitudes, ² dark speeches, by the ministry of the prophets; but in this grand discovery of all, he certainly left such indications as enabled those, who looked for the redemption of Israel, and accordingly made it their business to search the scriptures, and inquire into the marks of the Messiah, to attain to a competent knowledge of them. Nor can it be well doubted, but that the Jews had some fixed and well known rules, though they have not descended to us, whereby they distinguished the passages in the prophetic writings which related to this important subject, from any others, ^a because we find, that would have it in his power so to conform his own pretensions, as well as his own appearance and manner of life, to what had been foretold, as to impose himself on the world for the person actually designed in the language of the prophet:—Or, if no such deceitful attempt were made, still the person designed would, in a great measure, lose the advantage which the fulfilment of prophecy was intended to afford him; for it would be urged with too much seeming reason, that the prophetic language had put it in his power to bring about its fulfilment in the way best calculated to accomplish his object. It was therefore wisely ordered that the prophecies concerning the Messiah should be involved in as much obscurity as to leave no ground for this objection. Yet we shall find, on the other hand, that the circumstances connected with their fulfilment reflect such light on the prophetic language, as may now satisfy every candid mind respecting its original import. It is, besides, to be considered that, if the language of the prophets respecting the advent and character of the Messiah had been so explicit as to make it impossible for any one to misconstrue or misapply it, we can scarcely suppose that the Jews would have put him to death, without their minds being so overuled of God as to deprive them of their free agency. The operation and effect, therefore, of such prophecies might, for aught we know, be incompatible with the condition of men as accountable creatures. It is only from such a degree of obscurity in the prophetic language as its fulfilment effectually removes, that we have assurance of its being a fit instrument in the hands of an all-wise Being for the accomplishment of his gracious purposes.—Dr Inglis' Indication of the Christian Faith.—Ed.

^a This is by no means probable. If we look into the first epistle of St Peter, we shall find that the ancient prophecies, in the text, and which he styles the 'more sure word of prophecy,' were not apprehended or clearly understood by those inspired persons who delivered them; for there he represents them 'searching what or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow.' i. 11. To the same purpose our Saviour speaks,

We acknowledge again, that the prophecies concerning the Messiah were delivered, not only in an obscure manner, but in different proportions, and at very distant times. Thus to Adam and Eve he was promised in general, ⁵ as a man; ^b to Abraham, ⁶ as his posterity; to

Matt. xiii. 17. 'Many prophets and righteous men have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them.' St Paul gives the like account of the gift of prophecy under the gospel dispensation: 'we know in part, and we prophesy in part; but when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away. Now we see through a glass darkly; but then face to face; now I know in part, but then shall I know even as also I am known;' 1 Cor. xiii. 9, 10, 12. Now if the prophets and righteous men of old, to whom the word of God came, did not clearly understand the things which they foretold, but employed themselves in searching and examining the prophetic testimonies of the Spirit which was in them; if the prophets of the New Testament knew only in part, and prophesied only in part, seeing but darkly as through a glass; it is most evident that others, in all appearance less qualified than they to understand the determinate sense of the prophecies, could have but a confused and indistinct notion of the things foretold. The prophet Daniel, after a very extraordinary vision, which he reports in his last chapter, immediately adds, 'I heard, but I understood not: then said I, O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things? And he said, Go thy way, Daniel; for the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end.' The answer here given to Daniel is very like the answer which our Saviour gave the apostles, on an inquiry made by them: they ask, 'Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?' And he said unto them, it is not for you to know the times and seasons which the Father hath put in his own power; Acts i. 6, 7. It did belong to them undoubtedly and to every believing Jew, 'to give heed to the word of prophecy' according to St Peter's exhortation in the text; and since it did not belong to them to know the times and seasons, it is evident the word of prophecy was not intended to give a clear and distinct light in this case.—Sherlock on Prophecy, Discourse 2.—Ed.

^b This prophecy was to our first parents but very obscure: it was, in the phrase of St Peter, but a light shining in a dark place: all that they could certainly conclude from it was, that their case was not desperate; that some remedy, that some deliverance from the evil they were under, would in time appear; but when, or where, or by what means, they could not understand: their own sentence, which returned them back again to the dust of the earth, made it difficult to apprehend what this victory over the serpent should signify, or how they who were shortly to be dust and ashes, should be the better for it. But after all that can be urged on this head to set out the obscurity of this promise, I would ask one question: was not this promise or prophecy, though surrounded with all this obscurity, a foundation for religion, and trust and confidence towards God after the fall, in hopes of deliverance from the evils introduced by disobedience? If it was, it fully answered the necessity of their case to whom it was given, and manifested to them all that God intended to make manifest. They could have had towards God no religion without some hopes of mercy: it was necessary therefore to convey such hopes; out to tell them how these hopes should be accomplished, at what time and manner precisely, was not necessary to their religion. And what now is to be objected against this prophecy? It is very obscure you say; so it is: but it is obscure in the points which God did not intend to explain at that time, and which were not necessary to be known. You see a plain reason for giving this prophecy, and as far as the reason for giving the prophecy extends, so far the prophecy is very plain: it is obscure only where there is no reason why it should be plain; which surely is a fault easily to be forgiven, and very far from being a proper subject for complaint.—Sherlock on Prophecy, Discourse 3.—Ed.

Jacob, ¹ as descending from the tribe of Judah in particular; to David, that he should be of his family, and ² the fruit of his body; to Micah, that he should be born at Bethlehem; ³ to Isaiah, that his birth should be miraculous, and his mother a virgin; ⁴ to the same prophet, that his death should be for ⁵ the redemption of mankind; to Daniel, ⁶ when the precise time of his suffering should be; to Haggai, lastly, and Zechariah and Malachi, that ⁷ all these events should be accomplished before the destruction of the second temple. ⁸ Now, not to mention any more, if we compute the seasons of these few, the general prediction of a Saviour in human nature, will be found to bear date before that of his being Abraham's seed, about two thousand and four-score years; from this, to the declaration of his particular tribe, were two hundred and fourscore years; thence to the prophecy of his particular family, above six hundred years; after that, to the signification of his miraculous nativity, more than three hundred years; and from thence to the time of his public appearance in the world, three hundred and fifty years, ^a or thereabouts. Now, since these prophecies were thus delivered by degrees, and at such distant and different times, it may easily so happen, that considering them singly and apart, we may find some other person and event, to which they may be adapted, without any great violence to the text: but then the right way, in this case, to make a judgment, is, not by separate and particular passages, but by connexion of the whole, by the exact coincidence, and entire agreement of all the prophecies, which, at several times, denoted the Messiah, brought into one point of light, and laid together. ^b This is the only method we have to determine the matter: and accordingly, let us now look into some of the principal passages of our Saviour's life, as it is recorded by the evangelists, and so see whether they do not exactly agree with the several characters which the prophets have given us of the Messiah.

Our Lord Jesus, we are told, ⁹ was conceived and born of a pure virgin, without the concurrence of any man: for so the prophecy had foretold, that, ¹⁰ 'the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head,' and that ¹¹ 'a virgin should conceive, and bear a son, and call his name Immanuel.' He was descended ¹² of the family of David, and born ¹³ at the town of Bethlehem; because, in favour to that king, God had promised that ¹⁴ 'he would establish his seed for ever,' and that ¹⁵ 'out of Bethlehem a ruler of Israel should come, whose goings forth had been from everlasting:' and he was born ¹⁶ in the reign of king Herod, that is, before the total dissolution of the Jewish government, and during the standing of the second temple; because one prophecy says, that ¹⁷ 'the sceptre should not depart from Judah until Shiloh come;' and another, that ¹⁸ 'the desire of all nations should come,' and, by his presence, 'make the glory of God's latter house greater than that of the former.'

Well: but before his appearance in the world, ¹⁹ John the Baptist was appointed his forerunner, and came to bear witness of him, because the Lord, by the mouth of his prophets, had said, ²⁰ 'Behold, I send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me: ²¹ he shall cry in the wilderness, prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight an highway for our God.' When he made his appearance in the world he took up his chief residence ²² in the province of Galilee; because the prophet, speaking of the inhabitants of that country, tells us, that 'upon them ²³ who dwell before in the land of the shadow of death, did a great light shine,' when they had it to say, 'Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder,' &c. When he came to converse in it, such was his quiet and inoffensive temper and behaviour, that the prophet did not misrepresent him, when he styled him ²⁴ 'the Prince of Peace,' and one ²⁵ 'who would not cry, nor cause his voice to be heard in the streets.' When he entered upon his public ministry, the very actions which the evangelical prophet had foretold of the Messiah, he performed to a tittle; 'for ²⁶ he preached good tidings to the meek, and proclaimed liberty to the captives; he ²⁷ opened the eyes of the blind, and unstopped the ears of the deaf; he made the lame man to leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb to sing.'

But, during the course of his ministry, our Saviour, we read, lived in a very mean, obscure condition, and suffered at last a violent death: and why so? Because of the Messiah it was foretold, that ²⁸ 'he should be despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief; who should be cut off from the land of the living, and pour out his soul unto death.' But, for whom should he suffer all this? ²⁹ For us men, and our salvation: for so it was appointed, that the Messiah should ³⁰ 'bear our griefs, and carry our sorrows; that he should be wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities; because 'the Lord would lay upon him the iniquities of us all.' And in what manner was he to suffer? With a patience and meekness answerable to the prophecy, ¹ 'he was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth; he was brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth.'

^b Of any single text of prophecy, it is true that it cannot be its own interpreter: for this reason,—because the scripture prophecies are not detached predictions of separate nor independent events, but are united in a regular and entire system, all terminating in one great object—the promulgation of the gospel, and the complete establishment of the Messiah's kingdom. Of this system, every particular prophecy makes a part, and bears a more immediate or a more remote relation to that which is the object of the whole. It is therefore very unlikely that the true signification of any particular text of prophecy should be discovered from the bare attention to the terms of the single prediction, taken by itself, without considering it as a part of that system to which it unquestionably belongs, and without observing how it may stand connected with earlier and later prophecies, especially with those which might more immediately precede or more immediately follow it. Again, of the whole of the scripture prophecies, it is true that it cannot be its own interpreter. Its meaning never can be discovered, without a general knowledge of the principal events to which it alludes; for prophecy was not given to enable curious men to pry into futurity, but to enable the serious and considerate to discern in past events the hand of providence. Every particular prophecy is to be referred to the system, and to be understood in that sense which may most aptly connect it with the whole; and the sense of prophecy in general is to be sought in the events which have actually taken place,—the history of mankind, especially in the article of their religious improvement, being the public infallible interpreter of the oracles of God.—Horsley's Sermons.—Ed.

It might seem a little strange, that our Lord, who all his lifetime affected no popularity, should a little before his death, ² make his public entry into Jerusalem, and in a manner so very singular, had not the prophet called upon 'the daughter of Zion' ³ to rejoice greatly, because her King was coming unto her, bringing salvation, lowly, and riding upon an ass, and a colt, the foal of an ass.' Strange, that ⁴ he should be betrayed by his own disciple, to whom he had been so very kind, had not the psalmist foretold it in these words: ⁵ 'mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread, hath lift up his heel against me;' and strange, that of all other deaths, he should be sentenced to crucifixion, which was neither a Jewish punishment, nor proper to be inflicted ⁶ for the crime of blasphemy, ⁷ that was alleged against him, had not the same royal prophet determined the matter in these words: ⁸ 'they pierced my hands, and my feet; they stand staring, and looking upon me.'

Such then was the will of God, that the Saviour of the world should be crucified; but in what company did he suffer? The gospel tells us, ⁹ 'between two thieves,' because the prophecy had declared, that he should ¹⁰ 'be numbered with the transgressors.' But how did the spectators behave while he was thus hanging on the cross? Just in the manner that the psalmist described: ¹¹ 'All they that see me laugh me to scorn, they shoot out the lip, and shake the head, saying, he trusted in the Lord, that he would deliver him, let him deliver him, if he would have him,' what did they give him to drink in the mean time? ^a A narcotic potion was generally allowed, in such cases, to stupify the sense of pain; but in his, nothing but vinegar was allowed; because the prophecy before had specified the liquor: ¹² 'They gave me gall to eat, and when I was thirsty, they gave me vinegar to drink;' and what became of his clothes? All disposed of according to the prophecy: ¹³ 'They parted my garments among them, and upon my vesture did they cast lots.'

But under all these provocations and indignities, what did he do? Why he prayed to God for the forgiveness of his crucifiers; because the prophet had foretold, that ¹⁴

'while he poured out his soul unto death, he should also make intercession for the transgressors.' In his greater agonies, what were his ejaculations to God? The same that the royal psalmist, personating the Messiah in his extremity, has left upon record: ¹⁵ 'My God, my God, look upon me: why hast thou forsaken me, and art so far from my help, and from the words of my complaint?' What the words wherein he gave up the ghost? The very same that the psalmist, in another place, had prescribed: ¹⁶ 'Father; into thy hands I commend my spirit.' But after our Saviour's death, in what manner was his body disposed of? Contrary to the custom of the Romans, who left those that suffered in this manner hanging upon the cross until they were consumed; and, contrary to the intention of his enemies, who wished him no better than a malefactor's funeral, he was honourably and nobly interred; because it was pre-ordained, that ¹⁷ 'he should make his grave with the rich in his death.' After his burial, what became of his body? It was raised again, and restored from the state of the dead; because, in confidence of this, he laid down his life, that ¹⁸ 'God would not leave his soul in hell, nor suffer his Holy One to see corruption.' After his resurrection, and continuance for some time upon earth, what did he do next? In the sight of his disciples, and several other spectators, ascend triumphantly into heaven; for so the divine order was, ¹⁹ 'Lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors, that the King of glory may come in.' After his ascension into heaven, what did he finally do? Sent down the Holy Ghost upon his apostles, to enable them to propagate his religion all the world over; for such is the purport of the prophecy: ²⁰ 'Thou art gone up on high, thou hast led captivity captive, and received gifts for men, that ²¹ the mountain of the Lord's house might be established on the top of the mountains, and exalted above the hills, and that all nations should flow unto it.'

Upon the whole, then, we may perceive, that the several things which the prophets had foretold of the promised Messiah, were fulfilled in the person and actions of our blessed Saviour; but then there is something farther to be considered in this matter, and that is, the visible interposition of an overruling providence, in the completion of these predictions. ²² For that our Lord should be born of a virgin, contrary to the known laws of nature, at the city of Bethlehem, when he was conceived at Nazareth, and under the declension of the Jewish polity, as it was predicted: that upon the cruelty of Herod he should be carried into Egypt, upon the succession of Archelaus, return into Judea, and settle his abode in the obscure country of Galilee, whence no good thing, much less so eminent a prophet, could ever have been expected to come: that the judge who pronounced him innocent should deliver him to death, and to the death of the cross, who, had he been guilty, must, by the law of the land, have been stoned: that he who had so many enemies should be betrayed by one of his disciples; and by a disciple who carried the bag, and consequently all his master's riches, for a vile sum of money: and that this money, the price of blood, should be employed in a work of charity, to buy a field to bury strangers in: that he who spent all his time in doing good, should be doomed to suffer among thieves and malefactors; and the multitude, who were wont to pity dying criminals, should insult and deride him in his greatest misery: that in the division of his clothes, they should cast lots for his coat, and, contrary to the usage of the country, in the midst of his agonies, give him vinegar to drink: that, contrary to the practice of the Romans, he that was crucified should be permitted to be buried, and, although he died among malefactors, have persons of the first rank and character joining together in his honourable interment: these, and several other particulars that might be produced, are so very strange and surprising, that they must needs strike every pious and devout soul with a profound sense of the unspeakable wisdom, as well as goodness of God, in accomplishing in Jesus what he had promised and foretold of the Messiah, by ways and means to human wisdom very unlikely, and very disproportionate. And, if the predictions relating to the Messiah have, in this wonderful manner, and by the particular direction and appointment of providence, thus met in the blessed Jesus, like lines in one common centre, the natural result of this contemplation, is, 'that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God.'

¹ For can it be imagined, with any worthy conception of God, that a work of love and wonder, so great as the sending his Son to redeem the world, should be in agitation for full four thousand years: that each succeeding age, in this long space, should have some notices of it; that the several characters he was to sustain, should be described by different prophets, living at times and places so remote, that no confederacy could be suspected; that each of these prophets should draw, some one line of him, and some another, and point him out, some in one capacity, and some in another; and above all, that every one of these strokes or lineaments should be directed by the unerring hand of God, to make at least one finished picture, on purpose that the original, when it appeared, might be found out, and distinguished by it; can it be imagined, I say, that a God of infinite truth, wisdom, and goodness, would have ever permitted, much less appointed, that our blessed Lord should, in every part and line, be so exactly like that piece, unless he intended that we should receive him as the true original? Unless we can entertain a thought so unworthy of God, I say, as that he designed to impose upon us in this whole dispensation, we cannot but conclude, that he would never have permitted all the marks belonging to the Messiah, to have concurred in the life of our blessed Saviour, and by these marks, have suffered so many millions of souls to have been mistaken in the object of their faith and worship, and thereupon, without any fault of theirs, deluded into the heinous sin of idolatry, had he not appointed the man Christ Jesus to be the great Saviour of the world, and the Lord of life and glory.

'But, you are frequently mistaken,' says the Jew, to avoid the force of this, 'in your application of these prophetic passages to your Jesus, which properly belonged to another person, and in him received their utmost accomplishment. The 22d psalm, for instance, which complains of the sufferings and indignities which its author endured, you refer to the Messiah, and thence apply to your Jesus; whereas it relates entirely to David, and the troubles he underwent under the persecution of Saul. ² The prophecy of Micah, which makes mention of a ruler, whose goings forth had been from everlasting, whatever use you may make of it, was only intended of Zerubbabel, who was sprung from the ancient house of David; and that famous 53d chapter of Isaiah, which is so frequently cited by the apostles, when rightly inquired into, is nothing else but a lively description of the sufferings of the Jews, under the Babylonish, or some other captivity. Thus, by misapplying, and misinterpreting several texts, in such a sense, as the Jewish church never received, and the Spirit of God never intended, you beleck your Jesus with feathers that are none of his own, and then cry out, how well he becomes them, and how exactly they befit him?'

The completion of prophecies, in the person of our Saviour Christ, is one of the most general arguments that the first Christians made use of, ³ in order to con-

³ They who are educated in the belief of Christianity, and taught to receive the books of both Testaments with equal reverence, are not apt to distinguish between the evidence for their faith, arising from the one and the other. But if we look back to the earliest times of preaching the gospel, and consider how the case stood as to the Jewish converts on one side, who were convinced of the divine authority of the Old Testament, and as to the Gentile converts on the other, who had no such persuasion, the distinction will appear very manifestly. The ancient prophecies, though they are evidence both to the Jew and to the Gentile, yet are they not so to both in the same way of reasoning and deduction, nor to the same end and purpose. For consider; the Jew was possessed of the oracles of God, and firmly persuaded of the truth of them; the very first thing therefore which he had to do on the appearance of the Messiah was to examine his title by the character given of him in the prophets; he could not, consistently with his belief in God and faith in the ancient prophecies, attend to other arguments, till fully satisfied and convinced in this. All the prophecies of the Old Testament relating to the office and character of the Messiah were immovable bars to all pretensions, till fulfilled and accomplished in the person pretending to be the promised and long-expected Redeemer. For this reason the preachers of the gospel, in applying to the Jews, begin with the argument from prophecy. Thus St Paul, in his discourse with the Jews at Antioch in Pisidia, begins with the call of Abraham, and after a short historical deduction of matters from thence to the times of David, he adds, 'of this man's seed hath God, according to his promise, raised unto Israel a Saviour Jesus;' (Acts xiii. 23.) where you see plainly that the whole argument rests on the authority of prophecy; and all the parts of this apostolical sermon are answerable to this beginning, proceeding from one end to the other on the authority of the old prophets. But the very same apostle St Paul, preaching to the people of Athens, Acts xvii, argues from other topics; he says nothing of the prophets, to whose mission and authority the Athenians were perfect strangers, but begins with declaring to them, 'God that made the world and all things therein;' he goes on condemning all idolatrous practices, and assuring them that 'God is not worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed any thing.' He accounts to them for the past times of ignorance at which God winked, and tells them that now he calls all men to repentance, having appointed Christ Jesus to be the judge of all men; for the truth of which he appeals to the evidence of Christ's resurrection, 'whereof,' says the apostle, 'he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the vert such as were persuaded of their divine authority. St Peter,¹ in his first public sermon that he made, out of the 16th and 110th psalms, cites two passages, which he plainly shows, could not be intended of the patriarch David, to prove our Lord's resurrection, and exaltation to glory.² St Paul, who by being brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, understood the force of his argument, uses more proofs of this kind than any other writer of the New Testament, as the least cast of an eye into his epistles to the Romans, Galatians, and Hebrews, will show;³ and St Matthew, who wrote his gospel for the use of the Jews more particularly, and for that reason, as some imagine, in the Hebrew tongue, is more express and copious in his application of the prophecies to our blessed Saviour than any of the other evangelists.

Now, to mention no more than these, how absurd would it have been for these apostles, who were no strangers to the Jewish way of arguing, to allege any passage in the prophets as relating to the Messiah, which properly belonged to another person, in whom it had its accomplishment? Such a method of proceeding could not fail of discovering their confidence and folly, of exposing them to the scorn and ridicule of their adversaries, and, instead of gaining proselytes, of ruining the cause, which by such unfair practices they endeavoured to maintain. It is but supposing then, that these apostles were men of common sense, and desirous to promote the cause that they had taken in hand, and then we can hardly think, that they argued from any prophecies concerning the Messiah, but such as really belonged to him, and such as the whole Jewish church acknowledged so to do.

St Peter, by virtue of the sermon which he preached on the day of Pentecost, made about three thousand converts to the Christian faith; and yet, it is obvious that the whole hinge of his discourse turns upon the testimony of the prophets: had he therefore applied this testimony, either to persons, to whom it did not belong, or in a sense contrary to its true intendment, his doctrine must have been exploded at once, and could never have met with such uncommon success. And, in like manner, as to the subsequent conversions which the apostles made, ⁴ how can we imagine, that such a number of Jews of all degrees, rulers, priests, and scribes of all sects, men of learning, and who by their station and profession, were obliged to know the scriptures, should forsake the religion they were accustomed to, upon the authority of passages, which, in their proper meaning and intendment, were so far from countenancing, that they openly confronted the new religion they were to embrace; and all this without any view of worldly interest, with the certain hazard of their lives here, and the loss of God's favour hereafter, in case of insincerity.⁵

Upon the whole, therefore, we may conclude, that every Jew converted to the Christian faith, is an implicit proof, that the apostle's allegations of the ancient prophecies, both as to the ground and sense of them, were agreeable to their received notions of them; insomuch that, were we at leisure to enter into particulars, we might show, that it is hardly possible to name one single prediction of the many applied to the blessed Jesus, which one or other of their most celebrated writers do not acknowledge to belong to the Messiah.

The modern Jews, it must be owned, have fallen off from the notions of their more ingenious ancestors, and do deny the prophecies quoted in the New Testament those views that we would ascribe to them: ⁶ but whoever considers the destruction of their city and polity, which confounded all the expectations of a glorious Messiah, and put them upon new measures in the application of such predictions as they saw must needs have been fulfilled while their state and temple stood. Whoever considers the darkness and ignorance that would necessarily ensue upon their long dispersion, and many sad calamities, when they fell into the hands of persecuting powers, who hated them and their religion most implacably: whoever considers their neglect of applying themselves to the study of the written law, and attending wholly to their oral, and affecting to be curious in ceremonies, while they continued careless of their doctrines: whoever considers their violent prejudice against Jesus and his disciples, which, as it stuck at nothing, though ever so false or wicked, to oppose them, might easily put them upon tampering with the scriptures, and, by interpolations or defalcations, labouring to make them look another way: and, lastly, whoever considers that judicial blindness and hardness of heart, so often and expressly threatened, and so visibly and lamentably inflicted upon this once elect people of God: may he, in his infinite mercy, so open their eyes, that they may see the wondrous things of the law, and its agreement with the blessed gospel! Whoever considers these things, I say, will not be at a loss for reasons why the present synagogue have departed from the sentiments of the ancient, and are so earnest to apply to David, Solomon, Hezekiah, Zerubbabel, or any other person of note, what their ancestors never thought of attributing to any other than the promised Messiah.

dead? ver. 31. Whence comes this difference? How comes St Paul's argument, on one and the same subject, in Acts xiii. and xvii. to be so unlike to each other? Can this be accounted for any other way than by considering the different circumstances of the persons to whom he delivered himself. In Acts xiii. he argues professedly with Jews, to whom were committed the oracles of God, and who, from these oracles, were well instructed in the great marks and characters of the expected Messiah. It had been highly absurd therefore to reason with them on other arguments, till he had first convinced them by their prophets; and having so convinced them, it would have been impertinent. To them therefore he urges and applies the authority of prophecy only; but to the Athenians, who knew not the prophets, or if they knew them, yet had no reverence or esteem for them, it had been quite ridiculous to offer proofs from prophecies: the appeal therefore before them is made to the sound and clear principles of natural religion, and to the miracles of the gospel, the fame of which probably had, long before, reached to Athens; and the truth of which, they being mere matters of fact, was capable of undeniable evidence and demonstration.—Sherlock on Prophecy, Discourse 6.—Ed.

interpret it of David himself, that we may have wherewith to answer the heretics.¹ But, with all his art and subtilty he can never make it out, how David, with any propriety, can say of himself, ¹ ‘As for me, I am a worm, and no man, the very scorn of men, and the out-cast of the people.’ The greatest affliction that ever befell that prince, was his expulsion from the capital city, upon the rebellion of his son Absalom: and ² Shimei’s cursing and upbraiding him may seem perhaps to countenance this complaint, ³ ‘All they that see me, laugh me to scorn, they shoot out their lips, and shake their heads;’ but we no where read in his history, that his enemies ever ⁴ ‘pierced his hands or his feet,’ much less that, after they had made an end of him, ‘they parted his garments among them, and cast lots upon his vesture.’ It was our blessed Saviour alone in whom this prediction was verified; of him alone, that his enemies took up the taunting proverb, and said, ⁵ ‘He trusted in God that he would deliver him, let him deliver him, if he would have him;’ to him alone, that these words can, with any tolerable construction, belong, ⁶ ‘Many oxen are come about me, fat bulls of Bashan close me in on every side; they gape upon me with their mouths, as if it were a ramping and roaring lion;’ as he indeed appropriates the whole psalm to himself, when, in his dying minutes, he uttered this citation, ⁷ ‘My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?’

David, indeed, in all his troubles, had no occasion to make this lamentation; for though the malice and persecutions of Saul were upon him, yet he had always abundant reason to say of God, ⁸ ‘Thou art my stony rock, and my defence, my Saviour, my God, and my might: my buckler, the horn also of my salvation, and my refuge: therefore will I follow upon mine enemies, and overtake them; neither will I turn again till I have destroyed them.’ His splendour and greatness, his victories and conquests, the reduction of his foes, and the enlargement of his kingdom, made him a proper emblem of our Saviour’s exaltation, and triumph over our spiritual enemies; but there are few passages in his life resembling his sufferings, and none at all that will justify this complaint, ⁹ ‘I am poured out like water, and all my bones are out of joint; my strength is dried up like a potsherd, and my tongue cleaveth to my gums.’ So true is that observation of Grotius, ¹⁰ ‘That partiality was the cause of these new explications, among the Jews, and that those which they formerly received, agreed very well with the sense of Christians.’

Upon the decree of Cyrus, for the restoration of the Jews, we find Zerubbabel, among other princes of the people, superintending matters, and taking upon him the government of the tribe to which he belonged; but that he should be the person intended by Micah’s prophecy, is a thing impossible; because he was not born in Bethlehem, which is the place assigned for the birth of a ruler that the prophet mentions, but in Babylon, as his name imports. That it was essentially necessary for the Messiah to be born in ¹¹ Bethlehem, and no where else, is plain from the answer which the scribes and Pharisees make Herod, upon his consulting them, and their quotation of Micah for the proof of it; is plain from the general notion which, not only the learned, but the vulgar, at this time, had imbibed, namely, ¹² ‘That Christ was to come of the seed of David, and out of the town of Bethlehem, where David was born;’ and is plain from the petition in their liturgy, wherein they still pray for the advent of the Messiah, in these terms: ¹³ ‘Shake thyself from the dust, arise, put on thy beautiful garments, O my people; by the hand of Benjesse, the Bethlehemite, bring redemption near to my soul;’ so that the prophecy, in all reason, must be applied to the person that was born there, and not to one whose place of nativity was in a distant country. It is to be observed farther, that Zerubbabel was never any ruler of Israel; for though he might be at the head of the capacity for some years, yet it was without the title or authority of a governor, and when he had executed his commission, he returned to Babylon, and there died. But even supposing he were never so much a governor, it is certainly carrying the matter too far, to say of him, that he ¹⁴ ‘should stand and rule in the strength of the Lord, and in the majesty of the Lord his God;’ much more it is so, to say, that the going forth or birth of this ruler was of old, and from the days of eternity, as the marginal note has it, which is only applicable to the Messiah, and, in a proper sense, only verified in our blessed Saviour, ¹⁵ ‘who in the beginning was with God.’

And, in like manner, if we consider the words of the prophet Isaiah, in the 53d chapter, and compare them with our Lord’s history, as the evangelists have recorded it, we shall soon perceive that they are applicable to none but our blessed Saviour only; for, to waive other arguments that might be drawn from them, with what propriety of construction can any of these passages, ¹⁶ ‘he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and by his stripes we are healed;’ be applied to the Jewish nation? When did we ever hear that the Jews bore the griefs, and carried the sorrows of others; that they were wounded for other men’s transgressions, and bruised for iniquities not their own? The public calamities which God, at any time, sent upon them, are by all the prophets imputed to their own sins; but the person here afflicted is said to have done ‘no violence, neither was any deceit found in his mouth;’ and does this character suit them under any captivity, or other sort of calamity, that the prophet might have in view? If we will believe him, it is plain, that he had another opinion of them, when, in the very beginning of his prophecy, we find him lamenting them and their captivity, in these words: ¹⁷ ‘Ah, sinful nation! A people laden with iniquity, a seed of evil doers, children that are corrupters; they have forsaken the Lord, they are gone backwards; wherefore your country is desolate, your cities are burnt with fire, your land strangers devour it in your presence, and it is desolate, as overthrown by strangers.

The sum of our answer is this: if our Saviour and his apostles cannot be supposed, with any justness of reasoning, or prospect of success, to allege prophecies concerning the Messiah, which the Jewish church, at that time, did not acknowledge to be intended of him; if all the prophecies thus alleged do even yet appear, by several of their most renowned doctors to be interpreted of the Messiah; if the 22d psalm cannot, with any propriety of construction, be applied to David, nor the 4th chap. of Micah to Zerubbabel, nor the 53d of Isaiah to the Jewish nation in general; and if good reasons may be assigned, why the present and ancient doctors of the Jewish church do differ in the manner of applying the predictions of the prophets; then is the Christian interpretation of them, which appears to be plain and natural, and has antiquity on its side, not to be less esteemed, because some, out of partiality and prejudice, have forced their wits to invent another.

Nay, even supposing that there were more grounds than what hitherto have appeared, to dispute the justness of the allegation of any prophecy; yet still we Christians must aver, that the application of Christ and his apostles is to be preferred before that of any other, because it was attended with such irresistible proof of its truth and fidelity, as must overbear all objections to the contrary. ¹ For, upon a dispute of the application of some passage, or a competition of two different senses of the same passage, can any thing in nature be more decisive than the testimony of God? And can the testimony of God appear by any stronger evidence than by the power of miracles supporting the allegation? God certainly knew the intention of every prophecy delivered by his Spirit; and therefore, if Christ and his apostles, when they applied any prophecy to the Messiah, gave the best proof that could be given of their being sent by God, and of their speaking and acting by his commission, God himself must be understood as confirming their application. The authority of the application, or of the exposition, must, in such a case, be equal to that of the prophecy; for there cannot be a better proof that the prophet was sent from God, than the expositor gives of his mission: and the reason for his assenting to the one as well as the other, is on both sides the same.

The result of this whole inquiry is this,—That, since our blessed Saviour appeals to the writings of the prophets for the proof of his being the Messiah or messenger sent from God to deliver his will to mankind; and since the marks and characters which the prophets give of the Messiah, are found all to agree and unite in him, according to the account which the evangelists give us of his life, we have all the reason in the world to believe, that he was really the person he pretended to be; that his doctrine, consequently, is the word of God, and his religion ² ‘the grace of God, that bringeth salvation, and hath appeared unto all men; teaching us, that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour JESUS CHRIST.’

SECT. III.

CHAP. I.—Containing an account of things, from our Lord's transfiguration to his last entry into Jerusalem.

THE HISTORY.

THE day following our Lord's transfiguration, (for that transaction was very probably in the night-time,) ^a as he came down from the mount, he perceived the scribes in deep debate ^b with the apostles he had left behind him, and while he was inquiring into the subject of their dispute, a certain man, breaking through the crowd, came and fell prostrate at his feet, and besought him to have pity upon his only son, a deplorable object, a lunatic, ^c and possessed, deaf and dumb, often thrown upon the ground, and into the fire and water, racked with violent convulsions, accompanied with dismal outcries, foamings, bruises, and torments, and every way in so desperate a condition, that his disciples, in his absence, were not able to cure him. Our Lord, upon hearing of this, was ^d not a little grieved at the want of faith in his disciples, but ordered the child to be brought

^a The evangelist acquaints us, that while our Saviour was at prayer on the mount, St Peter, ‘and they that were with him, were heavy with sleep,’ (Luke ix. 32.) which, in some measure, confirms the conjecture, that the transfiguration was in the night; a time much more proper for the display of the lustre of such an appearance, than if it had happened in the broad daylight.—Calmel's Commentary.

^b What the subject matter of this debate was, the evangelists have not informed us; but it seems not unlikely, that the scribes were disputing with the apostles about their master's method of ejecting devils, and the power which, in that matter, he had conferred upon them; because, in the case before them, they saw them nonplused, and not able to cast a devil out of one, who, in his absence, was brought to them. This is the rather probable, not only because our Saviour's dispossessing devils was what gravelled and vexed the scribes and Pharisees more than all his other miracles, and forced them to the sorry refuge of, ‘he casteth out devils by Beelzebub, the prince of devils;’ but because, upon his coming to the timely relief of his apostles, and demanding of the scribes, what they were questioning and disputing about, it immediately follows, one of the multitude answered and said, ‘Master, I have brought unto thee my son, which hath a dumb spirit:—And I spake to thy disciples, that they should cast him out, and they could not;’ (Mark ix. 17. 18.)—Poole's Annotations.

^c The word σεληνιαῖος, comes from σελήνη, the moon, and signifies literally, ‘he is moon-struck.’ From the symptoms mentioned here and at Mark ix. 18. this disorder is supposed to have been epilepsy; under whose paroxysms those afflicted with it are deprived of all sense, bodily and mental, and nearly all articulation. And as we find, in the ancient medical writers, epileptic patients said to be moonstruck, agreeably to the common notion, of the influence of the moon in producing the disorder, it is very possible that the disorder in question was epilepsy. Be that, however, as it may, the symptoms are all reconcilable with demoniacal influence.—Bloomfield's Greek Testament.—ED.

^d The rebuke which our Saviour utters upon this occasion, ‘O faithless and perverse generation, how long shall I be with you,’ &c. (Mat. xvii. 17.) seems to be intended for the whole company, and every one to have a share in it, in proportion to their deserts. The disciples are not exempted; for they are charged with infidelity, ver. 20. The father of the patient is pointed at, for his faith was wavering, Mark ix. 21, &c. And the whole nation of the Jews is included in it; for this was expressly their character of old, ‘a very froward and perverse generation, and children in whom is no faith,’ (Deut. xxxii. 5.)—Beausobre's Annotations.

to him. As he was drawing near, the devil began to rack him with convulsions, which put the father in a terrible fright; and when our Lord commanded the evil spirit to depart out of the young man, and never to molest him more; after some hideous outcries, he tore and distorted him to such a degree, that he left him breathless on the ground, so that many concluded he was quite dead: but Jesus, taking him by the hand, lifted him up, and delivered him to his father, perfectly cured, to the great astonishment of all the spectators. And when his disciples in private desired to know the reason why they could not cast out this spirit, he imputed it, partly to their want of faith, and partly to this spirit's being of a kind^a which was not to be ejected without fasting and prayer.

From the mount of transfiguration, our Lord proceeded in his journey through the other parts of Galilee towards Capernaum, and, as they were in the way, he acquainted his disciples, the second time, with his approaching death and resurrection, desiring them to take good notice of what he told them; but the hopes of a temporal kingdom had so intoxicated their minds, that they found it very difficult to believe,^b or conceive what he said, and yet they were afraid to ask him to explain it.

In the same journey there arose a dispute^c among the apostles, which of them should have the chief place of dignity^d in their Master's Kingdom, still dreaming of a temporal sovereignty. This our Saviour by his divine Spirit knew; and therefore, to give an effectual check to their ambitious thoughts, he first informed them, that then they could not comprehend how their master, whom they knew to be the Messiah, and Son of God, and whom consequently they believed to be immortal and eternal, could possibly be put to death, or suffer the affronts and outrages of men. These notions to them seemed incompatible, and therein they conceived a mystery, which they could not understand. But the modern Jews have endeavoured to reconcile these two notions, by inventing the distinction of Messiah Ben Joseph, who was to die, and Messiah Ben David, who was to triumph and live for ever.—Cabnet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^c There is some small difference in the several ways wherein the evangelists have related this matter. St Matthew tells us, that 'the disciples came to Jesus, saying, Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven?' (c. xvii. 1.) St Mark, that Christ put this question to them, 'and they held their peace,' (ix. 34.) and St Luke, that they had been disputing this point among themselves, and Jesus, 'perceiving the thoughts of their hearts, took a child,' &c. (ix. 46, 47.) Now, to reconcile this seeming repugnancy, we must observe, that as our Saviour was going to Capernaum, his disciples followed him, 'discoursing among themselves,' as St Mark has it, 'who of them was to be the greatest in the kingdom of heaven:' that when they came to him in the house, having still the same ambitious notion in their minds, he asked them, 'What was it that you discoursed of in the way?' But they, being ashamed to tell him, 'held their peace;' and that then our Saviour, who well understood what the subject of their discourse had been, endeavoured, by the example of a child, to cure their distemper, and to inform them what disposition of mind was proper to qualify them both for his kingdom of grace here, and his kingdom of glory hereafter. St Matthew indeed, according to our translation, represents the thing as if the disciples had put the question to their master, 'Who should be greatest in the kingdom of heaven?' But that the particle λέγουσιν relates not to Jesus, but to the disciples, and means not the external speech, but the inward reasoning of their minds, is obvious from their silence, which St Mark takes notice of, and our Saviour's perceiving the thought of their hearts, which St Luke remarks. For, had themselves propounded the question to our Saviour, as the version in St Matthew seems to imply, we cannot see why they should not answer his demand, which tended to the same purpose; nor can we imagine why he should be represented as 'perceiving the thoughts of their hearts,' had they already declared these thoughts in plain words.—Whitby's Annotations.

^d The apostles, as well as the other Jews, had imbibed the notion, which they never got quit of, until the descent of the Holy Ghost instructed them better, that the Messiah, when he came upon earth, should erect a temporal kingdom; and, as the Jews in general expect, that they should then be constituted lords over all other nations: so the apostles, who believed their master to be the Messiah, were naturally led to think that they should have the preference before all other Jews; and that, since the king Messiah, according to the custom of other sovereigns, was to have some officers of the highest rank, they made no question but that some of them would be made choice of, though they were not so well agreed who were the fittest or most deserving of these high posts of honour. Some of them were our Lord's relations, and others had parts and endowments extraordinary; of some he had given high commendations, and others he had admitted to a participation of his most secret retirements. These things might possibly raise some emulation among them: and therefore, as our Saviour's dominion was not of this world, he plainly tells them, that all such worldly desires and expectations were inconsistent with that spiritual kingdom which he was to erect, and wherein he 'who desired to be first, was to be last of all, and servant of all.' (Mark ix. 35.)—Whitby's and Poole's Annotations.

^a Josephus, who himself was a Pharisee, and well acquainted with the notions of every sect among the Jews, gives it for a current opinion, that the demons, in his and some preceding ages, were nothing else but the souls of wicked men, who after death took possession of the living, and were continually either afflicting and tormenting, or exciting and soliciting them to such sins, as they found were agreeable and complexional to them; and that, according to their different ways of vexing or tempting those that they possessed, they had different appellations given them, an unclean spirit, a deaf and dumb spirit, a spirit of infirmity, &c. In conformity to this notion perhaps it is, that our Saviour here takes notice of the different kinds of evil spirits, and as, among wicked men, there are different degrees of impiety, and some are more hardened and profligate than others: so he seems to intimate, that some of these spirits are more desperate and malicious than others; (Mat. xii. 45.) but all of them obstinate enough, and, might they have their own option, unwilling to leave the bodies they have taken possession of. Here they think themselves safe, and, in some measure, screened from the divine vengeance; and therefore, we find them at some times crying to our Lord, 'Let us alone; what have we to do with thee? Art thou come to torment us?' (Mat. viii. 29.) And, at others, when commanded to depart, tearing and torturing the possessed, and quitting their habitation not without much reluctancy. (Mark ix. 26.) 'The apostles, no doubt, had conjured this evil spirit before in their master's name, and, on several occasions, had found the prevailing power of faith, even when theirs was not so well improved as it was at present; and yet, how faith becomes necessary in the exorcism of devils, when we find strangers doing it in the name of Christ, (Mark ix. 38.) or how the faith of the apostles came to be defective now, when, not many days before, it was so very effectual; why some evil spirits were proof against the name of Christ, whilst others fled at the bare mention of it; and why some surrendered at the first summons, while fasting and prayer were the only artillery that could dislodge others. These, and many other questions that might be raised from our Saviour's words, are points wherein the best commentators we have met with have not once attempted to give us any satisfaction.—Cabnet's Commentary.—Campbell and other commentators suggest that the words 'this kind' do not refer to a particular kind of demons, but mean "this kind or order of beings called demons," and perhaps this is the most satisfactory sense of the passage, which is confessedly difficult.—Ed.

^b The words in the text are, 'they understood not this saying, and it was hid from them.' (Luke ix. 45.) They understood our Saviour's words, no doubt, and what the import was of his being 'delivered into the hands of men and put to death;' but the only way for any man to become great in his kingdom, was to be lowly in his own esteem; and then, calling a little child,^a and setting him in the midst of them, he proposed him as a pattern of meekness and humility; recommended such children, and, in them, all humble Christians, to the favour of mankind; cautioned them against doing any injury,^b or giving any offence to such, because of their guardian angels; ^c and, to remove the occasion of all such offences, exhorted them to mortify their inordinate affections, though they were as dear to them as an eye, a hand, or a foot, because his heavenly Father, like a diligent shepherd that delights in the recovery of a stray sheep, was unwilling that any believer should perish. Together with these reasons against scandal and offences, he prescribed some excellent rules in relation to brotherly reproof, church censures, and forgiveness of injuries; and for the enforcement of this last duty, he propounded the parable of a certain king, who, calling his servants to account, found that one of them owed him an immense sum, no less than ten thousand talents, which, upon his insolvency, and humble petition, he freely forgave; and yet, this very wretch was no sooner out of the king's presence, than he seized upon his fellow servant for a trifle of a debt, a debt of an hundred pence only, and cast him into prison, even

^a Some of the ancients are of opinion that this child was St Ignatius, who was afterwards bishop of Antioch, and famous in the Christian church for his writing and dying in defence of the truth. However this be, it is certain that a child, who has no concern for dominion or empire over others, who is free from all covetous desires of wealth, and knows nothing of what a post of honour means, was, in this case, a very proper emblem of that simplicity, innocence, and humility, that our Lord requires in all his disciples.—Calmet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^b The words in the caution are, 'whoso shall offend one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea' (Mat. xviii. 6.) To offend or scandalize is to discourage men in the profession and practice of religion, and by indignities and persecutions, as well as by bad examples, to occasion their apostatizing from the faith: for we can hardly imagine, that so severe a punishment as is here threatened, should be inflicted for a crime of less aggravation than what this amounts to. Grotius, upon the place, is of opinion, that the millstone about the neck alludes to a custom of drowning among the Syrians. But St Jerome thinks that this manner of execution was in use among the Jews; for, according to Dr Alix, it was customary for them to cast execrable men into the Dead Sea, with a stone tied to them. It is certain from Diodorus Siculus, and others, that among the Greeks this was the ancient punishment for sacrilegious persons; and from Suetonius we may learn, that for the pride and covetousness wherewith some in public offices had infested the province where they lived, Augustus had them cast into the river, with great weights about their necks.—Whitby's Annotations.

^c The fathers looked on this as an argument that each good man had his particular guardian angel: (see Suicer. Thesaur. vol. i. p. 43.) And Grotius seems to allow the force of it. I apprehend this passage rather intimates, that the angels, who sometimes attend the little ones spoken of, at other times stand in God's immediate presence; and consequently that different angels are at different times employed in this kind office, if it be incessantly performed. The general sense is plain, that the highest angels do not disdain, on proper occasions, to perform services of protection and friendship for the meanest Christian; but as St Paul says, they are 'all ministering spirits sent forth to minister to the heirs of salvation;' (Heb. i. 14.) I say the highest; because 'to behold the face of God' may signify 'waiting near his throne,' and be an allusion to the office of chief ministers in earthly courts, who daily converse with their princes. See Grotius: and compare 2 Sam. vi. 19. 1 Kings xii. 6; Esth. i. 14; and Luke i. 19.—Doddridge's Expositor.—Ed.

though he had used the same pathetic entreaties to him that himself had done to the king his master: which when the king came to understand, he sent for the ungrateful villain, upbraided him with his baseness and cruelty, and then, in great rage, ordered him to prison until he should discharge the whole debt: "and so likewise shall my heavenly Father," says our Lord in the application, "deal with all such as will not forgive their brother's trespasses from their hearts."

While he was giving these instructions to his disciples, he was interrupted by John, the son of Zebedee, informing him of a certain stranger,^d who cast out devils in his name, but because he was not of their fraternity, that he had forbidden him; which conduct Jesus by no means could approve of, because he looked upon it as a sure argument, that whoever did miracles in his name, could be no enemy to his person.

With this discourse they arrived at Capernaum, where the collectors^e of a certain tribute for the use of the temple, came to Peter, and asked him if his master was accustomed to pay it? And, when Peter went in to acquaint him with the officer's demands, 'Of whom,' says our Lord, preventing him, 'do the kings of the Gentiles take tribute? Of their own children, or of strangers?' Peter answered, 'Of strangers: if so,' rejoined our Saviour, 'then are the children free:' meaning, that since Gentile kings did not exact tribute of their own household, this tribute, which was paid to God for his temple, was not due from him, who was his Son, nor from them, who were his domestics; however, to avoid all occasions of offence, he ordered him to go, and cast an hook into the sea, because in the mouth of the first fish that he caught he would find a piece of money,^f just of proper value to give to the collectors for them both; which accordingly came to pass.

^d That this man did truly cast out devils, our Lord's answer supposes, and his disciples saw with their eyes: but then the question is,—How a person, who did not follow Christ could cast out devils in his name: to which it may be answered, 1st, That this person might believe in Jesus, without being one of his retinue, and follow his doctrine, though he did not his person. 2dly, He might do miracles in the name of Jesus Christ, without being one of his true disciples, even as Judas is supposed to have done, and those others to whom our Lord will profess, 'I never knew you; depart from me, ye workers of iniquity,' Mat. vii. 23. Or, 3dly, He might be a disciple of John the Baptist, and so do his miracles in the name of Christ, shortly to come. But by what means soever it was that he did them, it is no small confirmation of the truth of Christianity, that our Saviour's name was thus powerful, even among those that did not follow him, and therefore were incapable of doing any thing by way of compact with him.—Whitby's and Poole's Annotations; and Calmet's Commentary.

^e Every Jew that was twenty years old, was obliged to pay annually two Attic drams, or half a shekel, about fifteen pence of our money, for the use of the sanctuary, (Exod. xxx. 13, 16.) or to buy sacrifices, and other things necessary for the service of the temple: and that this was the tribute which the collectors here demanded, and not any tax, payable to the Roman emperors, as some imagine, is evident, not only from our Saviour's argument, namely, that he was the son of that heavenly King to whom it was paid, and, consequently, had a right to plead his exemption; but from the word διδραχμα, which, according to Josephus, [Antiq. b. 18. c. 12.] was the proper word for this capitation-tax that was paid to the temple at Jerusalem; whereas the Cæsarean tribute money was the denarius, a Roman coin, and would have been gathered by the usual officers, the publicans, and not by the persons who are here styled, as by a known title, 'they that received the διδραχμα.—Hammond's and Whitby's Annotations.

A. M. 4035. A. D. 31; OR, A. M. 5441. A. D. 30. FROM MAT. xii. 1—xvii. 14. MARK ii. 23—ix. 14. LUKE vi. 1—ix. 37. JOHN v. 1—vii. 1.

About this time the ^a feast of tabernacles drew near; and some of our Lord's relations, out of vanity more than good-will, were very earnest with him to go up to Jerusalem at this great concourse of people, in order to show his miracles in the capital, which hitherto, as they said, had been concealed in an obscure part of the world: but our Lord, for the present, ^b would not yield to their importunity, though, in a short time, he set forward to Jerusalem, but in a very private manner, for fear of awakening the jealousy of his enemies. As he was to pass through the province of Samaria, ^c he sent four drachmas, or one shekel, in our money about half a crown; and the reason why our Saviour paid for none of the apostles but St Peter only, was, because these receivers demanded it only of those that dwelt at Capernaum, as our Saviour and St Peter did, leaving the other apostles to pay it in the several places of their abode.—Hammond's Annotations.—Here is a proof that Jesus was possessed of divine attributes. He knew that in the first fish that came up, there would be such a coin; which proved his omniscience. It is by no means strange that a fish should have swallowed a silver coin; such cases have often occurred.—Barnes.—Ed.

^a The feast of tabernacles, kept in commemoration of the Israelites' sojourning in the wilderness, and living in tents for the space of forty years, was one of the three great annual festivals, wherein all the males were obliged to appear at Jerusalem. It began to be celebrated on the fifteenth day of the month Tisri, which answers in part to our October and September, and is the first month of their civil, and the seventh in their sacred year.—Calmel's Commentary.

^b Our Lord well knew the rancorous prejudice of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and therefore did not think proper to reside among them any longer than was absolutely necessary. They had more than once attempted his life, and therefore very little hopes remained that they would believe his miracles, or embrace his doctrine; but, on the contrary, there was great reason to think they would destroy him, if possible, before he had finished the work for which he assumed the veil of human nature, and resided among the sons of men. 'My time,' said the blessed Jesus to these unbelieving relations, 'is not yet come; but your time is always ready. The world cannot hate you; but me it hateth, because I testify of it, that the works thereof are evil. Go ye up unto this feast; I go not yet unto this feast; for my time is not yet full come,' John vii. 6, 7, 8. As if he had said, It is not proper for me to go before the feast begins; but you may repair to the capital whenever you please; the Jews are your friends, you have done nothing to displease them: but the purity of the doctrine I have preached to them, and the freedom with which I have reproved their hypocrisy and other enormous crimes, have provoked their malice to the utmost height, and therefore, as the time of my sufferings is not yet come, it is not prudent for me to go soon to Jerusalem. There was also another reason why our blessed Saviour refused to accompany these relations to the feast of tabernacles: the roads were crowded with people, and these gathering round him, and accompanying him to Jerusalem, would doubtless have given fresh offence to his enemies, and have in a great measure prevented his miracles and doctrines from having the desired effect. He therefore chose to continue in Galilee, till the crowd were all gone up to Jerusalem, when he followed, 'as it were in secret,' neither preaching, nor working miracles by the way; so that no crowd attended him to the feast.—Ed.

^c Samaria was a province that lay between Galilee and Judea, and our Saviour's nearest way to Jerusalem was through it. But then it may be questioned, why the Samaritans, who lived at a less distance from Jerusalem than the Galileans, came to be more corrupted in their religion? To which the most probable answer is,—'That when the king of Assyria had taken Samaria, and carried away the people captive,' 2 Kings xvii., in their room he planted colonies of his own subjects, who were gross idolaters, and more especially in the country of Samaria, properly so called, because it was a province which lay in the heart of his new conquest, and might therefore keep the others, that depended on it, in subjection. Now, these idolaters, mixing with the Jews that were left behind, made up a strange medley of relisome of his apostles to provide him lodgings ^d in one of the villages; but the inhabitants, perceiving that he was going to Jerusalem to the feast, ^e were so uncivil as to refuse him entertainment.

This indignity put upon their master, so exasperated James and his brother John, that they desired leave of him, in imitation of Elias, to command fire down from heaven to consume such inhospitable wretches; but instead of giving any such permission, ^g our Saviour took gion, which was not quite reformed, even in our Saviour's time; and therefore he tells the Samaritan woman, at Jacob's well, 'ye worship ye know not what,' (John iv. 22,) whereas the people of Galilee, having few of the Assyrians planted among them, kept their religion more pure and unmixed, and, after the destruction of the temple of Gerizzim by John Hyrcanus, held constant communion with the temple of Jerusalem, even though Gabinius, when he was governor of Syria, had built the Samaritans another; and in relation to this communion it is, that our Saviour tells the same woman, speaking of himself among other Galileans, 'we know what we worship; for salvation is of the Jews.'

^d The great multitude that accompanied our Saviour, and the little or no provision that he usually carried with him, made it necessary for some to go before to make preparation for his reception; and his two apostles, James and John, are supposed to be the persons employed in this capacity; because we find them, in particular, resenting the indignity put upon their master.—Calmel's Dictionary.

^e Josephus tells us,—'That, as it was an usual thing for the Galileans to travel by the way of Samaria to Jerusalem, upon the celebration of their festivals, one time, as they passed by a village, called Nais, under the jurisdiction of Samaria, and situated in the great Plain, there happened a quarrel between the passengers and villagers, wherein several of the Galileans were slain, and which afterwards occasioned a civil war between these two provinces.' And as it was a common thing for the Samaritans to be angry with the Galileans in general for passing by their temple to go to Jerusalem; so they might much more resent it in our Saviour, because as he was accounted a prophet sent from God, by this action he plainly decided the controversy between them and the Jews, touching the place which God had appointed for his religious worship.—Joseph. Antiq. b. 20, c. 5; Jewish Wars, b. 2, c. 11, and Whitby's Annotations.

^f The history of Elias, to which the apostles refer us, is doubtless that, where, by the direction of God, that prophet called for fire from heaven to destroy those captains and their companies whom king Abaziah sent out to apprehend him, 2 Kings i. 10, &c. And when these two apostles desired the like judgment upon the village of Samaria, for refusing to receive their master, they verified their name of being sons of thunder, which, upon account of their fiery zeal, their master had before given them. (Mark iii. 17.)

^g What the two apostles had to allege in behalf of their intended severity against these Samaritans, was,—'That they were schismatics, and had set up another temple in opposition to that at Jerusalem; that they were heretics, and, together with the worship of the God of Israel, had mixed that of pagan idols; that the person whom they had affronted, had a character much superior to that of Elias; and that, by an exemplary punishment inflicted upon this village, they might convince the rest of the Samaritans of God's displeasure against their way of worship, and of the divine mission of their master, who was the true Messiah. But, notwithstanding these plausible allegations, our Saviour rebuked them, and in his rebuke gave them to understand, that a spirit of severity towards erroneous persons, in whomsoever it is found, is highly opposite to the calm temper of Christianity, which is 'pure and peaceable, gentle and easy to be entreated, full of mercy, and good works,' (James iii. 17,) and that it was repugnant to the end for which he came into the world, which was to discontinue all fierceness and rage, and furious zeal, that occasion so many mischiefs among mankind, and to beget in all his followers such a disposition as exerts itself in 'love, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, and meekness,' (Gal. v. 22, 23,) even to those of the most contrary tempers and persuasion.—Whitby's Annotations.

care to inform them, that the marks of a Christian were meekness and love, not fury and revenge; that the true end and design of his coming into the world 'was, not to destroy, but to save men's lives;' and, that he might prove his doctrine by his practice, when ten leprous persons, who came out of the neighbourhood, where he had been so rudely treated, presented themselves with loud cries to him for help, his compassion was as ready to relieve, as their necessity to ask; for while they were going to ^a show themselves to the priest, as he directed them, they all found themselves cured. But see the great ingratitude of human nature! Of the ten who received this miraculous blessing, but one returned to give our Saviour thanks, and he was a Samaritan.

Having thus returned good for evil, and the greatest kindness for the most palpable affront, our Lord proceeded on his journey, and came to another village where he lodged that night; but before he arrived at Jerusalem, he sent out seventy ^b of his disciples, by two and two together, in the same manner as he had sent his twelve apostles, into those places which he himself, in a short time, intended to visit, and gave them instructions much of the same import with what, upon the like occasion, he had given his apostles.

The feast of tabernacles always continued eight days; but, for some time after his arrival, our Saviour did not appear publicly, which occasioned no small inquiry, and various discourses concerning him; some saying that he was a good man, and others an impostor, who deluded the people. At length, when every one began to despair of seeing him, about the middle of the feast, he showed himself openly, and went and taught in the temple, to the great admiration of the Jews, who were not a little surprised to find him, whose education had been ^a By the priests, to whom our Saviour remits these lepers, we are to understand the priests at Jerusalem; for we can hardly suppose that he would send them to those of mount Gerizzim, when himself, both in his words and practice, had sufficiently declared the illegality of their institution; 'and therefore, by sending them to Jerusalem, where they were to make their offerings for their cleansing,' (Lev. xiv. 2, etc.) he not only decided the controversy between the Jews and the Samaritans, but gave them likewise to understand, that, before they reached Jerusalem, he would undoubtedly heal them.—Whitby's Annotations and Hammond's Paraphrase.

^b In place of the common version, Luke xvi. we should rather read seventy others, not other seventy, as our translation has it, which seems to intimate that he had appointed seventy before this time, though, probably, the word other has a reference to the twelve chosen first: he not only chose twelve disciples to be constantly with him; but he chose seventy others to go before him. Our blessed Lord formed every thing in his church, on the model of the Jewish church; and why? Because it was the pattern shown by God himself, the divine form, which pointed out the heavenly substance which now began to be established in its place. As he before had chosen twelve apostles, in reference to the twelve patriarchs who were the chiefs of the twelve tribes and the heads of the Jewish church, he now publicly appointed (for so the word ἀποστόλων means) seventy others, as Moses did the seventy elders whom he associated with himself to assist him in the government of the people. (Exod. xviii. 19, xxiv. 1—9.) These Christ sent by two and two: 1. To teach them the necessity of concords among the ministers of righteousness. 2. That in the mouth of two witnesses every thing might be established. And 3. That they might comfort and support each other in their difficult labour. See on Mark vi. 7. Several MSS. and Versions have seventy-two. Sometimes the Jews chose six out of each tribe: this was the number of the great sanhedrim. The names of these seventy disciples are found in the margin of some ancient MSS., but this authority is questionable.—Ed.

destitute of all learning, so perfect in the Scriptures. But, to obviate this exception, he gave them to understand, that the doctrine wherein he instructed them, was not of human acquisition, but divine inspiration; and that it was a very base and ungenerous thing in them, to endeavour to take away the life of one, who taught them nothing but what was agreeable to the law of Moses, whereof they made so loud a profession. In this manner he preached to the people for the remaining part of the feast; and, ^c on the last and greatest day thereof, took occasion, from the custom of fetching water from the fountain of Siloah in great pomp, and pouring it upon the altar of burnt-offerings in great abundance, to acquaint them with the future effusion of the Holy Ghost, which he intended to send down upon all those that believed in him.^d

Those who knew the great hatred which the ruling part of the nation had conceived against him, admired to hear him speak with so much freedom and intrepidity; and those who had seen the number and greatness of his miracles, were by them convinced that he was the true Messiah; but the prejudice of his being a Galilean, and not acknowledged by any of their rulers and learned rabbis, led others into a contrary persuasion. In the confusion, officers were sent from the sanhedrim to apprehend him; but they were so taken with his person and preaching, that they became his disciples; for,

^c From the twenty-ninth chapter of the book of Numbers we learn, that on the first day of this feast, thirteen bullocks were to be offered; on the second, twelve; on the third, eleven; on the fourth, ten; on the fifth, nine; on the sixth, eight; on the seventh, seven; and on the eighth, or last, only one; so that, in regard to the sacrifices, the last day was the least of all, and yet the Jews accounted it the greatest, because on that day the King of Israel, as the Talmudists love to speak, was entertained by his own people only, and not by those of any other nation. For their tradition is, that on the first day of the feast their ancestors when the temple was standing, sacrificed seventy bullocks for the seventy nations (for they supposed just so many) that are upon the face of the earth; but on the last day no more than one, but that in the name of the people of Israel only. And, as they imagine that an earthly prince may sometimes instead of a vast entertainment, desire but a small collation with his first favourite, that they may have an opportunity of some familiar converse together; so upon the account of the intimate friendship with God, which the Jews on that day thought themselves admitted to, and the excessive joy which, from the sense of that friendship, they expressed in all the outward significations of music, singing, and dancing, the last day of the feast of tabernacles was always accounted the greatest.—Surenkusii Conciliations, in loca F. T. apud Johan.

^d The last day grew into high esteem with the nation because on the preceding seven days, they held that sacrifices were offered not so much for themselves, as for the whole world. They offered, in the course of them, seventy bullocks for the seventy nations of the world; but the eighth was wholly on their own behalf. They had then this solemn offering of water, the reason of which is this;—at the passover the Jews offered an omer to obtain from God his blessing on their harvest; at Pentecost, their first fruits, to request his blessing on the fruits of the trees; and in the feast of tabernacles they offered water to God, partly referring to the water from the rock in the wilderness, (1 Cor. x. 4,) but chiefly to solicit the blessing of rain on the approaching seed-time. These waters they drew out of Siloah, and brought them into the temple with the sound of the trumpet and great rejoicing. "He who hath not seen the rejoicing on the drawing of this water, hath seen no rejoicing at all, (Succah. fol. li. 1.—Lightfoot.) Christ, alluding to these customs, proclaims, 'if any man thirst let him come unto me.' He takes, as very usual with him, the present occasion of the water brought from Siloah, to summon them to him as the true fountain.—Ed.

upon their return, they told the council that they could not execute their office, because ^a ‘never man spake like him;’ so that the Pharisees, who were part of the assembly, being more enraged at their reason which they gave than by the neglect of their duty, upbraided them for being so easily seduced, and for following the error of an ignorant mob; until Nicodemus, who had formerly conversed with our Lord, and was indeed a secret disciple of his, seeing with what violence his enemies were bent against him, could not forbear interposing in his behalf, by urging the unlawfulness of condemning a person without hearing; so that, after some reflections thrown upon him, as a favourer of this Galilean, ^b who could have no pretensions, as they said, to the title of a prophet, the assembly ^c broke up, without proceeding any farther against him; because, indeed, as yet his time was not fully come.

In the evening, Jesus repaired to the mount of Olives, about a mile from the city, and where he sometimes used to pass the night with his apostles. Early next morning he returned to the temple, and as he was teaching the people that were gathered about him, the Scribes and Pharisees brought in a woman, taken in the act of adultery, and desired him to give his judgment in the case. Their purpose was to find an occasion of accusing him, either of assuming a judicial power, if he condemned her, or of nulling the law, if he acquitted her. But he, as if he had not much minded them, stooped down, and wrote ^d something with his finger upon the dust of the pavement; till, upon their importuning him for an answer, he raised himself up, and said, ^e ‘He that is without sin among you, let him cast the first stone;’ and so stooping down, wrote as before. This unexpected answer baffled these insidious accusers, who, thoroughly convinced of their own crimes, retired, one by one, and ^f left the woman alone; so that, when our Lord lift up himself again, and found none but the woman standing by him, he asked her, what was become of her accusers, and whether any one had condemned her? And when he understood, by her answer, that no one had, ^g ‘neither do I condemn thee,’ said he, ‘go, and sin no more.’

and others again, that it might rather be that passage in the psalmist: ‘Unto the ungodly said God, Why dost thou preach my laws, and takest my covenant in thy mouth? Whereas thou hatest to be reformed, and hast cast my words behind thee. When thou sawest a thief, thou consentedst unto him, and hast been partaker with the adulterers.’ (Ps. l. 16, &c.) But all this is mere guess-work; and it seems more prudent to say nothing of the actions of our Saviour, when we are not admitted to the reasons of them.—Cabnet's Commentary, and Beausobre's Annotations.

^e The rabbinical writers tell us, that when a man or woman was convicted of adultery they were led out to the brow of a hill, with their hands tied behind their backs, where their accusers pushed them down headlong; that, if with the fall they were killed, there was no more done to them; but if they were still alive, the same accusers were to roll great stones upon them, and if these did not despatch them, the company then all took up stones, and quite overwhelmed them with them. But we have nothing of all this in the law of Moses. In all the places where he makes mention of this punishment, we only find, that the criminal was to be led out of the city, ‘and stoned with stones till he died,’ and that ‘the hands of the witnesses should be first upon him, to put him to death, and afterwards the hands of all the people,’ Deut. xvii. 7. It is in allusion to this passage, that our Saviour says, ‘Let him that is without sin among you cast the first stone;’ because it badly becomes those who are guilty either of the same or greater crimes, to be so very zealous for the punishment of others. This however hinders not, but that magistrates, who are intrusted with the execution of the laws, should put them in force against malefactors, even though themselves are not entirely exempt from sin; but still it reminds them that they should execute judgment with compassion and tenderness, and as much moderation as the law will allow them; considering that they themselves are not free from guilt, but as obnoxious to punishment for other sins, as those poor creatures are, who have fallen into crimes that are punishable by human judicatures.—Cabnet's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

^f In the very next words it is said, that the woman ‘stood in the midst of the people,’ and our Lord’s apostles, who were his constant attendants, were doubtless not far from him; the meaning therefore of the expression must be, that she was left without any of her accusers, who, out of shame, sneaked away; being convicted in their consciences, that, whatever the woman was, they were no proper evidences against her: for, ‘not only the accuser, but not even the rebuker is to be endured,’ (says Tully, in Verron. Orat. 5.)—the man who is himself found guilty in that which he blames in others.’ Nor is it to be wondered, that upon this occasion, all the woman’s accusers departed from her, since the Jews themselves own, that adulteries did multiply under the second temple, when their rabbins came to permit every one, ‘to have four or five wives, and said, that they sinned not, if, after the example of the patriarchs, when they saw a beautiful woman, they desired to have her.’—Just. Mart. Dial. p. 363; Cabnet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^g Both Selden and Fagius are of opinion, that this woman might come under the number of them whose case is thus represented in the words of Deuteronomy; ‘If a damsel that is a virgin, be betrothed to a husband, and a man find her in the city, and he lie with her, then shall ye bring them both out unto the gate of the city, and ye shall stone them with stones, that they die; the damsel, because she cried not, being in the city; and

^a In these words there are two things remarkable; 1st, The power of Christ’s preaching to change the frame and temper of men’s spirits; for these men came with hearts alienated from Christ, and with intention to apprehend and carry him before the chief priests, but returned with great admiration of his excellency and worth. 2dly, The honesty and integrity of these men is very remarkable; for they do not return with a pretence that they feared the multitude, and therefore thought it dangerous to apprehend him, but ingeniously confess that they could not prevail with themselves to lay violent hands upon a person whose discourses were so excellent and divine.—Whitby's Annotations.

^b Our blessed Saviour was neither by birth nor by descent a Galilean; but, admitting he had been so, it is a false assertion to say, that no prophet ever arose out of Galilee since Nahum, though originally of the tribe of Simeon, according to the testimony of St Jerome, who himself was a Galilean, was born in that province, and in Elcisi, the same town which that father came from; since Jonas was undoubtedly of Gath-hepher, in the tribe of Zebulun, which lay in the land of Galilee (2 Kings xiv. 25.), and in the opinion of several, Malachi was of the same tribe, and born in the city of Sapha. For, as there can be no reason in nature, so is there no declaration of the divine will why a Galilean should not be inspired with the gift of prophecy as well as any other Jew.—Poole's and Beausobre's Annotations, and Cabnet's Commentary.

^c Some are of opinion that the party of Sadducees in the council, who held the rites and traditions of the Pharisees in great contempt, joined with Nicodemus, in not having Christ condemned without a fair hearing, which was no more than what the law required. (Deut. i. 16, 17.)—Poole's Annotations.

^d It is generally agreed, that upon this occasion our Lord wrote some memorable sentence or other, but what that sentence was, the conjectures of learned men have been various. Some have imagined that it was the reproof against a rigid and uncharitable temper, which occurs in his sermon on the mount: ‘Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother’s eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?’ (Mat. vii. 3.) others, that it was the very words which, upon raising himself up, he pronounced to the woman’s accuser: ‘He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her.’ (John viii. 7.)

After this interruption, Jesus returned to the business of instructing the people, and, in a sublime discourse, opened several great mysteries of Christianity, namely, his divine mission, his co-equality with the Father, his ability to give eternal life to his followers, and the necessity of believing in him, which would be more evident after his crucifixion; and thence taking occasion to expose the wickedness and degeneracy of those, who sought to take away his life, and how unlike to the behaviour of the sons of God and Abraham whom they boasted themselves to be, such causeless and inveterate malice was, he so provoked them with his severe reflections, and especially with the superiority which he claimed above Abraham that they took up stones to cast at him, had he not miraculously conveyed himself out of their hands. ^a

Before our Lord left Jerusalem, the seventy disciples, whom he had sent to preach the gospel, returned from their journey and ministry, greatly rejoicing, because the very devils, by virtue of his name, ^b were subjected to them; whereupon our Lord promised them still greater success; invested them with power to tread upon the most venomous beasts, ^c and all the malignant instruments

the man, because he hath humbled his neighbour's wife,' Deut. xxii. 23, 24. The punishment of stoning, which this law mentions, and the accusers of this woman here insist on, seem to favour this notion; and the indulgence which our Saviour showed her, looks as if she had suffered some kind of violence, though she was not entirely innocent. Our Saviour, however, could not act in the capacity of a judge, because that was no part of his present ministry: though therefore he was so far from approving her conduct, that he sufficiently blamed her, in bidding her 'sin no more,' yet was he restrained from pronouncing any sentence of condemnation upon her; because the end of his coming at this time into the world was, 'not to judge the world, but to save it,' John xii. 47.—Selden, Uxor. Heb. b. iii. c. 11; Fugius in Deut. xxii. 22. and Calmet's Commentary.

^a After describing various punishments which were inflicted by the Jews upon offenders and criminals, Lewis, (in his Origines Hebraeae, vol. i. p. 85) says, "there was another punishment, called the rebels' beating, which was often fatal, and inflicted by the mob with their fists, or staves, or stones, without mercy, or the sentence of the judges. Whoever transgressed against a prohibition of the wise men, or of the scribes, that had its foundation in the law, was delivered over to the people to be used in this manner, and was called a son of rebellion. The frequent taking up of stones by the people to stone our Saviour, and the incursion upon him, St Stephen for blasphemy, as they would have it, and upon St Paul for defiling the temple as they supposed were of this nature."—Ed.

^b The power which our Saviour gave to the Seventy, when he sent them out to preach the gospel, was only that of healing the sick wherever they went, (Luke x. 9.) but finding that, upon naming their Master's name, they were able likewise to cure those that were possessed of devils, this they made the greater matter of their joy, and, at their return, told it with more pleasure, because it was no part of their commission. It is to be observed, however, that our Lord himself cast out devils by a divine power residing in himself; his disciples only, in virtue of his name, or by a power derived from him. Seeing then that this power accompanied them, in all parts of the world, it was necessary that Christ's presence should be with them every where, and such a presence was a certain proof of his being God.—Whitby's Annotations, and Hammond's Paraphrase.

^c These words seem to have a plain allusion to those of the psalmist, where, under the metaphor of 'treading on the scorpion and basilisk,' (Ps. xci. 13.) God promises the good man a more than common protection from all sorts of dangers and enemies. But there is no reason, however, I think, why our Saviour's words may not here be taken in a literal sense, since they agree so well with what he promises all true believers in another place, 'they shall take up serpents;' as we find one fastened upon of Satan, without the least harm: and, at the same time, gave them assurance of a blessing more peculiarly theirs, namely, that their ^d names were recorded in heaven; and so broke out into a rapture of joy, glorifying God for concealing the mysteries of the gospel from the great and wise, and revealing them to the simple and ignorant, and to his disciples more especially, who, in virtue of that revelation, enjoyed a happiness which many kings and prophets had in vain desired.

Our Lord had scarce ended his discourse, when a doctor of the law stood up, and inquired of him, what was necessary to be done for the attainment of that eternal life, ^e which he was so very liberal in promising to his followers. Whereupon our Lord remitted him to the law, which, according to the doctor's own account, consisted chiefly in the love of God and the love of our neighbour. But when he demanded farther what the notion of a neighbour ^f implied? our Saviour thought proper to answer this question, by telling him, "that, once upon a time, a certain Jew, as he was travelling in the road between ^g Jerusalem and Jericho, was robbed,

St Paul's hand without doing him any harm, (Acts xxviii. 3.) 'and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them,' Mark xvi. 18.—Whitby's Annotations; and Calmet's Commentary.

^d The words allude to a known custom in well-governed cities, where registers are kept of the names of their inhabitants, and do plainly denote the title which believers have to eternal happiness; but by no means an absolute election to it. For, as a citizen, when he misbehaves egregiously, and thereupon becomes infamous, has his name razed out of the city-register, and is himself disenfranchised of all his privileges; so we read of some, of whom Christ threatens 'to blot out their names out of the book of life,' (Rev. xxii. 19.) For, "as men are written in this book," says St Basil (in Is. iv. 3.) when they are converted from vice to virtue, so are they blotted out of it, when they backslide from virtue to vice." Of the twelve we read that one was certainly a reprobate; and though it becomes us to hope better of the Seventy; yet our Saviour's words give us no room to think that they were all predestinated to eternal life, since his meaning only is, that his disciples, instead of estimating their happiness from the power of working miracles, should rather make it consist in this, that he had called, chosen and separated them from great numbers that would perish; that he had given them the grace of faith and admission to the Christian covenant, but that on themselves it was incumbent, by the preservation of their faith, and the practice of good works comporting therewith, to make their calling and election sure.—Hammond and Whitby's Annotations, and Calmet's Commentary.

^e The law of Moses does no where expressly promise eternal life to those that observed its precepts. It is wholly taken up with temporal blessings and prosperities; and yet the generality of the Jews were not destitute of the hopes of another life, because their writers, a little before, and after the captivity, are very full of it, so that it became the prevailing opinion of the whole nation, and was received by their two principal sects, the Pharisees and Essenes: for, as for the Sadducees, who had other notions of the matter, their religion was very little, and their principles purely Epicurean.—Calmet's Commentary.

^f In our Saviour's time, the Pharisees had restrained the word neighbour, to signify those of their own nation, their own religion, and their own friends only; and all who differ from them in any of these respects, they indulged the people the liberty to hate; nor would they permit them to extend the least office of common civility to any such. But our Saviour overthrew these false maxims of the Jewish doctors, and reduced the precept of universal charity to its first intention, when, in this parable of the Jew and the Samaritan, he plainly demonstrated, that no difference of nation or religion, no quarrel or resentment, no enmity or alienation of affections, can exempt us from owing any person to be our neighbour.—Whitby's Annotations.

stripped, barbarously used, and left almost dead with his wounds; that by chance a priest^a came that way, and saw the poor wretch weltering in his blood; but the horror of the sight did not affect him; he passed along unconcerned; that next came a Levite; but he too was as void of tenderness and compassion as was the priest, though both of them were of the same country with the sufferer; that at last a Samaritan, a stranger, and one abhorred by the Jews, seeing this distressed person, with great compassion came to him, raised his head, recalled his fainting spirits, and closed his gaping wounds with the best medicines^b he had then, mounting him on his own horse, he gently conveyed him to the first inn, where, at his own cost, he entertained him, while he staid with him, and, at his departure, ^c promised the host to be at whatever expenses more should accrue.” From which plain narration, the Doctor himself^d could not but conclude, that the Samaritan was the neighbour to the person in distress, and consequently that the notion of a neighbour comprehended men of all nations and all religions whatever.

As soon as the feast of tabernacles was ended, our Lord departed from Jerusalem, and, in the beginning of his journey, went to a small village called Bethany, about two miles east of Jerusalem, where he was joyfully received by a woman named Martha, who, with her sister Mary, and her brother Lazarus, was highly in favour with him. While Martha was busy in making preparation for his entertainment, her sister Mary sat with the company listening to his instructions; and when Martha complained to him that her sister had left the whole burden of the business upon her, and thereupon desired him to send her to her assistance, our Lord commended Mary's choice, and though he did not slight Martha's civility, yet her sister's devoutness and attention to his doctrine,^e which was one thing chiefly necessary, he preferred before it.

Upon his return to Galilee, as he was one day praying with his disciples in a private place,^f they, taking it into consideration how necessary it was for them to be directed in the right performance of that duty, desired of him to compose a form of prayer for their use, as the Baptist had done for his disciples. Whereupon he not only gave them the same excellent form, called the Lord's prayer, which he had given them about eighteen months before, in his sermon on the mount, but encouraged them likewise, from the consideration of God's goodness and fatherly affection (far more indulgent to his children than any earthly parent's were to theirs) to be constant in their petitions to him, with fervour,^g importunity, and an indefatigable perseverance as the likeliest way to obtain a gracious answer to them.

Not long after this, upon our Lord's curing a demoniac that was dumb, the Pharisees renewed their old senseless cavil, of his ejecting devils by Beelzebub, which he confuted by the same arguments he had formerly used upon that account; and when they again demanded of him a sign from heaven, he again made them the same reply. Nay not only so, but when he was invited to dinner one day by a certain person of that sect, who was not a little offended at his sitting down to meat without washing his hands, he took occasion from thence to inveigh very severely against their ridi-robberies; for in it was a place called ‘the valley of Adommim,’ or ‘of bloody men,’ because of the great quantity of blood that was there spilt; and for this reason it is that our Lord lays the scene of his parable in this place.—Calnet's Commentary.—This road is described by Buckingham as being of the most wild and gloomy character, passing through a series of rocky defiles, and on the edges of cliffs and precipices. It is considered the most dangerous in Palestine, and Mr Wilson remarks, that a country more favourable for the attacks of banditti, and dens better adapted for concealment, can hardly be imagined. It is remarkable, that both Chateaubriand, and Sir Frederick Henniker met with serious adventures with the robbers of this region.—Ep.

^a To make the description more lively, our Saviour instances in two men, a priest and a Levite, who took no pity of this Jew in distress, though they were of the same religion and country; nay, though they were the ministers and teachers of the religion which he professed, and might therefore be presumed, even in virtue of their office and education, to have more extensive notions, and hearts more capable of tender impressions, than the ruder vulgar: and, for the same reason, he introduces a Samaritan acting a different part, and taking all imaginable care of this wounded Jew, though between Jews and Samaritans there was a most inveterate hatred.

^b The words in the text are, pouring in wine and oil; to ease and assuage the pain; and wine, to cleanse and heal the wound: and these things the good Samaritan had about him, because the inns in the eastern countries, even as it is still, afforded nothing, but barely house-room; and therefore the custom was, for the traveller to carry all kinds of necessaries, both for his bed and board, along with him.—Calnet's Commentary.

^c The words in the text are, ‘when he departed he took out twopenny,’ (Luke x. 35.) The δυνάριον, which we render a penny, was a kind of Roman coin, much about sevenpence halfpenny of our money. In the New Testament, for it never occurs in the Old, it is usually put for a piece of money in general, that is for a shekel, which was the most common coin among the Jews before they became subject to the Greeks and Romans; so that, in this sense, what the Samaritan gave the host amounted to five shillings, or thereabout, which is more consistent with the rest of his character than that he should leave so small a matter behind him.—Calnet's Commentary.

^d Had our Saviour propounded the parable in this manner, that a certain Samaritan fell among thieves, and that a priest and a Levite passed by without offering him any help, this doctor of the law might have replied, that he did nothing but right, because the Samaritan was no neighbour of theirs: but, now, as he makes a Jew the subject of the parable, and the object of the Samaritan's compassion, he draws him in to acknowledge the voice of nature, which declares that every man is neighbour to his fellow-creature, and that the law of Moses had not annulled, but perfected the law of nature, by commanding us to ‘love our neighbour as ourselves,’ (Lev. xix. 18.—Calnet's Commentary.)

^e Interpreters have given themselves some trouble in determining what that one thing is which our Saviour accounts needful. Some of the ancients are of opinion that our Lord, in this expression, told Martha that one dish was enough. But besides the lowness of the sense, the great company that attended our Lord, seventy disciples and twelve apostles, to be sure, if no more, shows the incongruousness of it. Others will have this one thing needful to be a life of meditation and contemplation, which Mary had all along addicted herself to; but her choosing to take advantage of our Saviour's company, to hear him for an hour or two rather, than prepare a supper for him, is not foundation enough for this conjecture; and therefore we cannot but think that the most general interpretation concerning the care of the soul with reference to eternity is the best.—Poole's Annotations.

^f These disciples must have been some of the seventy who were not present when our Lord delivered his sermon on the mount, wherein he first of all prescribed to his apostles this form of prayer.—Beausobre's Annotations.

^g The word ἠνδρεία properly signifies impudence, and might here be used in conformity to the saying of the Jews, “The impudent man overcomes the modest and the bashful, how much more God, who is goodness itself.”—Hilthy's Annotations.

culous superstition, in affecting outward neatness in their manner of living, while they neglected to cleanse their souls from internal pollutions. And so proceeding to reproach both them and the scribes, the teachers of the law, with their pride and prevarication, their hypocrisy and spirit of persecution, he so exasperated them, that they used all possible methods to ensnare him in his speech, and to find some accusation against him, whereby they might destroy him.

One of the company, however, seeing with what authority he reprov'd and determin'd among the people, desired of him ^a to arbitrate between him and his brother concerning an estate which had lately fallen to them. But this office he chose to decline, and thence took occasion to preach against covetousness, or placing our felicity in worldly possessions; and to enforce this, he propounded the parable of a certain rich man, who, when he had acquired estate enough, propos'd to indulge himself in voluptuousness, but was sadly disappointed by the intervention of a sudden death. He therefore exhorted his disciples not to be too anxious about the things of this life, but to cast their care upon God's providence, who, having promised them a kingdom in heaven, would not fail of supplying them with what was necessary here. He exhorted them to charity, to watchfulness, to preparation against the day of judgment, or the arrest of death, and, under the emblem of stewards or governors in great men's houses, recommended gentleness and temperance, and cautioned them against indulging themselves in any kind of excess upon the confidence of their Lord's absence or delay.

While he was thus discoursing to his disciples, news was brought him of ^b the massacre which Pilate had

^a The practice among the Jews of referring civil matters to ecclesiastical persons as judges, began in the captivity of Babylon, when, by this means, the Jews avoided the bringing their differences before heathen judges. Under the dominion of the Romans, they were indulg'd a greater liberty, and had civil courts made up of persons of their own religion. In cases of private difference between man and man, it was usual to make either the consistory of three, or some persons chosen by the contending parties, arbitrators. Whether both these brothers had agreed to refer their difference to our Lord's determination, or this one of them only desired him to interpose his authority, if not to enjoin, at least to persuade, his brother to come to an accommodation, it is difficult to say, because the scripture is silent. But this we may observe, that the ordinary rule of inheritance among the Jews was, for the eldest son to have a double portion of his father's estate, and the rest to be divided equally among the other children; but in what came by the mother, the eldest had no prerogative above the rest; the division among them was equal. Whatever then the controversy between these brothers was, our Saviour might very justly refuse to intermeddle in it; and that, not only because it was inconsistent with his design of coming into the world, which was to promote men's spiritual, rather than their temporal interests, but because it might probably have drawn upon him the envy and calumny of the Jewish rulers, who might be apt to say that he took upon him an office to which he had no call, in prejudice to them who were legally appointed to it.—Poole's and Whitby's Annotations, and Calmet's Commentary.

^b The general opinion is, that this piece of history relates to the sedition which Judas Gaulonites raised against the Roman government in Judea, when he and one Sadducus, a Pharisee, possessed the people with a notion, "that taxes were a badge of their slavery; that they ought to acknowledge no sovereign but God himself, nor pay any tribute but to his temple." It was in Galilee, very probably, where this Judas first broach'd these sentiments, and caused to be made of some Galileans, while they were offering their sacrifices at the altar; and the consequence which he drew from thence, as well as from another sad accident that had lately happened in Jerusalem, where the fall of the tower of Siloam ^c had destroyed no less than eighteen persons, was, not that these sufferers were greater sinners than their neighbours, but that their sufferings were intended to lead others to repentance, which, if they did not, in all probability they would meet with the like or worse judgments. ^d And then, to engage them all to a speedy repentance, he set forth the patience of the Almighty towards them, in the parable of a fig-tree, which the master of the vineyard ordered to be cut down, because for three years, ^e it had borne no fruit; but, upon the gardener's

there acquired such a multitude of followers and abettors as made Josephus call him Galileus, as well as Gaulonites. (Antiq. b. xviii. c. 2.) Nay all his followers in general, though they were of different provinces by birth, obtained the same name. But when they came to Jerusalem at one of the great festivals, and began to spread these seditious notions against Cæsar, Pilate, who was then the Roman governor, having had intelligence of it, caused a considerable number of them to be slain in the temple while they were sacrificing.—Whitby's and Beausobre's Annotations.

^c The fountain of Siloam rose at the foot of the wall of the east part of the city of Jerusalem. The tower called after its name was doubtless built upon the wall not far from it; and being now become ancient, might fall upon such a number of people, either passing by or standing under it. But how this accident came to pass we have no manner of certainty, because this passage in St Luke is the only place where we find any mention made of this piece of history.—Calmet's Commentary.

^d To verify this prediction of our Saviour's upon the impatient Jews, we may remember what Josephus has told us of them, namely, that under the government of Cumanus, twenty thousand of them were destroyed about the temple. (Antiq. b. xx. c. 4.) That, upon the admission of the Idumæans into the city, eight thousand and five hundred of the high priest's party were slain, inasmuch that there was a flood of blood quite round the temple. (Jewish War, b. iv. c. 7.) That, upon the threefold faction that happened in Jerusalem, before the siege of the Romans, "the temple was everywhere polluted with slaughter; the priests were slain in the exercise of their function; many who came to worship fell before their sacrifices; and the dead bodies of strangers and natives were promiscuously blended together, and sprinkled the altar with their blood;" (Jewish War, b. vi. c. 1.) and that, upon the Romans taking the city and temple, "mountains of dead bodies were piled up about the altar; streams of blood ran down the steps of the temple; several were destroyed by the fall of towers, and others choked in the sultry ruins of the galleries over the porches." (Jewish War, b. vii. c. 10.)

^e Some of the ancients are of opinion that by these three years we are to understand the three dispensations under which mankind have lived, namely, under the natural law, from the beginning of the world to the time of Moses; under the written law from Moses to Jesus Christ; and under the evangelical law, from Jesus Christ to the end of the world. Others rather mean by them the three kinds of government under which the Jews had lived, namely, the government of judges, from Joshua to Saul; the government of kings, from Saul to the Babylonish captivity; and the government of high priests, from the captivity to the time of Jesus Christ. But these explications are a little too arbitrary; nor will the three years of our Saviour's preaching among the Jews come up to the point, because the Jews were not destroyed the next year, as the barren fig-tree was to be cut down, but forty years after our Lord's ascension. All that is meant by the expression therefore is, that God gave them all the time and all the means that could be desired, to make them inexcusable; and the term of three years seems rather to be mentioned, because the fruit of some fig-trees comes not to maturity till the third year.—Calmet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

promising to use a more than ordinary care and diligence about it, he was prevailed on to let it stand one year longer, but with this determination, that if it still continued unfruitful, he would not then fail to cut it down.

Every sabbath-day our Lord's custom was to preach in one of the Jewish synagogues, and, while he was thus employed, he observed a woman, who, for the space of eighteen years, had laboured under a spirit of infirmity, ^a which bowed down her body so, that she was not able to lift herself up. Here was a proper object for his compassion and power to exert themselves; and therefore, calling the woman to him, he laid his hands upon her, and immediately she became straight, and glorified God. At this the ruler of the synagogue ^b became so very envious and displeased, that he told the people there were six days in the week allowed by God for labour, and that on those they might come for cure, but not on the sabbath, which was a day appointed for rest. But our Lord soon made him ashamed of his hypocrisy, ^c by an argument drawn from their own practice of loosing an ox or an ass from the stall on the sabbath-day, and leading them away to watering; and much more than might he be permitted to cure on that day a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan for so many years had afflicted with a sore disease. Whereupon his adversaries were silenced, but the people were all glad, and rejoiced at his glorious actions.

The feast of dedication ^d was now approaching,

^a It is very evident the Jews apprehended that all remarkable disorders of body proceeded from the operation of some malignant demons. Perhaps they might draw an argument from what is said of Satan's agency in the affliction of Job (chap. i. and ii.), and from Ps. xci. 6. (comp. Septuagint) and 1 Sam. xvi. 14. They also considered Satan as having the power of death. (Heb. ii. 14.) And that in some maladies this was indeed the case, is intimated by our Lord's reply here (ver. 16.), and by St Paul's words (1 Cor. v. 5.), where he speaks of delivering an offender to Satan for the destruction of the flesh. The topic is very judiciously handled by that illustrious writer Mr Howey (see his works, vol. ii. pp. 560, 561); and there are some curious and entertaining remarks in Wolfius on this text.—Doddridge's Expositor.—Ed.

^b In every synagogue there was a considerable number of doctors of the law, who in the gospel are frequently called rulers or governors, and over these there was usually one chief president. But the person here seems not to have been the chief president, but one of the subordinate rulers, because we find him, not addressing himself particularly to Christ, (which, not improbably, had he been the president, he would have taken courage to do,) but only to the people in general; though by them he obliquely struck at our Saviour.—Beausobre's Annotations, and Cabnet's Commentary.

^c Our Saviour declared this ruler of the synagogue to be an hypocrite, partly because he placed his holiness in the observation of the ritual precepts of the law, such as bodily rest on the sabbath-day, to the disparagement of the works of mercy, and other great matters of eternal obligation; and partly because he pretended to a great zeal for the performance of God's commands, when, all the while, he was rather actuated by a malevolent envy to the glory of Christ, which he, to whom his heart was open, perfectly knew.—Whitby's Annotations.

^d When Judas Maccabæus had cleansed the temple, which had been polluted by Antiochus Epiphanes, he again dedicated the altar; (1 Mac. iv. 59, and 2 Mac. x. 8.) and this is supposed to be the dedication, in memory of which the Jews continued to celebrate a feast, which fell out in the winter, in the month Chislen, between the 13th and 14th of our November; and being the same, in all probability, with what in the gospel is called τὰ ἡγιασμένα, was honoured and approved by our Saviour's presence, though but of human institution.—Whitby's when, after several removals, our Lord repaired again to Jerusalem, and, as he was walking in the streets on the sabbath-day, ^e saw a poor man that was blind from his very birth. Upon his calling the man to him, his disciples asked him, whether it was the ^f man's own or his parents' sin that had brought that calamity upon him? But his blindness, as he told them, was not sent for a punishment of any one's sin, but ^g for the greater manifestation of God's glory; and so, sitting upon the ground, he made some clay, and having anointed his eyes therewith, he ^h sent him to wash them in the pool of Siloam; which accordingly he did, and returned with Annotations, Hammond's Paraphrase, and Echar'd's Eecl. Hist., b. i. c. 5.

^e It has been observed before, that our Saviour made choice of the sabbath-day as a day wherein he did many of his mighty works. It was on this day that he cured the impotent man who lay at the pool of Bethesda (John v. 10.) on this day that he healed him who had the withered hand, (Mat. xii. 10.) and now on this day likewise that he gave sight to the man who was born blind, (John ix. 14.) and possibly he might choose this, because it was the day whereon he ordinarily preached that heavenly doctrine, which he confirmed by these miraculous works; or perhaps, that he might instruct the Jews, if they would have received instruction, in the right observation of the sabbath, and arm his disciples against that pernicious doctrine of the Pharisees, namely, that it was not lawful to do good, or perform works of mercy and compassion on that day.—Poole's and Whitby's Annotations.

^f What the disciples might mean by the sin of the blind man's parents, is no hard matter to solve, considering the strict prohibition in the law, (Lev. xx. 18.) of not coming near a menstruous woman, which was thought to have so ill an influence upon the child, as to make it obnoxious to leprosy, or mutilation, and might consequently be the cause of this person's blindness. But what we are to understand by his own sin, before he was born, is not so easy to be determined. That it cannot relate to the original sin which he brought into the world with him is evident, because all mankind, our Lord only excepted, are equally guilty of this; nor does this entail upon them any corporeal imperfection; and therefore the sin here intended must be something special and personal. Now, whoever considers that the opinion of the Platonists and Pythagoreans concerning the pre-existence of souls, their transmigration from one body to another, and being sent into bodies better or worse, according to their merit or demerit, had obtained among the Jews, and more especially among the Pharisees, need not much wonder to find our Lord's disciples infected with it, or, at least, desirous to know their master's sentiments about it. The author of the book of Wisdom, where speaking of himself, he tells us, 'that, being good, he came into a body undefiled,' that is, free from any notable infirmity, (chap. viii. 20.) gives countenance to this doctrine; and, in the writings of Philo, (on Giants, p. 285, and Dreams, p. 586.) and of Josephus, (Jewish War, b. ii. c. 12.) we have it confirmed to us. And therefore the disciples may well be supposed to inquire here, whether our Lord allowed of the prevailing notion, namely, that the soul of this man might be put into this imperfect body, for the punishment of what he had done, either in or out of the body, in a pre-existent state.—Whitby's and Hammond's Annotations, and Cabnet's Commentary.

^g It must not be thought that God did any ways actively concur to make this man blind, though, in his wisdom, he thought fit to leave this imperfection in the plastic matter whereof he was formed unrectified, that thereby he might show his miraculous power in giving sight to such an one for the confirmation of Christ's doctrine; thereby display his goodness, in illuminating both the soul and body of this man at once; and thereby give all others, who beheld this miraculous cure, a powerful motive to believe.—Whitby's Annotations.

^h We read of nothing medicinal in this water, only our Lord was pleased to send the blind man to wash his eyes here, as a probation of his faith and obedience, in the same manner as, of old, Naaman the Syrian was sent to wash in the river Jordan. (2 Kings v. 10.)—Poole's Annotations.

such perfect eyesight that his neighbours were amazed, and began to question whether he was the same man that used to sit begging, until he assured them that he was the very person; and, to satisfy them farther, not only told them who his physician was, but in what manner his cure was effected.

Various were the censures and opinions of men upon this occasion. The Pharisees, to diminish the credit of the miracle, said that Jesus could not be a prophet sent from God, ^a because he violated the sabbath; but others again replied, that no impostor could be permitted to work such miracles as had apparently the finger of God in them. Those who were averse to believe the miracle, or in hopes of making the thing look intricate, sent for the parents of the man that was cured, and asked them these three questions: Whether he was their son? Whether he was born blind? and Whether they knew how and by whom he was cured? To the two first questions they answered directly, that he was their son, and was born blind; but, as to the last, they referred them to him, who, as they told them, was of age to answer for himself; not daring to say any more for fear of the sanhedrim, who had made ^b an order to excommunicate

^a And yet they themselves acknowledge that a prophet might do and command things contrary to the rest required by the sabbath, which they also prove by the example of Joshua, who commanded that 'the ark should be carried round Jericho, the armed men going before and after it seven days,' one of which must be the sabbath (John vi.) How then could that which prophets, by the known principles of the Jews, were allowed to do, prove that Jesus was no prophet, especially if we consider that by these actions of mercy and goodness he did not indeed violate the rest of the sabbath, but only their corrupt traditions concerning it.—Whitby's Annotations.

^b Exclusion from sacred worship, or excommunication, was not only an ecclesiastical punishment, but also a civil one; because in this theocratic republic, there was no distinction between the divine and the civil right. The fancies of the rabbins relative to the origin of excommunication are endless. Some affirm that Adam excommunicated Cain and his whole race; others, that excommunication began with Miriam for having spoken ill of Moses; others, again, find it in the Song of Deborah and Barak, (Judg. v. 23. 'Curse ye Meroz,') interpreting Meroz as a person who had refused to assist Barak. But it is most probable that the earliest positive mention of this punishment occurs after the return from the Babylonish captivity, in Ezra x. 7, 8, or in the anathema of Nehemiah (xiii. 5.) against those who had married strange women. In later times, according to the rabbinical writers, there were three degrees of excommunication among the Jews. The first was called נָדוּ (נִדְּוִי), removal or separation from all intercourse with society; this, in the New Testament, is frequently termed casting out of the synagogue. (John ix. 22. xvi. 2. Luke vi. 22, &c.) This was in force for thirty days, and might be shortened by repentance. During its continuance, the excommunicated party was prohibited from bathing, from shaving his head, or approaching his wife or any other person nearer than four cubits: but if he submitted to this prohibition, he was not debarred the privilege of attending the sacred rites. If, however, the party continued in his obstinacy after that time, the excommunication was renewed with additional solemn maledictions. This second degree was called חֲרֵם (חֲרֵמָה), which signifies to anathematise or devote to death; it involved an exclusion from the sacred assemblies. The third, and last degree of excommunication was termed שֶׁמֶט (שֶׁמֶט־אֲתָהּ) מִן הַמִּצְוֹת (מִן הַמִּצְוֹת), that is, the Lord cometh, or may the Lord come; intimating that those against whom it was fulminated had nothing more to expect but the terrible day of judgment. The condition of those who were excommunicated was the most deplorable that can be imagined. They were perpetually excluded from all the rights and privileges of the Jewish people, were debarred from all social intercourse, and were excluded from the temple and the any person who should acknowledge Jesus to be Christ. Him therefore they began to examine; and to draw him from the good opinion he had conceived of his physician, bid him ascribe the glory of his cure wholly to God, and not to look upon Jesus with any veneration, who was a sinner and sabbath-breaker, and consequently could not come from God. To which the man boldly replied, "That it was very unaccountable that they should not perceive from whence the man was, whom God had endued with such a miraculous power of opening the eyes of one born blind, ^c a thing that was never heard of before since the world began; and that since it was a certain truth ^d that God heareth not sinners, if synagogues, on pain of severe corporal punishment. Whoever had incurred this sentence was loaded with imprecations, as appears from Deut. xxvii. where the expression curst is he, is so often repeated: whence to curse and to excommunicate were equivalent terms with the Jews. And therefore St Paul says, that 'no man speaking by the Spirit of God, calleth Jesus anathema or accursed' (1 Cor. xii. 3.) that is, curses him as the Jews did, who denied him to be the Messiah, and excommunicated the Christians. In the second degree, they delivered the excommunicated party over to Satan, devoting him by a solemn curse: to this practice St Paul is supposed to allude, 1 Cor. v. 5; and in this sense he expresses his desire even to be 'accursed for his brethren,' (Rom. ix. 3.), that is, to be excommunicated, laden with curses, and to suffer all the miseries consequent on the infliction of this punishment, if it could have been of any service to his brethren the Jews. In order to impress the minds of the people with the greater horror, it is said that when the offence was published in the synagogue, all the candles were lighted, and when the proclamation was finished, they were extinguished, as a sign that the excommunicated person was deprived of the light of heaven; further, his goods were confiscated, his sons were not admitted to circumcision; and if he died without repentance or absolution, by the sentence of the judge a stone was to be cast upon his coffin or bier, in order to show that he deserved to be stoned.—Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. pp. 149, 150.

^c They who lose their sight by a disease may be cured; but no man, not Moses or any of the prophets, ever did or ever could, without the assistance of a divine power, give sight to one born blind; for which reason the Jews reckon this among the signs of the Messiah, that he 'should open the eyes of the blind.'—Whitby's Annotations.—Rosenmuller, and Michaelis observe, that restoration of sight to those born blind has been recently effected by the famous surgeon Cheselden. But the former adds that therefore what Christ did in his time was a miracle. This, however, is not applicable to the true nature of a miracle. Restoring sight to the blind is, as it now appears, in certain cases possible, and therefore not miraculous, that is, not involving any thing contrary to the laws of nature. Yet this requires the most exquisite human skill and labour, and it would be equally a miracle to restore sight without these human means.—Bloomfield's Crit. Dissert.—Ed.

^d But doth not God hear sinners? Then whom can he hear, since no man liveth and committeth not sin against God? It is true indeed; but then the sinners which the poor man may be supposed here to mean are not those who become such through ignorance, weakness, or human infirmity, but such notorious and presumptuous sinners as go on in their impieties with a high hand, and an hardened heart, of whom the Spirit of God declares, 'when they spread forth their hands, I will hide myself from them, and when they make many prayers I will not hear.' (Is. i. 15.) The maxim however is here to be understood not in a general but restrained sense, namely, that God useth not to honour notorious and flagitious sinners, especially when they pretend to come with a message from him, by giving them a power to work miracles, in order to confirm the truth of what they say. For this is the force of the poor man's argument, that Christ could not be such a notorious sinner as he was represented to him, because it was inconsistent with the attributes of God, to honour such persons with his presence and assistance, in doing such works as none could do, without a divine power committed to them.—Pool's Annotations.

he were not sent, and empowered by God, he could never do such wonderful cures as these." This provoked them so highly that they first upbraided him with his former blindness, as a character of some extraordinary ill in him, and then cast him out of the synagogue with disgrace; but Jesus shortly after met him, and received him into his own church. He declared himself to him that he was the Messiah; and the poor man, believing on him, immediately fell down prostrate at his feet, and adored him.

After that our Lord had received the poor man's homage, he continued his discourse, and under the allegory of a shepherd and his sheep, proved the Pharisees to be no better than blind guides, nay than thieves and robbers, who had^b climbed up into the sheepfold, or made themselves rulers and governors in God's church without any proper commission from him. Upon the same ground he condemned all those false Christs^c who before him had usurped the title of the Messiah, asserted his own right to it by an argument that no other shepherd durst produce, namely, his laying down his life for his sheep,^d which were to consist of Gentiles^e as well as Jews, and all together make up one flock.

Before the conclusion of the feast, as he was walking in Solomon's porch, ^f several of the Jews came, and

^a That this allusion was very proper and pertinent with regard to the persons to whom our Saviour addressed his discourse, the condition and custom of that country may convince us. For the greatest part of the wealth and improvement there consisted in sheep; and the examples of Jacob and David in particular, are proofs that the keeping of these was not usually committed to servants and strangers, as it is among us, but to men of the greatest quality and substance. The children of the family, nay, the masters and owners themselves, made it their business, and esteemed the looking to their flocks, a care and employment in no case below them. Hence probably came the frequent metaphor of styling kings, the shepherds of their people. Hence the ancient prophets describe the Messiah in the character of a shepherd; and our blessed Saviour, to show that he was the person intended by the prophets, applies the same character to himself; thereby to represent his government of the church, and tender concern for mankind: 'he shall feed his flock like a shepherd: he shall gather the lambs with his arms, and carry them in his bosom; shall seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away; shall bind up that which was broken, and strengthen that which was sick, and gently lead those which were with young,' (Is. xl. 11. and Ez. xxxiv. 16.) all lively emblems of our Lord's pastoral care, and of the various methods which he hath employed to accommodate his dispensations to our wants, in order to promote our eternal salvation. And as the character of a shepherd did well become our gracious Saviour, so there is something in the very nature and disposition of sheep, which appears so innocent and inoffensive, so peaceable and gentle, so patient and submissive, so honest and undesigning, as carries a near resemblance to that plainness and probity, that modesty and humility, that quietness and submission, which are indeed the first elements of the Christian religion, as well as the qualifications requisite to the reception of it. It is to be observed, however, that as the shepherd's art in managing his sheep, in the eastern countries, was different from what is among us, to which purpose we read of his going before, leading, and calling his sheep, and of their following, and knowing his voice; whereas our shepherds go after and drive their sheep, so these several expressions do, in the moral, denote our Lord's receiving into the number of Christians all those humble and obedient souls that come to him in the spirit of meekness, not in the clothing, but in the real qualities, of his sheep, and making provision for their growth in grace and improvement in all virtue and godliness.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iii. and Hammond's Annotations.

^b According to the primary institution of God, it was the proper province of the sons of Levi 'to teach the children of Israel all the statutes which the Lord had spoken unto them by the hand of Moses,' (Lev. x. 11.) and therefore it was required that 'the priests' lips should preserve knowledge, and the people seek his law at their mouths,' (Mal. ii. 4. 7). But, however it came about, no sooner did their traditions grow in esteem, than the Scribes and Pharisees, not only took upon them to be the guides and teachers of the people, but maintained likewise, that others were to receive authority to teach from their commission and ordination to that office; though we no where find that they received any such authority from God; for which reason our Saviour represents them as a plantation which his Father had not planted, (Mat. xv. 13.) and bids his disciples beware of their doctrine, (Mat. xvi. 12.) because 'they taught for the doctrines of God, the commandments of men, and made void the commandments of God by their traditions,' (Mat. xv. 6. 9).—Whitby's Annotations.

^c In several of the Greek copies, as well as the Syriac, Persian, and Gothic, the words 'before me,' for our Saviour in the text speaks in his own person, are omitted; and some critics are of opinion, that this omission was early, because the Manichees, according to Theophylact, made no scruple to infer from hence, that the prophets of the Old Testament had not their mission from God. Our Saviour, however, in several places where he quotes them, has sufficiently established the authority of the prophets; and by this passage means no more than that all those who before him had taken upon them the title and quality of the Messiah, such as Theudas and Judas Galileus, whereof we find mention, Acts v. 36. 37; were thieves and robbers, because they usurped a character which they had no right to; and that all before him, who either had not their commission from God, or could not prove it by extraordinary miracles, such as the authors of the rabbinical traditions, and of all the other reigning sects among the Jews, were far from being the true shepherds of God's people.—Cabnet's Commentary.

^d His sheep are here supposed by some to be his elect peculiar friends; and thence they infer, that Christ laid down his life for them only. Now, if we respect the counsel of God, and the design of Jesus Christ, nothing is more certain than that he gave himself a ransom for all, (1 Tim. ii. 6.) and tasted death for every man, (1 Heb. ii. 9.) and was a propitiation for the sins of the whole world, (1 John ii. 2.) but then because the world can no otherwise lay hold on the benefits of this propitiation, than by believing, and being obedient to the voice of this shepherd, he therefore is said to do this more eminently for his sheep. The apostle, I think, has determined the whole controversy in a few words, 'he died for all, that they who live might not live unto themselves, but unto him who died for them,' (2 Cor. v. 15.) so that if any perish, it is not because he died not for them, but because they will not perform the conditions required to make his death efficacious to them; they will not live unto him who died for them.—Whitby's Annotations.

^e These our Saviour calls 'his other sheep,' (John x. 16.) by way of anticipation, because he foreknew that many of them, when once his gospel came to be tendered to them, would give it a ready reception, be converted and baptized: and because the ceremonial law, which was the partition wall between the Jews and Gentiles, was shortly to be broken down, and the Gentiles admitted to the same privileges with the Jews that believed in his name.—Whitby's Annotations.

^f The first or outer court, which encompassed the holy house and the other courts, was named the court of the Gentiles; because the latter were allowed to enter into it, but were prohibited from advancing further. It was surrounded by a range of porticoes or cloisters, above which were galleries, or apartments, supported by pillars of white marble, each consisting of a single piece, and twenty-five cubits in height. One of these was called Solomon's Porch, or piazza, because it stood on a vast terrace, which he had originally raised from a valley beneath, 400 cubits high, in order to enlarge the area on the top of the mountain, and make it equal to the plan of his intended building; and as this terrace was the only work of Solomon's that remained in the second temple, the piazza which stood upon it retained the name of that prince. Here it was that our Lord was walking at the feast of Dedication, (John x. 23;) and that the lame man, when healed by Peter and John, glorified God before all the people, (Acts iii. 11.) This superb portico is termed the royal required him to tell them, in positive terms, whether he was the Messiah or not. To which his answer was, that he had already sufficiently informed them of that, but to no effect; that the miracles which he wrought in his Father's name, were a full evidence of his mission; that the reason ^a why they believed him not was, because they were not of a disposition proper for his sheep; that to such as were his sheep, and followed him, he would give eternal life; and that none could pull them out of his, or his Father's hands, because he and his Father were one. ^b Upon this last expression, the Jews concluded portico by Josephus, who represents it as the noblest work beneath the sun, being elevated to such a prodigious height, that no one could look down from its flat roof to the valley below, without being seized with dizziness; the sight not reaching to such an immeasurable depth. The south-east corner of the roof of this portico, where the height was the greatest, is supposed to have been the πτερυγίον, pinnacle, or extreme angle, whence Satan tempted our Saviour to precipitate himself. (Mat. iv. 5; Luke iv. 9.) This also was the spot where it was predicted that the abomination of desolation, or the Roman ensigns, should stand. (Dan. ix. 27; Mat. xxiv. 15.) Solomon's portico was situated in the eastern front of the temple, opposite to the mount of Olives, where our Saviour is said to have sat when his disciples came to show him the grandeur of its various buildings, of which, grand as they were, he said, the time was approaching when one stone should not be left upon another.—Mansford's Scripture Gazetteer.—Ed.

^a Some are of opinion, that the words in the text ὁὐ γὰρ, which we render because, are not rational, or do not render a reason for these people's infidelity, but only intimate that their infidelity was consequential to their not being his sheep; or in other words, that they could not believe because they were not elected. But to obviate this we must observe, that the reason which our Lord here assigns for this defect of faith, is doubtless such as made it a great crime in them; for sure that must be such for which they were to die in their sins, John viii. 24. It is therefore certain, that this unbelief cannot be resolved into any natural defect of knowledge on their part, nor any act of reprobation on God's part, but purely to the want of a teachable and well disposed mind. For were it the same thing to be one of Christ's sheep and to be predestinated to faith and salvation, the import of our Saviour's words must be this,—‘Ye therefore believe not, because ye are not of the number of the elect, but of those whom God hath from eternity rejected.’ Now, by this account of the matter, our Saviour would not have accused but excused the infidelity of the Jews; and they, with as good reason, might have replied to him,—‘We therefore believe not, because God, by his act of reprobation, hath shut the door of faith against us, and so our infidelity is not to be imputed to us, but God.’—Hilby's Annotations.

^b That is, one in essence and nature; one in authority and power; and not barely one in will and consent: and that this is the genuine signification of the words, appears, 1st, From the original text, where it is not said, I and my Father are one, ἓς, person, in the masculine gender, but ἓς, one thing, in the neuter. Now, if thing be not the Divine Being, they cannot be one; for since the Father is confessed to be God, the Son cannot be one thing with the Father, if he be not God too. 2dly, It appears from the context, where our Saviour, having, in the preceding verses, ascribed the preservation of his sheep to the power of his Father, ‘None is able to pluck them out of my Father's hands,’ (John x. 29) ascribes the same also to his own power, ‘Neither shall any pluck them out of my hand,’ (ver. 28.) plainly intimating, that his sheep were equally safe in his own hand, as in his Father's; because, says he, ‘I and my Father are one,’ (ver. 30.) And, 3dly, It appears from the verses which immediately follow; for when the Jews took up stones to stone him, as guilty of blasphemy, because he made himself God, he does not evade the charge, by saying, that he only conspired with the will of God, as all true prophets did; but appealed to the works which he performed by the power of the Father residing in him, which plainly carries it to an unity of power, not of will only; and then St Chrysostom's inference is undeniable, that ‘if the power be the same, the essence also is the same.’—Hilby's Annotations.

him to be a blasphemer, and were going to stone him; and though he reminded them of the many good actions he had done for them in his Father's name, and endeavoured to apologize ^c for his calling himself the Son of God, even because in scripture we find judges and magistrates frequently so styled, and much more than might he, who was consecrated and sent by God, assume that title, yet all this would not appease their rage, so that he was forced to leave the city, and went thence over Jordan to Bethabara, where John had formerly baptized; where great multitudes resorted to him, both to hear his instructions, and to be healed of their diseases; and where he made many disciples, because the place put the people in mind, that whatever John had reported of him was true.

While he continued in these parts, a certain person put a curious question to him, ^d concerning the number of those that should be saved; whereupon he took occasion to admonish his hearers, ‘That they ought to use their utmost endeavours to enter in at the strait gate ^e of ^c This is an improper expression, the word apologize, according to its ordinary acceptation conveys an idea of some degree of blame, and when a person is said to apologize, we generally understand that he admits himself to have been in some respect blamable, but at the same time, advances some circumstances to excuse or palliate his conduct. In the present case our Saviour vindicated his claim to the title of Son of God. His answer to the charge brought against him, ‘Is it not written in your law, I said, ye are gods? If he called them gods unto whom the word of God came, and the scriptures cannot be broken,’ that is, if the language of Scripture be unexceptionable, ‘say ye of him whom the Father hath sanctified and sent into the world, thou blasphemest, because I said I am the Son of God?’ These words are quoted, in support of their opinion, by those who hold that our Saviour is called the Son of God purely upon account of the commission which he received. But the force of the argument, and the consistency of the discourse, require us to affix a much higher meaning to that expression. Our Lord is reasoning a fortiori. He vindicates himself from the charge of blasphemy in calling himself the Son of God, because even those who hold civil offices upon earth are called in scripture gods. But that he might not appear to put himself upon a level with them, and to retract his former assertion, ‘I and the Father are one,’ he not only calls himself ‘him whom the Father hath sanctified and sent into the world,’ which implies that he had a being, and that God was his Father before he was sent; but he subjoins, ‘If I do not the works of my Father believe me not. But if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works, that ye may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in him.’ expressions which appear to be equivalent to his former assertion, ‘I and the Father are one,’ and which were certainly understood by the Jews in that sense; for, as soon as he had uttered them, ‘they sought again to take him.’ The full argument of our Lord is, that the union between the Father and him gives him a much better title to the name of the Son of God than any office can give to men the name of gods; and thus at the very time that he shelters himself from the charge of blasphemy under this scripture expression, he intimates repeatedly, in the hearing of those who accused him of blasphemy for what he said, the superior dignity of his person.—Hill's Lectures on Divinity, vol. i. p. 457.—Ed.

^d The man, who proposed this question to our Saviour, had doubtless in his thoughts the common opinion of the Jews, that all the Israelites, how much soever they may suffer in this, might have their portion in the world to come; but this was a question of too much needless curiosity for our Saviour to answer, because it is no part of our concern, how many shall be saved? But only how, and by what means, we are to work out our own salvation; and therefore he took occasion from hence to instruct the man, and in him all others, in what might be of much more substantial benefit to him.—Hilby's Annotations.

salvation, because the number of those, who should not attain it, would be large; that they ought to do it with all expedition, because, when once the gate was shut, and the means of salvation withdrawn, all pretences of having heard the glad tidings of the gospel, and of having been conversant with him upon earth, would gain them no admittance; that all workers of iniquity should be utterly excluded; and therefore the Jews, in particular, would have cause to lament, when they should see many heathens, from all parts of the earth, possessed of the glories of heaven, with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the ancient prophets, while themselves, who were the heirs of the kingdom, should be thrust out, and so made the last, who were once the first.”

As he was discoursing in this manner, some of the Pharisees, who could no longer bear with patience the power and authority which he had gained among the people, in hopes of getting rid of him, ^a came and suggested the persons sent, and the greater the distance to which they go, so much greater is the honour. So it is proclaimed; ‘Go forth and behold king Solomon, with the crown wherewith his mother crowned him. The bridegroom cometh, go ye forth to meet him.’ The names of the persons to be invited, were inscribed upon tablets, and the gate was set open to receive those who had obtained them; but to prevent any getting in that had no ticket, only one leaf of the door was left open; and that was strictly guarded by the servants of the family. Those who were admitted, had to go along a narrow passage to the room; and after all who had received tickets of admission were assembled, the master of the house rose and shut to the door; and then the entertainment began.—Morier’s Trav. vol. i. p. 142; Potter’s Grecian Antiq. vol. ii. p. 365. et seq. The Greeks also issued tickets of admission to their entertainments, although relations often went without invitation; thus in Homer, the valiant Menelaus went to an entertainment in Agamemnon’s tent, without being invited:

It appears from this statement, that the Jews were much stricter in admitting persons to their tables than the Greeks, although both used the formality of written invitations. Our Lord evidently refers to the custom of his own nation, in his answer to one who idly inquired, ‘Are there few that be saved?’ ‘Strive,’ said he, ‘to enter in at the strait gate; for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able. When once the master of the house is risen up, and hath shut to the door, and ye begin to stand without, and to knock at the door, saying, Lord, Lord, open unto us: and he shall answer and say unto you, I know you not whence ye are.’ (Luke xiii. 24.)—Paxton’s Illustrations of Scripture, vol. iii. pp. 88, 89.—Ed.

^a But, whether they came upon their own account, or by the instigation of Herod, is the question:—If they came upon their own account, it is certain, that they came not out of any kindness to our Saviour; because the whole history of the gospel informs us, that they were far from having any affection for him; and therefore they must come with a design, either to scare him out of Galilee, where he had been too popular for them, or to drive him into a trap which they had laid for him in Judea. This seems to be a genuine interpretation enough of the sense of the evangelist; and therefore, in our history, we have followed it; but still it seems not improbable, that, considering the present circumstances Herod was under, he might send these messengers to our Saviour. He had but lately gained himself no good reputation among the Jews, by murdering John, whom all the world looked upon as a prophet: and therefore seeing that our Saviour excelled John, especially in the fame and renown of his miracles, he was unwilling to augment the odium which already lay upon him, by any fresh acts of violence to a person, that was reputed a prophet, much superior to the Baptist, whom he had slain; he had got a notion too, that the Baptist, at least the soul of the Baptist in another body, was risen from the dead, and what the effect of his ghost’s haunting his dominions might be, he could not tell; and therefore he might think it convenient to put these Pharisees gested the danger he was in from Herod Antipas, so long as he continued in Galilee, which was part of his dominions: but, far from betraying any fear upon such information, he let the Pharisees know, that, having but a few days longer to live, ^b he was determined to devote them to the relief of the distressed, the curing diseases, and casting out devils; and as to Herod’s ^c subtily, and desigus against his life, they were altogether superfluous, because he foreknew that he was to suffer death at Jerusalem, ^d which was the place appointed, as it were, for the slaughter of all the prophets; and hereupon he broke out into a most pathetic exclamation against the inhabitants of that unhappy city, reproaching them with their rejecting the kind offers of the gospel, and with their killing the messengers sent from God, and upon some expedient to get our Saviour, whom possibly he might take for John revivified, removed farther from him. However this be, it is certain, that either he or the Pharisees, or both, had a mind to have him gone somewhere else, and that, for this purpose, the message was brought him.—Poole’s Annotations.

^b Some apply this passage (Luke xiii. 32,) to the years of Christ’s ministry, supposing that a day is put for a year. But the explication is improper; because if the three days here mentioned were intended to comprehend the whole years of our Lord’s ministry, this conversation must have happened in the first year thereof; contrary to Luke himself, who tells us, (chap. ix. 51,) that the time was come when he should be received up. Besides, according to this interpretation, Christ’s being perfected on the third day will imply, that he was to suffer in the third year of his ministry, which is far from being a certain point. Were we to conclude any thing concerning the length of our Lord’s ministry from the days mentioned, it would be, that he did not suffer till the third year after this conversation. But the real meaning of the words seems to be as follows:—“I shall not be very long with you on earth; yet while I am here, I will perform the duties of my ministry, without being afraid of any man; because my life cannot be taken from me, but in the place, and at the time, appointed by God.”—Macknight’s Harmony, vol. ii. s. 91, note *.—Ed.

^c Our Lord, speaking of Herod, who had threatened to kill him, applies to him metaphorically the name or character of the fox or jackal: “Go, tell that fox—that crafty, cruel, insidious, devouring creature—that jackal of a prince—who has indeed expressed his enmity by his threats, as jackals indicate their mischievous dispositions by their barking, and who yelps in concert with other of my enemies, jackal-like—go, tell him that I am safe from his fury to-day and to-morrow; and on the third day I shall be completed,—completely beyond his power:”—alluding, perhaps, to his resurrection on the third day. There have been some doubts as to the propriety of our Redeemer’s speaking in such terms of a civil ruler, whose subject he was, and whose character he was therefore bound to respect and to honour. For these scruples, however, there is no ground; the character of Herod as a cruel, insidious, and crafty prince, was too notorious to be disguised among any part of his subjects; and he who knew his heart as well as witnessed his conduct, could speak with certainty as to his dispositions and motives. Besides this, such metaphorical applications as these are much more common in the East than here, and would, therefore, not appear so strong to our Lord’s attendants as to us. This is shown by a passage in Busbequius: (p. 58.) “They [jackals, or ciacals, as the Asiatics call them] go in flocks, and seldom hurt man or beast; but get their food by craft and stealth, more than by open force. Thence it is that the Turks call subtle and crafty persons, especially the Asiatics, by the metaphorical name of Ciacals.”—Calmet’s Dictionary.—Ed.

^d Some are of opinion, that, because the Jews had referred to the sanhedrim, which sat at Jerusalem, the whole cognisance and trial of prophets, therefore a prophet was not to suffer out of that city; but this interpretation seems to enervate our Saviour’s sentiment, whose design certainly was, to represent the city of Jerusalem, so accustomed to shed the blood of the prophets, that there was scarce a possibility for any prophets dying out of it.—Calmet’s Commentary.

^a One sabbath day, when Jesus was invited by a Pharisee of some distinction, to dine with him, a man dis-tempered with the dropsy came after him; and, when several of the company narrowly observed how he would behave upon this occasion, ^b he first cured the poor man, and then justified his doing so, by the same argument he made use of to those who reproached him for curing the crooked woman on the sabbath day. Observing, however, how eager the guests were to take every one the uppermost places at the table, he endeavoured to convince them, how commendable it was for a man to seat himself in a place below, rather than above, his rank and condition, because daily experience showed us, that humility was a virtue, which was so far from debasing, that it raised and exalted the person who practised it. And then, turning his discourse to the master of the house, whom he found too regardless of the poor and needy, he gave him, and in him all others, the good advice ^c of inviting the poor, the blind, and the lame, who could make no requital, rather than his own friends, ^d or rich acquaintance, who were able to return the compliment, to his entertainments, and in so doing, he might depend upon a recompence from God in the kingdom of heaven.

^a The sabbath was to be devoted to cheerful rest, that not only the Israelites, but also strangers living with them, as well as their cattle, might be refreshed. (Exod. xxiii. 12.) Hence, it is not probable, that they celebrated sacrificial or offering feasts, to which, from the commencement of their polity, the poor were invited. In later times, at least, we know from history, that the Jews purchased and prepared the best viands they could procure for the sabbath-day, in order to do it honour; and that they actually had sabbath-feasts, to which they even invited persons with whom they were unacquainted.—Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 303—4. We cannot suppose that there was any thing improper in their sabbath-feasts, otherwise our Saviour would not have countenanced them.—Ep.

^b The presence of the dropsical man, and its being the sabbath day, would involve our Saviour, as they thought, in this difficulty; that either by forbearing to heal at that time, he would betray his fear, and strengthen their superstitions with regard to such ritual observances; or else, that, by doing it, he must incur the censure and odium of a sabbath-breaker, and a contemner of the law: but he, who was well aware what spies he had upon him, so ordered the matter, as to accomplish what he saw fit, without any opportunity given for his enemies to compass their ends by it.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iii.

^c Whether this precept is to be understood in a literal sense or no, may in some measure admit of a debate. Our Saviour, when he acted the part of a rich man, in feeding the multitude, had people of the meanest rank, and, among these, the poor, the maimed, the lame, and the blind, who daily resorted to him for cure, for the chief of his guests: but most men think, that these extraordinary actions of his were no proper patterns for us in the dispensation of our charity, but that we answer the intent of the precept as well, if we do what is equivalent to us in respect of charge, and more advantageous to them and their families, by sending them meat, or money, to refresh them at home.—Whitby's Annotations.

^d The words in the text are, 'when thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, neither thy kinsmen nor thy rich neighbours,' (Luke xiv. 12.) It is to be observed in our expounding of scripture, that, as comparative particles are sometimes used in a sense negative, so we find the chief priests moving the people, ὡς μᾶλλον Βαραββάν αὐτοῖς, 'that he should rather release Barabbas to them,' that is, that he should release Barabbas, and not Jesus; so negative particles are often used in a sense comparative; as when we read in Prov.

At the hearing of these last words one in the company repeated that common saying among the rabbins, 'blessed is he that shall eat bread ^e in the kingdom of God;' whereupon our Lord took occasion to represent the different success of the gospel, the rejection of the Jews, and the call of the Gentiles, under the emblem of a feast, to which those that were invited, upon sundry pretences, refused to come, ^f so that the master of the viii. 10, 'receive my instructions, and not silver;' and in Joel ii., 'rend your hearts, and not your garments,' the meaning is rather than silver, or your garments; in like manner as here, 'call not thy friends, nor thy brethren,' that is, be not so much concerned to call them, as the poor. For it can hardly be thought, that our Saviour's intent in this precept was absolutely to forbid all invitations of our neighbours or friends to dine or sup with us. This is an act of kindness and civility, and of good tendency sometimes to maintain and promote amity and friendship among neighbours and acquaintance; but his only meaning is, that we should not invite them out of a prospect of a compensation from them again, which is making a kind of traffic with our generosity; but, instead of this, that we should expend our money in the exercise of charity to such as are in no condition to make us a retribution.—Whitby's and Poole's Annotations.

^e Dr Campbell translates 'in the reign of God,' and observes the English Testament makes, to appearance, the word βασιλεια, reign, here refer solely to the future state of the saints in heaven. This version makes it relate to those who should be upon the earth in the reign of the Messiah. My reasons for preferring the latter are these: 1st, This way of speaking of the happiness of the Messiah's administration suits entirely the hopes and wishes which seem to have been long entertained by the nation concerning it. (See chap. x. 23, 24. Mat. xiii. 10, 11.) 2dly, The parable which, in answer to the remark, was spoken by our Lord, is, on all hands, understood to represent the Christian dispensation. 3dly, The obvious intention of that parable is to insinuate that, in consequence of the prejudices which, from notions of secular felicity and grandeur, the nation in general entertained on that subject; what, in prospect, they fancied so blessed a period, would, when present, be exceedingly neglected and despised; and in this view nothing could be more apposite; whereas there appears no appositeness in the parable on the other interpretation.—Campbell on the Gospels, vol. ii. pp. 570, 571.

^f If we compare this with another passage elsewhere, (Mat. xxii. 2.) we may be farther satisfied, that by 'the kingdom of heaven' is here represented the 'gospel dispensation;' and this, as it ministers true plenty and pleasure, all that men can want, and all that they can wish, to render them perfectly happy, is compared to a supper. The bounty and infinite love of Almighty God are signified by the greatness of that supper, and the multitudes bidden to it. The first bidding implies all the previous notices of the Messiah, by which the law and the prophets were intended to prepare the Jews for the reception of him and his doctrine. The second bidding, when all things were ready, seems to import all that Jesus did, and taught, and suffered for their conversion and salvation, and all the testimonies and exhortations of his apostles and other preachers of the gospel, to the same purpose. The excuses sent for their absence are the prejudices and passions and worldly interest which did not only hinder those Jews from coming into the faith, but disposed them likewise to treat all attempts to win them over with the utmost obstinacy and contempt. The guests brought in from abroad to supply their places, are the Gentile world, to whom, after that the Jews had thrust it from them, the subsequent tenders of this grace and salvation were made. And the declaring that 'none of those who were bidden should taste of this supper,' denotes the giving those Jews over to a reprobate sense, and leaving them under that infidelity and perverseness in which they continue hardened to this very day.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iii.

^g The hospitality of the present day in the east exactly resembles that of the remotest antiquity. The parable of the 'great supper,' is in those countries literally realized. (Luke xiv. 16.)—Forbes's Orient. Mem. vol. iii. p. 187.—And such was the hospitality of ancient Greece and Rome. When a person provided an entertainment for his friends or neighbours, house was obliged to send out into the streets and lanes of the city, and into the highways and hedges to collect a sufficient complement of guests, being determined that none of those who were first invited should taste of his supper. ^a he sent round a number of servants to invite the guests; these were called vocatores by the Romans, and καλητωσις by the Greeks. The day when the entertainment is to be given is fixed some considerable time before; and in the evening of the day appointed, a messenger comes to bid the guests to the feast. The custom is thus introduced in Luke: 'A certain man made a great supper, and bade many; and sent his servant at supper time, to say to them that were bidden, Come, for all things are now ready.' (Luke xiv. 16, 17.)—Morier's Trav. vol. i. p. 142.—They were not now asked for the first time; but had already accepted the invitation, when the day was appointed, and were therefore already pledged to attend at the hour when they might be summoned. They were not taken unprepared, and could not in consistency and decency plead any prior engagement. They could not now refuse, without violating their word and insulting the master of the feast, and therefore, justly subjected themselves to punishment. The terms of the parable exactly accord with established custom, and contain nothing of the harshness to which infidels object.—Paxton's Illustrations.—Ed.

^a The following extracts will serve to explain the customs alluded to in this parable. In the account of the parable by the evangelist Matthew (chap. xxii. 11.) it is said, 'And when the king came in to see the guests, he saw there a man who had not on a marriage garment.' The Persians, 'in circumstances of grief or joy, visit each other with great attention, which is a tribute of duty always expected from persons of inferior condition, especially if they be dependent. The guests are ushered into a large room, and served with coffee and tobacco. After some time the master of the house enters, and his visitors, rising to receive him, continue standing till he has passed through the whole company, and paid his respects to each; he then takes his seat, and by signs permits them to be also seated.'—Goldsmith's Geography, p. 216.—In the parable now referred to, the circumstances of which may reasonably be supposed conformable to existing customs, it is evidently implied that the guests were collected together previous to the appearance of the king, who came in to see the guests. So also in Luke xiv. 10, in a similar parable, it is said, 'when thou art bidden, go and sit down in the lowest room, that when he that had thee cometh, he may say unto thee, go up higher.' This unquestionably confirms the application of the Persian ceremony to the parable first cited. It may first be farther observed, that in the last mentioned passage, it seems as if it had then been the prevailing practice for the master of the house 'to pass through the guests, and pay his respects to each of them,' as was certainly the case in Persia. With respect to the wedding garment, it was usual for persons to appear at marriage feasts in a sumptuous dress, generally adorned with florid embroidery, as some writers tell us (see Rev. xix. 8., and Dr Hammond in locum); but as it could not be expected that travellers thus pressed in should themselves be provided with it, we must therefore conclude, not only from the magnificence of the preparations to which we must suppose the wardrobe of the prince corresponded, but likewise from the following circumstance of resentment against this guest, that a robe was offered, but refused by him: and this is a circumstance which, as Calvin observes, is admirably suited to the method of God's dealing with us, who indeed requires holiness in order to our receiving the benefits of the gospel, but is graciously pleased to work it in us by his Holy Spirit, and therefore may justly resent and punish our neglect of so great a favour.—Doddridge in locum.—The following extract will show the importance of having a suitable garment for a marriage feast, and the offence taken against those who refuse it, when presented as a gift. 'The next day, Dec. 3, the king sent to invite the ambassadors to dine with him once more. The meliemandar told them, it was the custom that they should wear over their own clothes the best of those garments which the king had sent them. The ambassadors at first made some scruple of that compliance: but when they were told that it was a custom observed by all ambassadors, and that no doubt the king would take it very ill at their hands if they presented

As he was going from the Pharisee's house where he dined, being attended with a mighty concourse of people, he began to explain ^b to them what they were to trust to, if they intended to become his disciples; that they were to ^c renounce even some of their most lawful affections, and prepare themselves to undergo the most unjust persecutions, if they thought of making profession of his religion; and therefore, that they might not fail in the day of trial, he advised them to consider well beforehand what such a profession would cost them: 'for, as he who begins to build, and has not money to accomplish it, leaves his work imperfect, and himself becomes ridiculous; or as he that designs a war, and has not men and money enough to go through with it, had better never have engaged in it; so he that undertakes to be a Christian, must resolve to renounce all that is precious, and to bear all that is afflictive to him in this world, or else he will never be able to hold out.'

Among the great multitudes that daily resorted to our Saviour to hear his discourses, were many publicans and sinners. ^d This gave great offence to the Scribes and Pharisees, ^e who murmured at his condescending goodness in so freely conversing and eating with such infamous people. But to vindicate himself in this respect, he compared his conduct to that of a man, who, having an hundred sheep, left the ninety and nine ^f in quest of themselves before him without the marks of his liberality, they at last resolved to do it, and, after their example, all the rest of the retinue.'—Ambassador's Travels, p. 183; see Altmann's Meletemata, Phil. Crit. t. i. p. 118.; and Dr Clarke's Travels, vol. ii. p. 352, note.—Ed.

^b It was a custom of the Jewish doctors to lay down before their proselytes what inconveniences would attend upon their precepts; and in conformity to this, our Saviour acquaints his disciples with two things that would be a means to deter them from embracing his religion, namely, the difficulty of the duties that would be required of them, and the greatness of the sufferings to which they would be exposed.

^c The words in the text are 'If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple.' (Luke xiv. 26.) But their meaning in this place is not, that a man should, properly speaking, hate his father and his mother; for certainly our blessed Lord, who enjoins us to love our enemies, would never make it our duty to hate our parents. And therefore the word μισω, which is a Hebraism, must necessarily here be taken in a lower sense, namely, to love or esteem less, in the same manner as it is said of Leah, that 'Jacob hated her,' (Gen. xxix. 31.) that is, did not love her so well as he did Rachel. For that this, and no more is here the import of the expression, is plain from a parallel text, 'He that loveth father and mother more than me is not worthy of me.' (Mat. x. 37.)—Whitby's Annotations.

^d They whom the scripture generally, and this portion of it in particular, characterizes by the name of sinners, are the habitual and obdurate, the great and eminent offenders.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iii.

^e The Scribes and Pharisees looked upon the publicans as unfit to be conversed with upon any account, even though it was to reclaim them from their evil courses. Our Saviour had told them that he conversed with such people as their physician, and not as their companion, and that therefore his proper business was among such patients. (Mat. ix. 12, 13.) But this apology would not silence their murmurings, because their opinion was, that God had cast off all care of them, and never intended to grant them repentance unto life.—Burkit and Whitby's Annotations.

^f Here Christ sets ninety and nine just persons in opposition to one sinner, not that it is so in proportion: for there are very few who live according to the rule that is prescribed them; but because, even upon a supposition that it were so, such is the one a which was gone astray; to that of a woman searching, with all diligence, for a piece of silver b that was lost, and rejoicing exceedingly when she found it; and to that of a father, c receiving his returning prodigal son with all the indications of joy and tenderness, notwithstanding the remonstrances of his elder brother. For under the name of the elder brother, he reproved the unjust murmurings of the Pharisees, who were displeased at his entertaining sinners, though the salvation of such was the main end of his coming into the world. d

Having thus exposed the pride and envy of the Pharisees, he proceeded, in the next place, to prove their covetousness, and, at the same time, to instruct his disciples what the proper use was that they were to make of their riches. To this purpose he introduces an value of our immortal souls, that great care and pains ought to be taken even for the sake of one.—Grotius in locum.

a A sheep, when once it has strayed away, is a creature remarkably stupid and heedless. It goes wandering on, without either power or inclination to return back, though each moment it is in danger of becoming a sacrifice to every beast of prey that meets it. And such, in truth, is the condition of people addicted to vice, when they have broken out of God's fold, and forsaken the pleasant pastures which he provides for them. They grow careless and inconsiderate, and are exposed to snares and temptations every moment. They are hardened by custom; are depraved in their affections and judgment; are neither disposed to grow wiser, nor of themselves capable of conquering inveterate habits of vice, though they should now and then show some good inclination to attempt it.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iii.

b By this comparison of a lost piece of money, we are given to understand, that God esteems the souls of men precious, and reckons them among his wealth and his treasures. And this indeed they are; made and formed by his own hand; impressed with his own image and superscription; and from that stamp, which carries a resemblance to the great King of the whole world, deriving all their currency and value. But when they abandon God's laws, and forsake the divine and rational life, a life of goodness and wisdom, renounced for one of sensuality, and madness, and mischief, then they are lost; lost to themselves; lost to God. Then this coin is debased; the impression obliterated and gone; and that piece of money, as to the worth and use of it, is in a manner as if it were no longer in being.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iii.

c This parable is deservedly reckoned a masterpiece in its kind, and what cannot be paralleled by any of the apologues or allegorical writings of heathen authors. It is adorned and beautified with the most glowing colours and lively similitudes. It is carried on and conducted with admirable wisdom and proportion, in the parts as well as in the whole; and there is so exact a relation between the things represented, and the representations of them, that the most elevated understanding will admire, and the lowest capacity discover, the excellent and most useful moral that lies under so thin and fine a veil.

d Many commentators have considered this parable in a view of peculiar application to the Jews and Gentiles; and have observed that the murmurs of the Jews against the apostles for preaching the gospel to the Gentiles (see Acts xiii. 42—50. xxii. 21, 22, and 1 Thes. ii. 16.) are represented by the conduct of the elder brother.—This was certainly a case comprehended in our Lord's design; but he undoubtedly had something more in his intention. He meant to show that, had the Pharisees been as eminently good as they themselves pretended to be, yet it had been very unworthy their character to take offence at the kind treatment which any sincere penitent might receive. Thus does he here, and in many parallel texts, condemn their conduct on their own principles; though elsewhere, on proper occasions, he shows the falsehood of those principles, and plainly exposes their hypocrisy and guilt. Thus the judicious Calvin states the matter; and it is strange so many learned writers should have puzzled themselves and their readers in so clear a case.—Doddridge's Expositor.—ED.

unjust steward, e who, after having abused his trust, and wasted his master's substance, is contriving what provision to make for himself, which he does by abating his master's debtors in their bills, when he came to be removed from his place; and thereupon he teaches his disciples, not to imitate the injustice, but the forecast and policy of this steward, by employing their earthly riches to make them friends in the persons of the poor, that when they should come to leave this transitory world, they might, by this means, be received into everlasting habitations in heaven; and so the children of light become as prudent in things relating to their salvation, as the children of this world are in the management of their temporal affairs.

This discourse made little or no impression upon the Pharisees; and therefore, to awaken their attention, he propounded to them the parable of a certain rich man, h e There is a good deal in this and the following parable, that alludes to the notions of the Jewish rabbins, and their manner of expressing them. "The fruits of the earth," says one of their doctors, "are like a table spread in an house; the owner of this is God; man in this world is, as it were, the steward of this house: if he behaves himself well, he will find favour in the eyes of his lord; if otherwise, he will be removed from his stewardship;" Kimchi on Isa. xl. And so the scope of this following parable seems to be this:—that we are to look upon ourselves, not as lords of the good things of this life, as though we might use them at our pleasure, but only as stewards, who must be faithful in the administration of them. The parables indeed make mention of no other goods but those of riches; but we must not therefore imagine, that rich men only stand in the capacity of stewards, since every advantage of nature or of grace, as well as those of fortune, our life, our health, our strength, our wit, and parts, our knowledge natural and acquired, our time, our leisure, our every ability, our every opportunity, our every inclination to do well, are all our master's goods; all intrusted with us; all capable of benefiting others; and will all, at last, be brought to our account.—Hilby's Annotations, and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iii.

f It is said, "and the Lord commended the unjust steward," namely, the master of this unjust steward. He spoke highly of the address and cunning of his iniquitous servant. He had, on his own principles, made a very prudent provision for his support; but his master no more approved of his conduct in this, than he did in his wasting his substance before. From the ambiguous and improper manner in which this is expressed in the common English translation, it has been supposed that our blessed Lord commended the conduct of this wicked man; but the word καλοῦσι, thus translated lord, simply means the master of the unjust steward.—Clarke's Commentary on the New Testament.—ED.

g The words in the text are, "make yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness," (Luke xvi. 9.) Now, mammon, or mammona, is a Syriac word, and properly denotes riches or treasure. It comes from an Hebrew root, which signifies, to be hid, and is therefore thought to comprehend, not only gold, silver, and other metals, that are hid in the bowels of the earth, but stores likewise of corn, wine, and oil, a great part of the riches of the eastern people, which they often buried in subterraneous caverns, to conceal them from their enemies. These are called the mammon of unrighteousness, because they frequently occasion much iniquity in the world, and are often acquired by very indirect means; but our Lord, by this expression, must not be supposed to command alms to be given of that which is gotten by fraud or injustice, because such charity can never be acceptable to God. No, the duty of those who have acquired wealth unrighteously is, to make restitution to the persons they have injured; if these be dead, then to their heirs or executors; and the poor are only then receivers of the fruits of injustice, when a person is conscious that he has been unjust, but does not know the persons to whom he has been so.—Calmet's Commentary, and Beausobre's Annotations.

living in pride, and ease, and luxury, who, after his death, was carried into the dismal regions of the damned; and of a certain poor beggar, named Lazarus, ^a lying at his gate, ^b full of sores and ulcers, and desiring the fragments that came from his table, who, when he died, was transported by angels into Abraham's bosom; ^c "that, in these different states, the poor man, in compensation for his former misery enjoyed all the felicity that his heart could wish; while the rich man, in punishment of his luxury, and want of mercy to the poor, was forced to undergo the most inexpressible torments, without being able to procure so much as one drop ^d of water to cool his inflamed tongue, and without being able to prevail for the once despised Lazarus to be sent upon a message of admonition to his surviving brethren, because they had Moses ^e and the prophets for their instructors, or a stand-or a real history, is a matter wherein several commentators are not agreed. We are told, however, that in several manuscripts, both Greek and Latin, there are these words in the beginning of the 19th verse, 'he spake to them another parable,' and that this very parable is in the Gemara Balyonicum; from whence it is cited by the learned Sheringham, in the preface to his Ioma, as indeed, if we look into the circumstances of it, such as the rich man's 'lifting up his eyes in hell,' and seeing 'Lazarus in Abraham's bosom,' his discourse to Abraham, his complaint of being tormented with flames, and his desire that Lazarus might be sent to 'cool his tongue,' or, at least, to convert his surviving brethren: if, together with the great gulf that is fixed between the two places of bliss and torment, we do but consider these particulars, I say, we must needs conclude, that, as they cannot be understood of any departed soul, in a literal sense, they must be an allegorical representation of things invisible, by terms in some measure suitable to the opinion of the Jews concerning the state of souls after death.—Calmet's Commentary and Whitby's Annotations.

^a Lazar, which, according to most, is but a contraction from Eleazar, is the very same with Ania-chad, a poor man in the Gemara, and properly signifies one without help, or rather one that has God only for his help: but, in the times of our blessed Saviour, we may observe, that it was a common name among the Jews, and given to men of some distinction, as we find it was to the brother of Martha and Mary.—Whitby's Annotations, and Calmet's Commentary.

^b This was the place where beggars stood or were laid, and asked alms: hence is that rule with the Jews, 'if a man die and leave sons and daughters, if he leave but small substance, the daughters shall be taken care of, and the sons shall beg at the gates.'—Ed.

^c The garden of Eden and Paradise, the Throne of Glory, and Abraham's Bosom, were common expressions among the Jewish doctors, to denote a future state of felicity; for so Josephus, in his discourse of the Maccabees, says of good men, that "they are gathered to the region of the patriarchs, and that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, do receive their souls;" and they tell us farther, that the souls of such men are carried thither by angels; for so the Targum on Cant. iv. 12, says, that "no man hath power to enter into the garden of Eden, but the just, whose souls are carried thither by the hands of good angels." Our commentators, however, have perceived something peculiar in the phrase of Abraham's bosom. They imagine, that the Jewish notion of paradise was a place abounding with delights and perpetual feastings, where Abraham, the great founder of their nation, enjoys the uppermost place at the table, and while all his children sit down with him, some at a nearer, and some at a farther distance from him, he who has the honour to recline upon his bosom, as Lazarus is here represented, is in a higher degree of felicity than ordinary. But others deride all this notion, and assert that Abraham's bosom, was so called, not from any posture of guests at table, but from little children, whom their tender parents do sometimes take in their bosom, and sometimes cause them to sleep there. For since those that die in the Lord, say they, are said to sleep, or rest from their labours, where can they be said to enjoy this rest or sleep better than in the bosom of the father of the faithful?—Beausobre's and Whitby's Annotations, and Calmet's Commentary.

^d A good deal of this is to be taken in a figurative sense; but our Saviour might possibly insert this passage in the parable, on purpose to strike at a vain imagination which some of the Jews were apt to entertain, namely, that hell-fire had no power over the sinners of Israel, because Abraham and Isaac came down thither to fetch them from thence, which could not fail of being effectually confuted, when they heard Abraham, as it were with his own mouth, declaring, that no help was to be expected from him, when once they were got into that place.—Whitby's Annotations.

^e This appears, by considering the temper of infidelity; for where unbelief proceeds, as generally it does, from a vitiated and corrupted mind, which hates to be reformed; which rejects the evidence, because it will not admit the doctrine, and the doctrine, because it cannot admit the evidence; in this case all proofs will be alike, and it will be lost labour to ply such a man with reason or new evidence, since it is not want of reason or evidence that makes him an unbeliever. And this case chiefly our Saviour seems to have in his view; for the request to Abraham to send one from the dead was made in behalf of men who lived wantonly and luxuriously; who, as the psalmist expresses it, 'had not God in all their thoughts.' The rich man in torment could think of no better expedient to rescue his brethren from the danger they were in of coming into the same condition with himself, than sending one from the dead to admonish them, and to give them a faithful account how matters stood there, and how it fared with him. To which Abraham answers, that they had already sufficient evidence of these things; that they wanted no means of knowledge, if they would make use of those they had: 'they have Moses and the prophets, let them hear them.' But still he insists, 'nay, Father Abraham; but if one went unto them from the dead, they will repent.' Then follows the text, which is the last resolution of this case, 'if they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead.' And indeed where infidelity is the effect of such profligate wickedness, it deserves not so much regard from God, as that he should condescend to make particular applications to it by new lights and evidences; and should he do it, there is reason to suspect it would be ineffectual. We see, in the ordinary course of providence, many judgments inflicted on sinners to reclaim and amend them; but they harden themselves against them; so that their last state is worse than their first. I will not answer for the courage of sinners, how well they would bear the sight of one from the dead; nay, I am apt to imagine it would strangely terrify and amaze them. But to be frightened and to be persuaded are two things: nature would recover the fright, and sin would recover strength, and the great fright might come to be matter of ridicule. How easy would it be, when the fright was over, to compare this event with the many ridiculous stories we have of apparitions, and to come at last to mistrust our own senses, and to conclude that we were misled, like a man in a dark night who follows an ignis fatuus? And what is worse, when the infidel had once conquered his own fears, and got loose again from the thoughts of religion, he would then conclude that all religion is made up of that fear which he felt himself, which others cannot get rid of, though he so manfully and happily subdued it. You may think it perhaps impossible that a man should not be convinced by such an appearance; the same I believe you would think of the judgments which befell Pharaoh, that it is hardly possible any man should withstand them; and yet you see he did; nay, did not the guards, who were eye-witnesses of our Saviour's resurrection; who saw the angel that rolled away the stone from the mouth of the sepulchre; who shook and trembled with fear, and became as dead men; did not they, after all this, receive money to deny all they saw, and to give false evidence against the person they beheld coming from the grave? So you see, it is in the nature of man to withstand such evidences, where the power of sin is prevalent. Besides, there are many sinners who are not infidels: they may believe Moses and the prophets, though they will not hear them, that is, obey them. Now, should one come from the dead to these men, the most they could do would be to believe him; but that does not apply their obeying him; for they believe Moses and the prophets, Christ and his apostles, and yet obey not them; and why should obedience be the consequence of belief in one case more than another? There can be no greater arguments for obedience than the gospel affords; and therefore he who believes the gospel, and disobeys it, is out of ing revelation of the divine will, (and if it prevailed not with them, nothing would,) for the direction of their lives.”

Of the great numbers of people who attended our Lord wherever he went, some came out of necessity, others out of curiosity; some out of a spirit of devotion, and others out of a spirit of captiousness, and with an intent to entangle him in his discourse. Of this last sort were the Scribes and Pharisees, who, taking the question of divorces ^a to be somewhat intricate, put it to our Saviour; but he, limiting the permission of such separations to the case of adultery only, reminded them of that strict and natural union ^b between man and wife, which God had appointed at their first creation, and was not, consequently, to be disannulled by any human institution. Here the Pharisees, thinking that they had got the advantage of the argument, objected the precept ¹ of Moses, wherein he permitted the husband, ^c in many cases, to hope to be reformed by any other evidence. So that, considering the case with respect to all manner of infidels or sinners, there is reason in our Saviour's judgment; ‘if they will not hear Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead.’—Bishop Sherlock.—Ed.

^a The Jews, at this time, were divided in their opinions as to the matter of divorces. Some of them, who followed the sentiments of the school of Shammai, held, that the wife was to be put away only for the crime of adultery, because Moses directs, that this might be done, in case the husband had found some uncleanness in her, Deut. xxiv. 1. But others, who adhered to the notions of the school of Hillel, and they by much were the greater number, maintained, on the contrary, that this was permitted to be done for any cause whatever; because, in the same verse it is expressed, that, if she found not grace in her husband's eyes, she was divorceable. This was the question which the Pharisees brought to our Saviour, thinking, that he must have decided it, either against the law of Moses, or against the determination of one of these two famous schools, and, one way or other, have become offensive to the people; but our Saviour evaded all this, by reducing matrimony to its original institution.—Whitby's and Beausobre's Annotations.

^b Our Saviour replied to the insidious question of the Pharisees by referring to the history of the creation, and the original institution of marriage; intimating that this was the standard by which all transactions in this important concern, ought to be regulated, as every deviation was an abuse consequent on man's depravity. The Creator first formed Adam, and from his side took the rib of which the woman was made; from this one woman and one man the whole species had descended. When the Lord brought the woman, Adam acknowledged her as a part of himself, and it was added (either by Adam as immediately inspired or by Moses,) that, ‘for this cause’ in all future ages, ‘a man should leave father and mother,’ foregoing many of the comforts, and relinquishing many of the duties of those endeared relations and ‘cleave to his wife,’ as a part of himself. Thus these two would constitute, as it were, one body, never more to be separated, except by God himself, who in this appointment of marriage had joined them together, but to have ever after the same interests, and to share each other's comforts or sorrows, as members of the same body do.—When marriage was instituted, sin and death had not entered, the sinful cause of separation afterwards mentioned, and the natural dissolution of the union was therefore not referred to, but they have since been specified, and resemble the cutting off of a mortified limb, and the separation of the parts of the body by death. In all other respects, the union is to be considered as indissoluble. It is observable that Christ inserts the word ‘twain,’ which is not in the original institution, but added by the Seventy purposely, as it seems, to obviate all misconstruction of his meaning.—Ed.

^c The Pharisees, in their reply to our Saviour, seem to intimate that the lawfulness of divorces was founded upon a divine command: ‘why then did Moses command to give her a bill of divorcement, and put her away?’ (Mark x. 4.) But Moses no where commands, but only, in some cases, permits the doing of give a bill of divorce to the wife: but to this our Saviour replied, that, though under the Mosaic dispensation, God, knowing their obstinacy and perverse inclinations, allowed a dispensation ^d in this point, by tolerating divorces; yet, according to the original institution of marriage, it was not so; and therefore, to reduce the matter to its primary establishment, he determined, that all divorces, ^e for any less cause than that of fornication, this; nor is the design of the whole precept to give any encouragement to this practice, but only to provide, that, in case men will be so perverse and hard-hearted, as to turn away their wives upon every slight occasion, the thing might be done in a proper and public manner, not by word of mouth, but by bill of divorcement, delivered in form, that, when the woman is thus dismissed, she may not be quite ruined, but left at her liberty to become another man's wife, Deut. xxiv. 2.

^d But here the question is,—Whether this dispensation excused the common divorces among the Jews, which our Saviour looks upon as an infringement upon the primitive institution of marriage, from all sin, especially that of adultery, in the sight of God? It is granted, indeed, that these divorces were contrary to the equity and genuine intention of God's first institution of marriage; but then it must be added, that God, by his servant Moses, had dispensed with his own institution; that under such his dispensation there could be no prohibition; and that, where there was no prohibition, there could be no transgression; unless we can suppose, that God could forbid and permit the same thing at the same time. Our Saviour, indeed, upon this occasion, prescribes a new law, which had not before obtained among the Jews; he retracts the dispensation that Moses had given; he reduces marriage to its primitive institution; and, except in cases of adultery, allows of no divorces, but accounts them all null and invalid: however, under the Mosaic dispensation it was not so. From the permission given to the women, when they were thus divorced, to be married to others, it is evident, that these divorces quite dissolved the bond of matrimony; otherwise we must say, that God gave these women, when they married again, a toleration to live in a state of adultery, and so, at long run, the whole commonwealth of Judea, must, by a divine permission, have been filled with adulteries, and a spurious offspring; which is incongruous to the wisdom and purity of Almighty God to imagine.—Whitby's Annotations.

^e Divorces seem to have been permitted among the Jews, before the law; but we find no example of that kind in the Old Testament written since Moses. They have been less frequent with the Jews, since their dispersion among nations which do not permit the dissolution of marriage upon light occasions. In cases where it does take place, the woman is at liberty to marry again, as she shall think proper, but not with the person who gave occasion for the divorce. To prevent the abuse which the Jewish men might make of the liberty of divorcing, the rabbins appoint many formalities, which consume much time, and give the married couple opportunity to be reconciled. Where there is no hope of accommodation, a woman, a deaf man, or a notary draws the letter of divorce. He writes it in the presence of one or more rabbins, on vellum ruled, containing only twelve lines, in square letters; and abundance of little trifling particulars are observed, as well in the characters as in the manner of writing, and in the names and surnames of the husband and wife. He who pens it, the rabbins and witnesses ought not to be relations either to the husband, or to the wife, or to one another. The substance of this letter, which they call geth, is as follows—“On such a day, month, year, and place, J, N. divorce you voluntarily, put you away, restore you to your liberty, even you, N. who were heretofore my wife, and I permit you to marry whom you please.” The letter being written, the rabbi examines the husband closely, in order to learn whether he is voluntarily inclined to do what he has done. They endeavour to have at least ten persons present at this action, without reckoning the two witnesses who sign, and two other witnesses to the date. After which the rabbi commands the wife to open her hands, in order to receive this deed, lest it fall to the ground; and after having examined her over again, the husband gives her the parchment, and says to her, Here is thy divorce, I put thee away from me, and leave thee at liberty to marry whom thou pleasest. The wife takes it, and gives it to the rabbi, who reads it once were illegal, and, on both sides, attended with adultery; which when some of his disciples heard, and, since the engagement was so rigorous, began to express their dislike of marriage, our Lord allowed it to be true, that in those who had the gift of continency, a single life was more conducive towards the attainment of the kingdom of heaven; ^a but that those who had it not, and thought proper to marry, ought by all means to adhere to the first institution.

After this, he began to remind his disciples of several things he had instructed them in before, namely, of the impossibility of preventing scandals and offences; of the duty of forgiving our brother his repeated transgressions; of the necessity and efficacy of faith, in order to be heard in our requests to God; of humility in the performance of our duty, because at the best we are but unprofitable servants; and especially of humility in our addresses to God, for which he gave them a parabolical instance, in the behaviour of a Pharisee ^b and publican; the Pharisee, vaunting over his own praise at his devotion, and preferring himself before all others: but the more, after which she is free.—Cabnet's Dictionary of the Bible, art. Divorce.—Ed.

^a The author here seems to favour the notion of the Romanists with regard to celibacy, but what our Lord says (Mat. xix. 11, 12.) of a single life, is entirely perverted by the papists, when they produce it to discredit matrimony, and exalt celibacy as the more perfect state. For on this very occasion marriage is declared to be an institution of God. And lest any one might have replied, that it was a remedy contrived purely for the weakness of our fallen state, it is particularly observed, that it was an institution given to man in innocence. Wherefore, as the apostle tells us, marriage is honourable in all ranks and conditions of persons, provided the duties thereof are inviolably maintained. Besides, it is false to affirm that our Lord recommends celibacy. He only gives permission for it as a thing lawful, telling them that if they were able to live continently, they would not sin though they did not marry, especially as the times they lived in were times of persecution. In which light also the judgment of the apostle Paul is to be considered, when he declared it to be better for Christians, as matters then stood, not to marry, I Cor. vii. 26.—Macknight's Harmony.—Ed.

^b The Pharisee's temper is sufficiently discovered in the form of his prayer: 'God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican,' (Luke xviii. 11.) The style is insolent and boasting; that of an herald, rather than a supplicant; and does not so much render God his praises, as proclaim his own. But, admitting this lofty opinion of his own excellencies to be never so just, yet what warrant or privilege could he have to disparage and vilify his brethren? 'I am not as other men;' what could be more fulsome vanity, than thus to set himself off, as an exception to a whole world at once? 'Or even as this publican?' to break that bruised reed, and, with scornful reproaches, to fall foul on a wounded soul, whose penitent sorrow called for the compassion of every stander by. The publican, quite contrary in all his expressions, in all his deportment, speaks nothing but shame and confusion, the tenderest contrition, and most profound humility. He stands afar off, as not presuming upon a nearer approach to the presence of so holy a majesty. He lifts not up so much as his eyes to heaven, but, by the guilt and melancholy of his countenance, takes to himself the ignominious title so liberally bestowed by his scornful companion. He smites upon his breast, as conscious of the pollutions lodged there; looks not abroad, but confines his thoughts to his own misery; alleges nothing in his own behalf, no mixture of good to mitigate the evil of his past life; feels no comfort, seeks no refuge, except in the mercy of a forgiving God: brings no motive to incline that mercy, but a sorrowful sense of his own unworthiness, and an humble hope in God's unbounded goodness; and therefore upon this, this saving, this only supporting attribute, he casts himself entirely, with a 'God, be merciful to me a sinner!'—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iii.]

publican, with a dejected heart, confessing his sins, and imploring God's mercy; and yet the latter, according to our Lord's judgment, departed more acceptable to God than the other; because the divine decree is, 'that pride should be abased, and humility exalted.'

The Pharisees, who waited for the coming of the Messiah, and had drawn up a romantic scheme of his appearing with the utmost glory of a temporal prince, came about this time and demanded of him, 'when the kingdom of God,' ^c whereof he had told them so much, 'was to appear?' To which he gave them in answer, "that it should not appear with any outward pomp or splendour, as they vainly imagined; and that, in truth, it was already begun among them, though they had no perception of it." And then, turning to his disciples, he strictly cautioned them not to be deluded by false Christs, and false prophets, ^d who would pretend to

^c Whether the Pharisees put this question to our Saviour in derision, because in his discourses he had so often mentioned the kingdom of God, or in sober seriousness, because at this time they were in strong expectations of the coming of the Messiah, and his erecting a secular kingdom among them, is not so easy a matter to determine. Their contemptible opinion of Christ inclines some to think the former; but their generally received opinion about the Messiah gives some countenance to the latter; but, in whatsoever sense they intended the question, our Saviour's answer perfectly fits them. Only we may observe, that by the kingdom of God here, the Pharisees and our Saviour meant two very different things: the Pharisees a flourishing kingdom, wherein the Messiah was to reduce all other nations under the Jewish yoke; but our Saviour a kingdom of wrath and vengeance, which he designed to exercise even upon the Jews themselves; and withal a spiritual kingdom, which he intended to erect in the hearts of men by the kindly operations of his word and Spirit, when his gospel should be more fully propagated. For this is the meaning of that comparison, 'As the lightning, which shineth from one part of heaven to the other part under heaven, so also shall the coming of the Son of Man be in his day.' (Luke xvii. 24.) He had told them, that the kingdom of God was already come among them, and had appeared in the purity of his doctrine, and the miracles which he had wrought to confirm it, though not in that glaring light as to make them take a proper notice of it; and here tells them farther, that, after his resurrection, it would shine with such a fresh and glorious brightness, by the effusion of the Holy Ghost on his disciples, as would render it equal to the splendour of the sun, shining from one part of heaven to the other, and cause it to be propagated almost as quick as lightning through the world; and that then this Son of Man, so scornfully rejected by them, would also appear suddenly and gloriously, to revenge upon them their infidelity, and the affronts which they had offered to him.—Pool's and Whitby's Annotations.

^d The distinction between false Christs and false prophets is, that the former took upon them to be Christ, and came under that name; the latter were such as promised and foretold false things. Among the number of the false Christs who appeared in the time prefixed by our Saviour, that is, between his resurrection and the destruction of Jerusalem, are generally reckoned Dositheus, who, according to Origen, gave it out that he was the Christ whom Moses foretold. (Basnage. Hist. of Jews, b. ii. c. 13.) Simon Magus, who bewitched the people by his sorceries, and made himself pass 'for the great power of God,' (Acts viii. 9, 10.) and those many more whom the "time of the advent of their king Messiah", as Josephus expresses it, "prevailed with to set up for kings;" (Jewish War, b. i.) Among the number of false prophets who appeared in this period are likewise reckoned Theudas (not the person mentioned Acts v. 36.) who, in the government of Fadus, promised his followers that he would divide the river Jordan, as it was in the days of Joshua and Elias, and give them a free passage (Joseph. Antiq. b. xx. c. 1.) The Egyptian Jew, who, in the government of Felix, drew thirty thousand after him to the mount of Olives, where he promised by his prayers to make the walls of Jerusalem, as those of Jericho once did, fall flat on the ground; thence drive the Roman show them the kingdom of God where it was not; and that, before he could enter into his glorified state, he was to suffer many things, and be rejected by the Jews; but that after his death, he would give incontestable proofs of his power and dominion, by the wonderful propagation of his gospel, and by the speedy and amazing vengeance which he intended to take of that nation. He therefore exhorted them, not to imitate the security of the people in Noah's time, or of the inhabitants of Sodom, nor to express any concern for the destruction of their country, as did Lot's wife for the burning of Sodom; ^a but to use their utmost care and diligence, when they saw the Roman ^b armies advancing, not to be involved in the general calamity: and because, in involving some, and preserving others, there would be much of God's distinforces, and there fix the seat of his empire (Jewish War, b. ii.) A certain magician, who, in the government of Festus, led great numbers of Jews into the desert, and promised them a deliverance from all their troubles. (Antiq. b. xxii.) And several others, as the same historian informs us, (Jewish War, b. vii.) who taught the Jews, "even to the last, to expect help and deliverance." Good reason therefore had our blessed Saviour to caution his disciples against all such pretenders to a divine mission, since, according to his prediction, and, as the same historian expresses it, "the land at this time was quite overrun with impostors and seducers, who drew the people after them in shoals, though the Roman governors were so very severe, that there hardly a day passed without the execution of some of them." (Antiq. b. xx. c. 6.)

^a Instead of making haste to save herself, as the angel had commanded her, she, out of a vain curiosity, must needs look back, either regretting what she had left behind her in the city, or concerned for those that were destroyed in it, till she was overtaken by the flames, and changed into a statue of salt, or into the condition of a corpse salted and embalmed, which continued as a monument of her disobedience for many ages after. And, in like manner, if any of our Saviour's disciples neglected the advice which he here gave them, and continued in Jerusalem, when the Roman army had closely invested it, they very likely were involved in the common destruction.—Calmel's Commentary.

^b The words in the text are, 'Whosoever the body or the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together.' (Mat. xxiv. 28. Luke xvii. 37.) These words, which our Saviour here makes proverbial, seem to have been borrowed from that passage in Job, where he speaks of the eagle in this manner: 'She dwelleth, and abideth on the rock upon the crag of the rock, and the strong place. From thence she seeketh the prey, and her eyes behold afar off. Her young ones also suck up blood; and where the slain are, there is she.' (Job xxxix. 28, &c.) Upon the account of the swiftness, the strength, and invincibility of this bird, no doubt it was, that the Romans made the eagle their ensign in war. And therefore our Saviour, by making use of this expression, gives us to understand that the Romans would come upon the Jews with a sudden destruction; surround them so, that there should be no escaping their hands; and, in whatsoever country they found them, there put them all to the sword. For the eagle, mentioned in Job, our translators have rendered by a word, which signifies a vulture, a bird consecrated to Mars, because it loves to feed upon man's flesh; and therefore by a kind of natural instinct, "travels along with armies in expectation of the carcasses that fall there." Nor is it an uncommon thing for the prophets to express the day of God's vengeance under the idea of a feast, which he hath prepared for the ravenous birds and beasts of the field; for thus saith the Lord, 'Speak unto every feathered fowl, and to every beast of the field; assemble yourselves, and come, gather yourselves on every side to my sacrifice, that I do sacrifice for you, even a great sacrifice upon the mountains of Israel, that ye may eat flesh and drink blood, even the flesh of the mighty, and the blood of the princes of the earth.' (Ezek. xxxix. 17, 18. See Is. xxxiv. 6. and Jer. xlvi. 10.)—Hammond's Annotations, and Calmel's Commentary.

guishing providence concerned; he therefore exhorted them to pray without fainting, or being discouraged at any thing; and, to this purpose, propounded a parable of a poor woman, who, by her continued importunity alone, prevailed with an unjust judge ^c to vindicate her wrongs, though he feared neither God nor man.

Shortly after this, Jesus crossed the river Jordan into Perea, ^d where he was followed again by vast multitudes of people, whom he both taught and cured of such distempers as they had, insomuch, that several of the company, perceiving how ready he was to do good to all that came unto him, brought their little children ^e with them, in order to partake of his divine benediction; but his disciples thinking it below the dignity of their master to be disturbed and interrupted by infants, at first refused admittance to those who brought them, until Jesus, having reproved them for so doing, and withal recommended the innocence and simplicity of these babes, as a pattern for their imitation, commanded all to be introduced, and, taking them up in his arms, he laid his

^c Though it were blasphemy to think, that God acts upon the same motives with this unjust judge, yet this we may learn from the nature of the parable, that if a person, who neither fears God nor regards man, who had neither any sense of religion nor humanity, may be supposed to be so far prevailed upon by the earnest prayer of a miserable necessitous creature, as to grant the request made to him, and to administer relief to the supplicant, merely upon the continuance and importunity of the petitions that are put up; how much more ought we to think that God, who is infinite goodness itself, who is always kind and bountiful to his creatures, who delights to do them good, even without their desiring it, and who is able to do them good, with much less pains than they can request it; how much more ought we to think, I say, that this God, upon our earnest and hearty prayer to him, especially if we be importunate, and persevering in our devotions, will return us a kind answer, and grant us such supplies, such protection or assistance, as shall be needful for us.—Bishop Snauridge's Sermons.

^d This word is derived from the Greek, πέραν, beyond, and signifies the country beyond Jordan, or on the east side of that river. It was bounded, according to Josephus, to the west, by Jordan; to the east, by Philadelphia; to the north, by Pella; and to the south, by Macheron; and was a fruitful country, abounding with pines, olive-trees, palm-trees, and other plants, that grew up and down in the fields in great plenty and perfection; and, in the excessive heats, was well watered and refreshed with springs and torrents from the mountains.—Jewish War, b. iii. c. 2.—It comprehended the six cantons of Abilene, Trachonitis, Ituraa, Gaulonitis, Batavia, and Perea, strictly so called. It was to this latter canton that our Saviour repaired on this occasion. See Macknight's Harmony, s. 84, note to John x. 40.—ED.

^e The parents who brought their children to Christ, were doubtless such as believed him to be a prophet sent from God, and were persuaded, that the touch, or imposition of his hand, would be of great benefit to them, both to draw down a blessing from heaven upon them, and to preserve them from diseases which they saw him cure in persons more advanced in years. We may observe, therefore, that though these children were no more than infants, as appears by our Saviour taking them up in his arms, (Mark x. 16,) yet their parents thought them capable of spiritual blessings, and of receiving advantage by our Saviour's prayers. They however might bring them, with no further intent than what is customary among the Jews even now, when they present their children to any of their famous doctors, namely, to obtain his blessing; but by the reason which our Saviour gives for their admission into the kingdom of heaven, it appears, that he perceived something in them, besides their being emblems of humility, that qualified them to come unto him; and what could that be, but a fitness to be dedicated to the service of God, and to enter into covenant with him early, as the Jewish children did, by the rite of baptism, which was his institution, even as the other did by that of circumcision.—Calmel's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

hands upon them, a and blessed them, and so departed from the place where this transaction happened.

As he was on his journey, a young person of distinction, who was very rich and wealthy, desired to know of him, what he was to do in order to obtain eternal life. Our Saviour proposed to him the observation of the moral law, and remitted him, in particular, to the commandments of the second table, b as a certain sign of his keeping those of the first; but when the young gentleman told him, that all these he had made it his study to observe from his youth, and our Lord, who knew his covetous temper, and was willing to touch the secret sore of his mind, told him, that if he aimed at perfection in religion, his only way would be to sell his estate, c and give it to the poor, in hopes of a greater treasure in heaven, and to come and be one of his disciples; the young man went away very pensive and melancholy, being loath to part with his present possessions for any treasure in reversion: Whereupon our Lord, turning to his disciples, began to declare what an insurmountable obstacle riches, without the grace of God, were to any man's salvation, d and that 'it was easier,' according to the Hebrew proverb, 'for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, e than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven.' At which expression, when his disciples were not a little startled, to remove their fears, he let them know, that the salvation of the rich, though a matter of some difficulty, was not impossible with God, who could change the hearts and affections of men as he pleased.

When the apostles heard their master bidding the 'young man sell all,' and 'give it to the poor, and follow him,' and promising him, for a reward, a treasure in heaven, they began to think, that possibly it might be their case, and the promise, in like manner, concern them; and therefore, when, in the name of the rest, Peter desired to know of him what reward they were to expect, who had actually relinquished all and followed him; his reply was, that at the general resurrection, f 'when him-which way soever the kingdom be understood. When it was only by means of persuasion that men were brought into a society, hated and persecuted by all the ruling powers of the earth, Jewish and pagan; we may rest assured that the opulent and the voluptuous, characters which, in a dissolute age, commonly go together, who had so much to lose, and so much to fear, would not, among the hearers of the gospel, be the most easily persuaded. The apostle James, (ii. 5, 6.) accordingly attests this to have been the fact; it was 'the poor in this world whom God hath chosen rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom;' whereas, they were 'the rich in this world who oppressed them, dragged them before their tribunals, and blasphemed that worthy name by which they were called.' As little can there be any doubt of the justness of the sentiment, in relation to the state of the blessed hereafter, when the deceitfulness of riches, and the snare into which it so often inveigles men, are duly considered. So close an analogy runs through all the divine dispensations, that in more instances than this, it may be affirmed with truth, that the declarations of scripture are susceptible of either interpretation.—Campbell on the Gospels.—Ed.

e There are three different opinions among interpreters concerning the meaning of this proverbial saying. Some imagine, that, at Jerusalem, there was a gate, so very low and narrow, that a loaded camel could not pass through it, and that, by reason of its littleness, it was called the needle's eye; but all this is a mere fiction, devised on purpose to solve this seeming difficulty. The Jews indeed, to signify a thing impossible, had a common proverb among them, that 'an elephant cannot pass through the eye of a needle.' Now, our Saviour, say some, was pleased to change this proverb from an elephant, which was a beast that few had seen, to a camel, a creature very common in Syria, and whose bunch on his back hindered him from passing through any strait entrance. But others, not able to discern any analogy between a camel and a needle's eye, think, that the word Κάμυλος, here signifies a cabble, or thick rope, which mariners use in casting their anchors; and that the rather, not only because there is some similitude between a cabble and a thread, which is usually drawn through the eye of a needle, but because the Jews, as the learned Buxtorf acquaints us, have a proverb of the like import relating to the cable, as they have to the elephant; for so they say, that as "difficult is the passage of the soul out of the body, as that of a cable through a narrow hole." Whether of these two interpretations takes place, it is a matter of pure indifference: only we may observe, that the application of the proverb to the rich man's entering into the kingdom of heaven, must not be understood absolutely, but only so as to denote a thing extremely difficult, if not impossible, without an extraordinary influence of the divine grace.—Calmel's Commentary; Hammond's and Poole's Annotations.

f The word, in the original, is παλιγγενσία, which properly signifies a new and second state, and is used among the Pythagoreans for the return of the soul, after it had left one body to take possession of another: and agreeably herewith it is used, by sacred writers, to denote either the future resurrection, which will be the re-union of the soul and body, or that great change which was to be effected in the world by the preaching of the gospel, and, more especially, by the mission of the Holy Ghost a It was common with the Jews to bring their children to venerable persons, men of note for religion and piety, to have their blessing and prayer, (Gen. xlviii. 14.) And it appears to have been customary among the Jews, when one prayed for another, who was present to lay his hand upon the person's hand.—Campbell's Translation of the Gospel.—Ed.

b We must not imagine, because our Saviour refers this young man to the precepts of the second table only, that therefore they are of more obligation to us, than those of the first, or that, by performing them alone, we may attain eternal life: our Lord has elsewhere determined, that the great commandment of all is, 'to love the Lord our God with all our hearts;' and here he instances in those of the second table, not only because the love of our neighbour is an excellent evidence of our love to God, but because the Pharisee, of which sect very probably this person was one, thought these commandments of trivial account, and easy performance; and yet by some of these it was, that our Saviour intended, by and by, to convince this inquirer, that he neither had kept nor could keep them.—Poole's Annotations.

c Since our blessed Saviour here requires of this young man, not only to withdraw his heart from an inordinate love of his possessions, but to sell them all and give the money to the poor, we may be sure that this was a particular command to him, in order to convince him of the insincerity of his pretended love to life eternal, and not a precept common to all Christians. That there were rich men in the church, we learn from several passages in scripture, (1 Tim. vi. 17. James i. 10, and ii. 2.) St Peter, in his speech to Ananias, permits Christians to retain what is their own, (Acts v. 4.) and St Paul does not enjoin the Corinthians to sell all, and give alms, but only requests them to administer to their brethren's wants out of their abundance, (2 Cor. viii. 14.) So that if riches fall into the hands of one who knoweth how to use them to God's glory, and the relief of indigent Christians, as well as to supply his own needs, it seems a contradiction to conceive, that God requires him to part with them, and so divest himself of any further opportunity of promoting his glory and doing good to his needy members. This precept therefore of selling all we have, can only take place when we are in the same situation with this young man, namely, have an express command from God so to do, or when we find our riches are an impediment to the securing of our eternal interest; for in that case we must part with a right hand, or a right eye, the nearest and dearest things we have, 'rather than be cast into hell-fire.'—Whitby's Annotations.

d Drs Campbell and Boothroyd thus translate Mat. xix. 23, 'It is difficult for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven.' By the kingdom of heaven is sometimes understood, in the gospel history, the Christian church, then soon to be erected, and sometimes the state of the blessed in heaven, after the resurrection. In regard to this declaration of our Lord, I take it to hold true, in self should be seated upon his throne of glory, they also should sit upon twelve thrones, ^a judging the twelve tribes of Israel; and that not only they, but all others likewise, who, for his and the gospel's sake, should quit any worldly advantages or possessions, should receive such comforts ^b in this world as would vastly surpass their losses, and in the world to come, eternal life: but then, to show them that such high rewards proceeded from the bounty of heaven, and no other title, he represented the freedom of God, in the distribution of his favours, under the emblem of a certain master of a family, sending labourers into his vineyard, some sooner, and some later, but giving them all the same wages: wherein, though he seemed kind to some, yet was he unjust to none, because he paid them all according to his agreement, and, having done so, was then certainly left to his option, whom to make objects of his liberality.

Our Saviour had not been long in Perea, before he received a message out of Judea, from two sisters in Bethany, ^c Martha, and Mary, of the dangerous sickness of after our Lord's ascension into heaven.—Hanmond's Annotations.

^a Some interpreters refer these words to that authority, both in matters of discipline and doctrine, which the apostles, after the descent of the Holy Ghost upon them, were, by our Lord's commission and appointment, to exercise in the Christian church; but most understand them of the honours that are to be conferred upon them in a future state. And here some have taken great pains to determine what judgment these persons shall pass; as that they shall condemn the errors of wicked men by their doctrines, and the malice and obstinacy of infidels by their persecutions, &c., while others have undertaken to assign them their parts in the process of the last great day, and represent them, as so many assessors, to the Supreme Judge sitting upon the examination and trial of mankind, while all the rest stand at the bar. But though we are well assured, that such a judgment shall be, yet, as to the particular circumstances and formalities of it, the scripture seems to give us but a slender insight; and therefore, setting aside all dark conjectures about this matter, the most safe and probable way of applying this passage is, to look upon it as spoken after the manner of men, to signify in general, a brighter crown or more exquisite degree of happiness and glory. The apostles accompanied and stuck close to Christ in his low estate. They kept the faith under the greatest pressures and temptations. They were indefatigably diligent, undauntedly constant in their labours and sufferings for the truth, and most eminently serviceable in advancing the kingdom of Christ upon earth; and therefore they shall receive an eminent distinction in the kingdom of heaven.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iv.

^b That is, the comforts of an upright conscience, a full content of mind, the joys of the Holy Ghost, increase of grace, and hopes of glory. They should have God for their father, and Christ for their spouse, and all good Christians for their friends and brethren, who would honour, succour, and support them, more than those that were allied to them by the strictest bonds of nature.—Whitby's Annotations.

^c Bethany took its name from the tract of ground wherein it stands, so called from the word בית, which signifies the fig or grief tree, that grew there in great plenty. It was a considerable place, situated at the foot of the mount of Olives about fifteen furlongs, or near two miles eastward from Jerusalem; but at present it is but a very small village. One of our modern travellers acquaints us, that at the first entrance into it, there is an old ruin, which they call Lazarus's castle, supposed to have been the mansion-house where he and his sisters lived. At the bottom of a small descent, not far from the castle, you see his sepulchre, which the Turks hold in great veneration, and use it for an oratory, or place of prayer. Here, going down by twenty-five steep steps, you come at first into a small square room, and from thence creep into another that is less, about a yard and a half deep, in which the body is said to have been laid. About a bowshot from hence, you pass by the place their brother Lazarus, a person highly beloved and esteemed by him; but he proposing, on this occasion, to manifest the glory of God, as well as his own divine power and mission, by a greater miracle than a simple cure would be, delayed his going until Lazarus was dead, ^d and then set forward.

While he was in his journey, he took his apostles aside, and ^e told them still more plainly what the event of it would be; namely, that at this time of his going to Jerusalem, the chief priests and scribes would apprehend, and condemn him, and then 'deliver him to the Gentiles, who would scourge, and mock, and crucify which they say was Mary Magdalen's habitation; and then, descending a steep hill, you come to the fountain of the apostles, which is so called, because, as the tradition goes, these holy persons were wont to refresh themselves here, between Jerusalem and Jericho, as it is very probable they might, because the fountain is both close to the road-side, and is very inviting to the thirsty traveller.—Whitby's Alphabetical Table, Wells's Geography of the New Testament, and Maundrell's Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem.

^d Our Saviour's stay for two days after the message, and modest address of the two mournful sisters, kept them indeed a little longer in suspense and grief; but it showed his perfect wisdom and goodness, as it made the wonderful work more remarkable, and conducive to the fuller conviction of the spectators. Had he gone before Lazarus was dead, they might have attributed his recovery rather to the strength of nature than to Christ's miraculous power; or had he raised him as soon as he was dead, they might, peradventure, have thought it rather some trance or ecstasy, than a death or dissolution: but now, to raise a person, four days dead, offensive, and reduced to corruption, was a surprise of unutterable joy to his friends; removed all possible suspicion of confederacy; silenced the peevish evil-will, and triumphed over all the obstinacy of prejudice and infidelity.—Bishop Blackhall's Sermons.

^e In the course of the gospel, we find our Lord forewarning his disciples, no less than three times, of his approaching sufferings and resurrection. The first intimation of this kind was in the coasts of Casarea Philippi, when, after St Peter's confession of him to be 'the Christ, the Son of the living God, he began to show unto his disciples, how he must suffer many things,' &c., (Luke ix. 22.) The next we meet with was immediately after his transfiguration in the mount, when, as he came down thence, with the three apostles who were the companions of his privacies, he reminded them of what he had told them before, namely, 'that the Son of Man should be delivered into the hands of men,' (Luke ix. 44.) The third warning was that which he gave his apostles apart, when he was going to Jerusalem to suffer, or, as some rather think, when he was going to Bethany, in order to raise Lazarus from the dead: and it is observed of these several warnings, that they rise by degrees, and grow more full and distinct, in proportion as the things drew nearer. Thus, the first is delivered in general terms: 'the Son of Man must suffer many things, and be rejected, and slain, and raised the third day.' The second is enforced with this solemn preface, 'let these sayings sink down in your ears,' (Luke ix. 44.) And the third descends to a more particular description of that tragical scene: 'he shall be delivered to the Gentiles, and mocked, and spitefully entreated, and spitted on: and they shall scourge him, and put him to death, and the third day he shall rise again,' (Luke xviii. 32, 33.) Now, whether we consider the danger the apostles were in of being oppressed with an affliction so sensible as the death of their master; or the general mistake wherewith they were infected, concerning the splendour and worldly pomp of the Messiah's kingdom, or the scandal that would necessarily rise from a crucified Saviour, this method of forewarning his disciples of what was to come upon him, was highly requisite, to sustain them in their tribulation, to rectify their sentiments, and remove all offences; as it showed that his death was voluntary, consonant to the predictions of the prophets, and agreeable to the council and appointment of God, and the shame of his crucifixion abundantly recompensed by the glories of his resurrection.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. ii.

him; but that 'on the third day he would rise again.' Upon the mention of his resurrection, which they vainly imagined would be the beginning of his terrestrial greatness, James and John, by the mouth of their mother Salome, ^a requested of him, to have the first places in his kingdom. The first places in his kingdom, he told them, were to be disposed of according to the predetermination of his Father; but a proper qualification for them it was, to be able to take the greatest share of the bitter cup of his sufferings, ^b which very probably might be their fate; ^c and when the ambition of these two brothers provoked the indignation of the other ten apostles, he declared to them all, that his kingdom ^d was far different from those of this world, whose princes and governors strove to exercise their utmost power and dominion over their subjects: whereas, whoever expected to be great and chief among his followers, must be a servant to the rest, according to his own example, who came, not to take state upon him, but to serve others, and even to lay down his life for their redemption.

As he drew near to Jericho, attended with a numerous company, one Bartimeus, who had long sat by the wayside begging, hearing the noise of a vast crowd of people passing by, and being informed that Jesus of Nazareth was among them, with ^e another blind man who

^a This their mother might be encouraged to ask, upon the account of her near relation to the blessed Virgin, her constant accompanying our Saviour, and diligent attendance upon him; and might conceive some hopes of her sons' future exaltation, from the pompous name which our Lord had given them, and the great privilege to which he had admitted them, but excluded others, of attending him in his privacies.—Whitby's Annotations and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iv.

^b It was anciently the custom, at great entertainments, for the governor of the feast to appoint to each of his guests the kind and proportion of wine they were to drink, and what he had thus appointed them, it was thought a breach of good manners, either to refuse, or not to drink up. Hence a man's cup, both in sacred and profane authors, came to signify the portion, whether of good or evil, which befalls him in this world. Homer introduces Achilles, thus comforting Priamus for the loss of his son:

Two urns by Jove's high throne have ever stood,
The source of evil one, and one of good,
From thence the cup of mortal man he fills,
Blessings to those, to these distributes ills;
To taste he mingles both; the wretch decreed
To taste the bad unmix'd is curs'd indeed;
Pursued by wrongs, by meagre famine driv'n,
He wanders, outcast both of earth and heav'n.
The happiest taste not happiness sincere,
But find the cordial draught is dash'd with care.—Hæd xxiv.

Not unlike what we meet with in the psalmist, 'in the hand of the Lord there is a cup, and the wine is red; it is full mixed, and he poureth out of the same: as for the dregs thereof, all the ungodly of the earth shall drink them out,' (Ps. lxxv. 9, 10.) And what our Saviour means by the expression, we cannot be to seek, since, in two remarkable passages, (Luke xxii. 42, and John xviii. 11.) he has been his own interpreter; let hæd poculum bibere, or to taste of death, was a common phrase among the Jews, and from them we have reason to believe that our Lord borrowed it.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iv. and Whitby's Annotations.

^c This prediction was literally fulfilled in St James, who was put to death by Herod, and so, in the highest sense of the words, was made to drink of our Lord's cup; and, though St John was not brought to suffer martyrdom, yet his being scourged and imprisoned by the council at Jerusalem, (Acts v. 18. 40.) put into a caldron of burning oil at Ephesus, (Enseb. b. iii. c. 18,) and banished into Patmos, 'for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ,' (Rev. i. 9.) may well be supposed to be some part of that bitter cup which our Saviour drank; and that he, who underwent such torments, as nothing but a miracle could deliver him from, may, with very great justice, be esteemed a martyr.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iv.

^d The words in the text are, 'the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them; but it shall not be so among you; but, whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister, (Mat. xx. 25, 26,) and from hence some have inferred, that our Saviour forbids them who will be his disciples, or the subjects of his kingdom, the exercise of all civil and ecclesiastical dominion. But if it be considered, that civil government was, from the beginning of the world instituted by God, and therefore called his ordinance, (Rom. xiii. 2,) for the punishment of evil doers, and for the defence of those that do well; that Christianity, when it came into the world, made no alteration in things of this nature, but left the magistrate, after his conversion, still bearing the sword, in the same manner as he did before; and that the exercise of his power is a thing so sacred, as to entitle not only princes, but even their deputed ministers of justice, to the style of gods in scripture; it must needs be allowed, that what is reputed so honourable, and found so beneficial, so strict a bond of human virtue, and so firm a guard against all kinds of wickedness, can never be forbidden in any Christian commonwealth. And, in like manner, since among the gifts distributed for the use of the church, we read of 'governments,' (1 Cor. xii. 28,) and find mention made of 'those who are set over us in the Lord,' (1 Thes. v. 12,) to whom we must yield obedience, and submit ourselves, (Heb. xiii. 7, 17,) since we find that the apostles had the rod, (1 Cor. iv. 21,) and power given of the Lord, to 'deliver to Satan,' (1 Cor. v. 5,) and to 'revenge all disobedience,' (2 Cor. x. 6,) and since, in the nature of the thing, it is every whit as impossible for a church to subsist without ecclesiastical government, as it is for a state without civil, it must needs follow, that the one is necessary, and of divine institution, as much as the other. All, therefore, that our Saviour can be presumed to forbid in these words, is such a dominion, whether in church or state, as is attended with tyranny, oppression, and a contempt of the subjects that live under it. Such, for the most part, was the government that obtained in eastern countries; and therefore, in contraposition to this, our spiritual rulers are put in mind, that they 'feed the flock, which is among them, taking the oversight thereof, not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind, neither as being lords of God's inheritance, but examples to the flock,' (1 Pet. v. 2, 3,) that their highest station in the church is not so much a place of dignity, as a charge and office, which subjects them to the wants and necessities of those they rule over; and that the most honourable post they can have in Christ's kingdom, is only a larger ministry, and attendance upon others; for, 'who is Paul? who is Apollo? but ministers by whom ye believed,' (1 Cor. iii. 3.) 'For we preach not ourselves,' says the apostle to the Corinthians, 'but Christ Jesus the Lord, and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake,' (2 Cor. iv. 5.)—Whitby's and Beausobre's Annotations.

^e There is a considerable variation in the accounts of this miracle by the three evangelists. Mark and Luke notice only one blind man, Matthew two; Luke represents the miracle as performed 'when Jesus was drawing nigh to Jericho, before he entered it; Matthew and Mark, after he had left Jericho. The joint testimony, however, of Matthew and Mark, as to the time seems to outweigh that of Luke, who is not so observant of chronological order; and as all agree, that Christ was then attended by a 'multitude,' who 'led the way,' and who 'followed him' towards Jerusalem, it is more probable that the incident took place after he left Jericho, where this multitude seems to have been collected. For he came privately from Ephraim to Jericho, attended only by the twelve.—Hæd.—The minute discrepancies in this narrative, compared with those of Mark and Luke, involve no contradiction; since, though those evangelists mention one blind man as healed; and Mark and Luke in mentioning one might mean to point out that one who was the more known. Again, the apparent difference between Matthew and Mark, as compared with Luke, with regard to the place where the miracle was performed, may, it is thought, be removed by reading in Luke 'when, or while, Jesus was near Jericho.' If, however, the trifling discrepancies adverted to were really irreconcilable, still they would not weaken the credit of the evangelists, being such as are found in the best historians; nay, they may be rather begged along with him, called aloud upon Jesus to have mercy upon him. The people who accompanied our Lord, supposing that the man asked an alms, bade him cease his noise; but the benefit which he desired was of greater moment, and therefore he raised his voice, and, with more importunity, cried, 'thou son of David, have mercy upon me!' Which when our Lord perceived, he commanded both him and his companion to be brought before him; and, upon them declaring what favour they expected, he touched their eyes, and immediately they received their sight, and followed him, glorifying God, as indeed all the company did, who had been eye-witnesses of this miracle.

As our Lord was passing through Jericho, ^a a certain man, named Zaccheus, of great wealth and figure among the publicans, was not a little desirous to see him; but, as he was a man of a low stature, and could not gratify his curiosity in the crowd, he ran before, and climbed up into a sycamore tree, where he could not fail of having a full view of him. When our Saviour came near the place, he called him by his name, and bade him come down, because he intended to be his guest that day; whereupon Zaccheus received him with the greatest expressions of joy and respect, whilst others could not forbear reflecting upon him, for entering the house of a man of so scandalous a profession. But, notwithstanding all their censures, our Saviour, who from the intuition of his heart, as well as his own declaration, knew him to be a just and charitable man, pronounced him and his family in a state of salvation, and that he, though a publican, and an alien to the commonwealth of Israel, was nevertheless one of those to whom the promises ^b made unto Abraham did belong.

The nearer they came to Jerusalem, the more the disciples began to think that their master had taken that journey to the passover, on purpose to seat himself upon his throne, and assume his regal authority; and therefore, to cure their minds of all such thoughts, he propounded a parable ^c to them, 'of a certain great man, born heir to

^a For an account of Jericho, see note b, p. 363.—Ed.

^b Though some commentators, with our author, are of opinion that Zaccheus was a Gentile. Yet with Scott, Boothroyd, Doddridge, and others, we are disposed to conclude that he was a Jew; and the passage, Luke xix. 9, which has given rise to the doubt, seems judiciously explained by Scott, as follows:—"Jesus, knowing the sincerity and humility of his professed subjection to the gospel, declared, 'that salvation was that day come to his house,' he and his family had before been estranged from it, but it was now come thither for the benefit of all belonging to it; 'for so much as he also was a son of Abraham,' not only according to the flesh, but as being now made partaker of Abraham's faith and privileges, and the promises made to him and his seed.—Ed.

^c This parable, we may observe, consists of two parts. The former of which is contained in Luke xix. 12, 14, 15—27, and relates to the rebellious subjects of this prince, who 'went into a far country to receive a kingdom;' the latter is included in the 13th, 15th, and so on to the 27th verse, and relates to this prince's servants, to whom he had committed his money for them to improve in his absence; and the explication of the whole is generally supposed to be this:—The nobleman or prince here is our Lord himself, the eternal Son of God; his going into a far country to receive a kingdom, is his ascension into heaven, to sit down at the right hand of the Divine Majesty, and take possession of his mediatorial kingdom; his servants may be either his apostles and disciples, who, upon his return, were to give an account of the progress of his gospel, or Christians in general, and going into a far country to take possession of it; but before he departed, calling his servants together, and giving each a sum of money to trade withal, until he should return. The reason of his journey to this foreign land was, because his own countrymen, over whom he had a right to reign, were obstinately set against him, and disclaimed him for their king. When therefore he had obtained his new kingdom, and was returned home, he first called his servants, with whom he had intrusted his money, to an account, rewarding the diligent with gifts proportionate to their improvements, and punishing the negligent with perpetual imprisonment; and then taking cognizance of his countrymen, who, upon his going to be enthroned in another kingdom, disclaimed all obedience to him, he ordered them, in his presence, to be put to death as so many rebels; intimating hereby both the punishment of negligent Christians, and the destruction of the continuacious Jews.

By the time that our Lord arrived at Bethany, Lazarus had now been four days dead ^d and buried; and several friends and others from Jerusalem, were come to condole with the two sisters, ^e Martha and who, for every talent, whether natural or acquired, are accountable. His citizens are, questionless, the Jews, who not only rejected him with scorn, but put him to an ignominious death; and his return is the day of his fierce wrath and vengeance upon the Jewish nation, which came upon them about forty years after this time, and was indeed so very terrible, as to be a kind of emblem and representation of that great day of accounts, when he will render 'to every one according to his works.' It is observable, however, by some commentators farther, that our Lord took the rise of this parable from the custom of the kings of Judea, such as Herod the Great, and Archelaus his son, who usually went to Rome to receive their kingdom from Cæsar, without whose permission and appointment they durst not take the government into their hands. In the case of Archelaus, indeed, the resemblance is so great, that almost every circumstance of the parable concurs in him. He was this εργατής, or man of great parentage, as being the son of Herod the Great. He was obliged to go into a far country, that is, to Rome, to receive his kingdom of the emperor Augustus. The Jews, who hated him because of his cruel and tyrannical reign, sent their messengers after him, desiring to be freed from the yoke of kings, and reduced to a province of Rome. Their complaint, however, was not heard. He was confirmed in the kingdom of Judea; and, when he returned home, tyrannized for ten years over those that would have shook off his dominion. But then there is this remarkable difference between his case and that in the parable, that the Jews, upon their second complaint to Cæsar, prevailed against him, and procured his banishment to Vienna.—Cabnet's Commentary, and Beausobre's and Whitby's Annotations.

^d It was customary among the Jews, as Dr Lightfoot tells us from Maimonides, and others, to go to the sepulchres of their deceased friends, and visit them for three days: for so long they suppose that their spirits hovered about them. But when once they perceived that their visage began to change, as it would in three days in these countries, all hopes of a return to life were then at an end. After a revolution of humours, which in seventy-two hours is completed, their bodies tend naturally to putrefaction; and therefore Martha had reason to say that her brother's body, which appears by the context to have been laid in the sepulchre the same day that he died, would now in the fourth day begin to stink.—Whitby's and Hammond's Annotations.

^e The time of mourning for departed friends was anciently, among the Jews, of longer continuance. For Jacob they mourned forty days, (Gen. 1. 3.) and for Aaron and Moses thirty, (Num. xx. 29. and Deut. xxxiv. 8.) For persons of an inferior quality the days very probably were fewer, but some they had for all, and the general term, both among the Jews and

Mary, for the loss of their brother. Upon the first news of our Lord's approach, the two sisters, attended with some of the company that was in the house, went out to meet him; and, pouring out a flood of tears for the loss of their dear brother, fell prostrate at his feet, and wished, over and over again, that he had come a little sooner; for then they were certain that he would not have died. The sight of their tears and sorrow, accompanied with the lamentations of their followers, affected the Son of God so that he groaned within himself; and then demanding where they had laid the body, ^a he followed them to the place, sympathizing with their sorrow, and weeping as well as they, which made some of the company remark how well he loved, and others wonder why he did not prevent his death. ^b When he was come to the grave, ^c and had ordered the stone to be removed from it, after a short address of adoration and thanksgiving to his Father for his readiness to hear him, ^d he cried with a loud voice, 'Lazarus, come forth;' ^e whereupon he that was dead immediately arose from his bed of darkness, and in such sound health, that when his grave-clothes were unloosed, he was able to walk along with them to Bethany.

This great and apparent miracle caused the utmost surprise and astonishment among all the spectators, and the greatest part of them was, from that time, convinced, and believed on him; but others, more obstinate, went and reported the thing to the Pharisees at Jerusalem, who thereupon called together their sanhedrim, where, after some solemn debate, it was concluded, 'that whether the man was a prophet sent from God or not, for fear of giving any umbrage to the Roman powers, ^f

Gentiles, was seven; for so Ovid brings in Orpheus lamenting the death of his wife: "Yet for seven days he sat squalid on the bank, without the gift of Ceres; anxiety and grief of mind, and tears, were his food."—Metam. b. x.—An expression not unlike that in the royal psalmist, 'my tears have been my meat day and night.' (Ps. xlii. 3.) During this time their neighbours and friends came to visit them, and to alleviate their sorrows with the best arguments they could. They pray with them; they read with them the forty-ninth psalm: pray for the soul of the dead, and distribute their comforts in proportion to their loss; but nobody opened his mouth until the afflicted person had first spoken, because Job's three friends, who came to comfort him, we find did the same (Job ii. 13.) All which ceremonies made the concourse to Martha's house at this time the greater, and gave more Jews an opportunity to be the eye-witnesses of her brother's resurrection.—Pool's and Beausobre's Annotations, and Basnage's History of the Jews, b. v. c. 23.

^a Our Saviour could not look on the affliction of the two sisters and their friends without having a share in it. Besides he groaned deeply, being grieved to find that his friends entertained a suspicion of his loving them less than their great love to him might claim; 'and was troubled.' In the Greek it is he troubled himself, εταραξεν αυτον, he allowed himself to be angry at the malice of the devil, who had introduced sin into the world, and thereby made such havoc of the human kind. But to keep them no longer in suspense, he asked where they had buried Lazarus, that he might go to the grave, and give them immediate relief, by bringing him to life again. On this occasion it appeared that Jesus was possessed of a delicate sensibility of human passions. For when he beheld Martha and Mary, and their companions around him all in tears, the tender feelings of love, and pity, and friendship, moved him to such a degree, that he wept as he went along, (John xi. 34.) 'And said, Where have ye laid him? they say unto him, Lord, come and see. (35.) Jesus wept.' In this grief of the Son of God, there was a greatness and generosity, not to say an amiableness of disposition, infinitely nobler than that which the stoic philosophers aimed at in their so much boasted apathy.—Macknight's Harmony.—Ed.

^b The words in the text are, 'some of them said, Could not this man, who opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that even this man should not have died?' (John xi. 37.) which some imagine were spoken only in admiration, that having given sight to a blind man that was a mere stranger to him, he did not cure his sick friend. But others conceive a vile sarcasm in the words, as if they went about to weaken his reputation, in a miracle wherein he had manifestly shown his divine power, because he did not preserve his friend from dying.—Pool's Annotations.

^c In the 23d chapter of Genesis, we have the earliest notice of the practice, which was formerly very prevalent in the east, of depositing the dead in natural or artificial caves, great numbers of which are still to be found in Palestine, Syria, Egypt, and Persia. In the mountainous country of southern Palestine there are abundance of natural caves in the rocks, which might easily be formed into commodious sepulchral vaults; and where such natural caves were wanting, sepulchres were hewn in the rock for such families as were able to incur the necessary expense; for this was the mode of sepulture decidedly preferred by those who could obtain it. The arrangement and extent of these caves varied with circumstances. Those in the declivity of a mountain were often cut in horizontally; but to others there was usually a descent by steps from the surface. The roofs of the vaults are commonly arched; and sometimes, in the more spacious vaults, supported by colonnades. These rocky chambers are generally spacious, being obviously family vaults, intended to receive several dead bodies. Niches, about six or seven feet deep, are usually cut in the sides of the vault, each adapted to receive a single corpse; but in some vaults small rooms are cut in the same manner; and in others, stone slabs of the same length are fixed horizontally against the walls, or cut out of the rock, one above another, serving as shelves on which the corpses were deposited; in others, however, the floor itself is excavated for the reception of the dead, in compartments of various depths, and in the shape of a coffin. Some of the bodies were placed in stone coffins, provided with sculptured lids; but such sarcophagi were by no means in general use; the bodies, when wound up in the grave-clothes, being usually deposited without any sort of coffin or sarcophagus. The vaults are always dark, the only opening being the narrow entrance, which is usually closed by a large stone rolled to its mouth; although some of a superior description are shut by stone doors, hung in the same manner as the doors of houses, by pivots turning in holes in the architrave above and in the threshold below.—Pictorial Bible.—Ed.

^d As our blessed Saviour, in virtue of his union with God the Father, had naturally, and in himself, a power of working miracles, there was no need for his addressing himself to heaven every time that he did any; however, upon this and some other occasions, we find him praying to God under the title of his Father, that all the company might know, that what he did was by a divine, not a diabolical power, and that God, in granting his petition, acknowledged him to be his Son.—Beausobre's Annotations.

^e The form of the Jewish sepulchre already described suggests an easy solution of a difficulty in the resurrection of Lazarus. The sacred historian states, that when our Lord cried with a loud voice, 'Lazarus come forth, he that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave-clothes.' Upon this circumstance, the enemies of revelation seize with avidity, and demand with an air of triumph, how he should come out of a grave, who was bound hand and foot with grave-clothes? But the answer is easy: the evangelist does not mean that Lazarus walked out of the sepulchre, but only that he sat up, then putting his legs over the edge of his niche or cell, slid down and stood upright upon the floor; all which he might easily do, notwithstanding his arms were bound close to his body, and his legs were tied strait together, by means of the shroud and rollers with which he was swathed. Hence, when he was come forth, Jesus ordered his relations to loose him and let him go; a circumstance plainly importing the historian's admission that Lazarus could not walk till he was unbound.—Paxton's Illustrations, vol. iii. pp. 268, 269.—Ed.

^f The Jews, seeing the miracles which Jesus did, this especially of raising Lazarus, did greatly fear, lest, taking upon him the public character of the Messiah, he would attempt to make himself king, and by the admiration which he had gained among

it was highly expedient that he should die, rather than that the whole nation, for his sake, should incur the danger of being ruined: and from that time they entered into a combination to have him apprehended and put to death; but, as 'his hour was not yet come,' at present he declined their fury, by retreating from the public, and retiring to a little place, called Ephraim, ^a in the tribe of Benjamin, where he continued, for a few days, with his apostles, until the time of the passover was approaching.

Six days before that solemn feast began, our Lord, in his way to Jerusalem, called at Bethany, where he was kindly entertained at supper ^b by the two sisters of Lazarus, Martha and Mary. Martha, according to her custom, dressed the supper, but Lazarus, whom he had raised, was one of the company that sat at table with him, while Mary, to express her love and bounty, took a vial of the most valuable essence, made of spikenard, ^c the people, he quickly enabled to accomplish his ends, unless he was timely prevented. If then he was permitted to go on in his pretensions, the consequence seemed visible to them, that the Romans, to whom they were already subject, would look upon this as a rebellion, and so he provoked to come with an army and destroy them utterly. That this was their fear, is evident from the many groundless objections which they made against our Saviour, as that, he forbade to give tribute to Cæsar, and that he made himself a king, and so opposed the title of Tiberius. Not that they desired the continuance of Cæsar's dominion over them, but the apprehension of a still farther conquest from the Romans, made them unwilling to provoke them, and that more especially because they had an ancient tradition, that one Armolus, which is, by an easy change, Romulus, before the end of the world, would come and destroy them. This seems to be but the deprivation of some prophecy from God, which foretold the coming of the Romans in the last days, meaning thereby the days of the Messiah, to destroy them. It demonstrates, however, that they both believed and expected, that the Romans were the people, from whom the change of their religion, and the total subversion of their government, were to come; and for this reason they were, upon all occasions, so very fearful to offend them. But herein they were sadly mistaken: for the prophecy of the Romans coming to destroy their temple and nation was fulfilled, not by their letting Christ alone, or believing in him, but by their thus opposing and conspiring against him.—Hammond's Annotations.

^a It was situated between Bethel and Jericho, about twenty miles to the north of Jerusalem.—Josephus on the Jewish War, b. v. c. 8.

^b Some interpreters are of opinion, that this was the same supper which our Saviour was invited to in the house of Simon the leper; that St John has related it in its proper place, as a thing which happened six days before the passover; but that the other evangelists have mentioned it, by way of recapitulation, to show what might be the probable occasion of Judas's treachery, even his vexation for being disappointed of the money that might have been made of this precious ointment, had it been sold and put into the bag for him to purloin. But others suppose that this supper was different from that which is mentioned, (Mat. xxvi. 6. and Mark xiv. 3.) 1st. Because this was in the house of Lazarus, (John xii. 2.) that in the house of Simon the leper, (Mat. xxvi. 6.) 2dly. Here Mary anoints the feet of Christ, (John xii. 3.) there a woman not named pours ointment on his head, (Mat. xxvi. 7.) 3dly. This supper was six days before the passover, (John xii. 1.) that only two, (Mat. xxvi. 2. Mark xiv. 1.) and if the suppers were not the same, the Mary that anointed Christ's feet here, and the woman that anointed his head there, were not the same.—Calmet's Commentary; Beausobre's and Whitby's Annotations.

^c The spikenard (Heb. נרד nard) is a plant belonging to the order of gramina, and is of different species. In India, whence the best sort comes, it grows as common grass, in large tufts close to each other, in general from three to four feet in length. So strong is its aroma, which resides principally in the husky and, pouring it upon his feet, anointed them, and wiped them with her hair, so that the whole house was filled with the fragrantcy of its perfume. This action Judas Iscariot, who afterwards betrayed his Master, and had, at that time, the custody of the bag, wherein money, for charitable and other necessary uses, was kept, highly blamed, as a piece of prodigality, in throwing away what might have been sold for three hundred pence, ^d and given to the poor; not that he valued the poor, but because he was a greedy wretch, who was always purloining some part of the public money to himself. Our Saviour, therefore, who knew the sincerity of Mary's and the naughtiness of Judas's heart, in a very gentle reply, commended what she had done, as a seasonable ceremony ^e to solemnize his approaching death; but blamed the other's pretended concern for the poor, since objects of this kind they had always with them, but his continuance among them was not to be long. While they were sitting at this supper, great numbers of Jews, out of curiosity, came to Bethany, not only to have a sight of Jesus, but of Lazarus likewise, whom he had raised from the dead; but, when the sanhedrim understood that the resurrection of Lazarus occasioned many people to believe on Jesus, ^f they consulted how to destroy him likewise.

roots, that when trodden upon, or otherwise bruised, the air is filled with its fragrance. Dr Blane, who planted some of the roots in his garden, at Lueknou, states, that in the rainy season it shot up spikes about six feet high. This plant was highly valued among the ancients, both as an article of luxury, and as a medicine. The Unguentum Nardinum, or ointment manufactured from the nard, was the favourite perfume used at the ancient baths and feasts; and it appears from a passage in Horace, that it was so valuable, that so much of it as could be contained in a small box of precious stone was considered a sort of equivalent for a large vessel of wine; and a handsome quota for a guest to contribute to an entertainment, according to the custom of antiquity. In Mark xiv. 3. it is said that there came 'a woman, having an alabaster box of ointment of spikenard, very precious; and she brake the box and poured it on his [Christ's] head.' In verse 5, this is said to have been worth more than three hundred pence, denarii; and John (ch. xii. 3.) mentions 'a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly;'—the house was filled with the odour of the ointment;—it was worth three hundred pence, denarii. As this evangelist has determined the quantity, says Mr Taylor, '—a pound—and the lowest value (for Mark says more) was eight pounds fifteen shillings, we may safely suppose that this was not a Syrian production, or made from any fragrant grass growing in the neighbouring districts; but was a true oar of Indian spikenard, 'very costly.' In the answer of our Lord on this occasion, there seems also to be some allusion to the remoteness of the country whence this unguent was brought, 'Where-soever this gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done, shall be spoken of for a memorial of her,' (Mark xiv. 9.) As much as to say, 'This unguent came from a distant country, to be sure, but the gospel shall spread to a much greater distance, yea, all over the world; so that in India itself, whence this composition came, shall the memorial of its application to my sacred person be mentioned with honour.' The idea of a far country, connected with the ointment, seems to have suggested that of 'all the world.'—Calmet's Dictionary, p. 836.—Ed.

^d As the Roman penny was sevenpence halfpenny of our money, so three hundred pence must amount to nine pounds seven shillings and sixpence.

^e It was a custom in these eastern countries, for kings and great persons, to have their bodies at their funerals embalmed with odours and sweet perfumes; and, in allusion hereunto, our Saviour here declares of Mary, that she, to testify her faith in him, as her King and Lord, had, as it were beforehand, embalmed his body with precious ointment for his burial.

In the mean time, Jesus, having tarried all night at Bethany, set forward next morning with his disciples, and others attending him on his way to Jerusalem. When he came to a place called Bethphage, a on the side of mount Olive, b he sent two of his disciples into the village to bring from thence an ass, and her colt, c which was not yet backed, that, to accomplish a remarkable prophecy, d he might ride thereon to Jerusalem. e The dis-

this; for admitted that Christ had broke the sabbath, and spoken blasphemy, yet what had Lazarus done? No crime was ever alleged against him; and yet these rulers of the people conspire to put him to death, merely to preserve their own honour, and reputation. But see the providence of God, which notwithstanding all their contrivances, was pleased to preserve him, as a monument of his glory, and a testimony of the miracle which Jesus performed on him, thirty years after our Saviour's death.—Pool's and Whitby's Annotations; and Taylor's Life of Christ.

a Bethphage signifies the house of figs or dates, and might very probably have its name from the several trees of these kinds that grew there. It was a small village of the priests, situate on mount Olivet, and, as it seems, somewhat nearer Jerusalem than Bethany.—Beausobre's Annotations, and Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

b This place, doubtless, had its name from the great number of olive trees that grew upon it. It lay a little without Jerusalem, on the east side of it, about five furlongs from the city, says Josephus; but he must be understood of the very nearest part of it, since St Luke makes the distance to be a sabbath-day's journey, that is, eight furlongs, or a mile, unless we suppose, that he means the summit of the hill, from which our Saviour ascended, (Acts i. 12.) Mr Maundrell tells us, "that he and his company going out of Jerusalem at St Stephen's gate, and crossing the valley of Jehosaphat, began immediately to ascend the mountain; that, being got above two-thirds of the way up, they came to certain grottos, cut with intricate windings and caverns under ground, which were called the 'sepulchres of the prophets;' that a little higher up were twelve arched vaults under ground, standing side by side, and built in memory of the apostles, who are said to have compiled their creed in this place; that, sixty paces higher, they came to the place where Christ is said to have uttered his prophecy concerning the final destruction of Jerusalem; and, a little on the right hand, to another, where he is said to have dictated a second time the Lord's prayer to his disciples; that, somewhat higher, is the cave of a saint, called Pelagia; a little above that, a pillar, denoting the place where an angel gave the blessed virgin three days' warning of her death; and, at the top of all, the place of our blessed Lord's ascension.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

c It is well remarked by Grotius, that such animals as were never employed in the service of men, were wont to be chosen for sacred purposes, insomuch, that the very heathens thought those things and sacrifices most proper for the service of their gods, which had never been put to profane uses. Thus the Philistines returned the ark in a new cart, drawn by heifers that had never before undergone the yoke, (1 Sam. vi. 7,) and thus Apollo's priest admonished Æneas: "let one be enjoined, from the select herd to take seven heifers," (Æn. vi.) But the chief design that our Saviour might have, in the orders which he gave to his disciples, was, that the prophecy might, by this means, receive its full completion: 'tell ye the daughter of Zion, behold thy king cometh unto thee, meek, and sitting upon an ass, and a colt, the foal of an ass.' The former part of the verse is taken from Is. liii. 11, and the latter from Zech. ix. 9. Both by the Jews are acknowledged to relate to the Messiah; and with regard to the latter, R. Joseph was wont to say, "May the Messiah come, and may I be worthy to sit under the shadow of the tail of his ass!"—Whitby's Annotations, and Surenhusii Concil. in loc. ex F. T. apud Matthæum.

d A great contest there is among learned men, whether our Lord rode upon the ass or the colt, or on both alternately. Those who contend for his riding upon both, observe from the words of the prophet Zechariah, (chap. ix. 9.) that mention is made of riding both 'upon an ass, and a colt, the foal of an ass:'

principles e did as they were ordered: and, having mounted their master on the colt, he proceeded as it were in triumph, towards the city, amidst the loud acclamations of an innumerable multitude, whilst crowds of people came forth to meet him with branches f of palm-trees in their hands, some spreading their garments g in the way, others cutting down branches, and strewing them where he was

and from St Matthew, (chap. xxi. 7.) they observe further, that the disciples having brought the ass and the colt which our Saviour had sent them for, 'put on them their clothes, and set him thereon.' Since, therefore, the relation of St Matthew thus literally agrees with the prophecy of Zechariah, and both expressly assert, that our Saviour did ride upon the ass as well as the colt, they see no reason why these texts should not be taken in their most plain and obvious meaning, and do hence infer, that, for the more exact fulfilling of the prophecy, our Saviour did actually ride part of the way upon the one, and the remaining part upon the other. The generality of interpreters, however, are against this. They suppose, that, as there was no occasion for our Saviour's riding upon both in so short a journey, and as the other three evangelists only make mention of the colt, there seems to be a necessity for admitting of the figure called enallage numeri in this place; and that, as when we read, that 'the ark rested upon the mountains of Ararat,' (Gen. viii. 4.) we understand only upon one of them; so here, when St Matthew tells us, that the disciples brought 'the ass and the colt, and put their clothes on them,' by ἵκανα ὑἱῶν, he must necessarily mean, ἵκανα ἰνὸς ὑἱῶν, 'upon one of them,' that is, the colt, as the words of the prophecy itself will fairly bear: nor was there any other reason for bringing the mother along with it, but that foals will not usually go without their dams.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament, part i. and Surenhusii Concil. in loca ex F. T. apud Matthæum.

e Very remarkable is our Saviour's presence, even as to the most minute matters, in the orders which he gives his disciples, namely, 1. You shall find a colt; 2. On which no man ever sat; 3. Bound with his mother; 4. In bivio, or where two ways meet; 5. As you enter into the village; 6. The owners of which will, at first, seem unwilling that you should unbind him; 7. But when they hear that I have need of him they will let him go. And no less remarkable is the cheerful obedience of these disciples to a command, which carnal reasoning might have started many objections against, and which nothing less than a steadfast persuasion, that he who sent the message would be sure to give success to it, could have prevailed upon them to execute, as they did, without any demur or delay.—Whitby's Annotations, and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. i.

f At the feast of tabernacles, it was a custom among the Jews, not only to sing hosannas with the greatest joy, but also to carry palm-branches in their hands, (Lev. xxiii. 40.) and to desire, as the Jews still wish at the celebration of this feast, that they may rejoice in this manner at the coming of the Messiah. Nor was it only at this festival, but upon any other occasion of solemn rejoicing, that the Jews made use of this ceremony: for we find, that, upon the enemy's evacuating the tower of Jerusalem, Simon and his men 'entered into it, with thanksgiving, and branches of palm-trees, and with harps and cymbals, and with viols, and hymns, and songs,' (1 Mac. xiii. 51.) Nay, the very same manner of expressing their joy prevailed among other nations, as well as the Jews: for so Herodotus relates, that they who went before Xerxes, as he passed over the Hellespont, strewed the way with myrtle-branches: and therefore we need less wonder that we find such of the company as were by our blessed Saviour's miracles convinced of his being their king, and the promised Messiah, testifying their joy upon this his inauguration into his kingdom, in such a manner as they, as well as other nations, upon such joyful occasions were accustomed to.—Whitby's Annotations, and Surenhusii Concil. ex F. T. apud Matthæum.

g It was a common practice among the people in the east, upon the approach of their kings and princes, to spread their vestments upon the ground, for them to tread or ride over. In conformity to which custom, we find the captains, when they proclaimed Jehu King, putting their garments under him, (2 Kings ix. 13.) and Plutarch relating that when Cato left his soldiers to return to Rome, they spread their clothes in the way to pass, ^a and all, as it were with one voice, crying, ^b ‘ Hosanna to the Son of David! Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord! Hosanna in the highest.’

In this triumphant manner they advanced till they came to the descent of mount ^c Olivet, when the whole body of disciples, being transported with the honours shown to their master, broke out into raptures of thanksgivings and loud doxologies to God for all the mighty works which they had seen; while the whole body of the people, as well those that went before as those that followed after, joined with the disciples in their hosannas and acclamations; so that when some Pharisees, being envious of his glory, desired him to command their silence, ‘ if they should be silent,’ he told them, ^d ‘ the very stones would proclaim his praise.’

But, notwithstanding all this glorious procession, as he advanced nearer to Jerusalem, so as to have a full which was an honour, as he observes, then done to few emperors. But the Jews that accompanied our Saviour at this time looked upon him as greater than any emperor; as a prince that was come to rescue them from the Roman yoke, and reduce all nations under their subjection; and therefore in this manner they chose to testify their homage and veneration of their universal monarch, making now a public entry into his capital of Jerusalem.—Whitby's Annotations.

^a It was usual in the east to strew flowers and branches of trees in the way of conquerors and great princes. So we find that those who esteemed Christ to be the Messiah, and their king, acted towards him. A similar instance may be found in Herodotus, (vii. p. 404.) He informs us that people went before Xerxes, passing over the Hellespont, and burned all manner of perfumes on the bridges, and strewed the way with myrtles. Boughs and hymns were usual among the Grecians on any time of festivity. Nero had flowers strewed before him upon his return from the Grecian games.—Tacitus Ann., Appendix by Murphy, b. 16, 12.—Suetonius, p. 25.—See Adami Observat. p. 150.—Alzano Obs. vol. ii. p. 420.—*J. ^b Hosanna, or rather hosa-na, is a Hebrew word, which signifies, save, I beseech thee, and was a common acclamation, which the Jews used in their feast of tabernacles, not only in remembrance of their past deliverance from Egypt, but in hopes likewise of a future one, by the coming of the Messiah. Now, the reason why the acclamations upon this occasion ran rather in these words than in the common form of ‘ long live the king,’ or the like, was because in the character which the prophet gives of the Messiah, he is called a ‘ Saviour,’ or ‘ one bringing salvation to them.’ (Zech. ix. 9.) And therefore, to show the excellency of this above all other kings, the people address him in words taken from the psalmist, ‘ Help us now, O Lord, send us now prosperity.’ (Ps. cxviii. 25.) But because hosanna is likewise a form of blessing, and, in the inauguration of princes, people are always pleased with the rightful succession; therefore they adjoin ‘ hosanna to the Son of David,’ that is, the Lord prosper and heap favours and blessings upon him. Now, because God had promised the Jewish nation a king descended from that royal line, therefore they continue their good wishes, ‘ blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord;’ and because again it is natural for men, in such transports, to reiterate their joyful acclamations, even as if they desired to make them reach heaven as well as earth, therefore it is added, ‘ hosanna in the highest.’—Hammond's and Beausobre's Annotations, and Surenhusii Concil. ex P. T. apud Mathan.

^c Between this mount and the city of Jerusalem there lay nothing but only the valley of Jehosaphat, through which ran the brook Kedron.—Calmet's Commentary.

^d This is a proverbial expression, and signifies no more than that God was determined to glorify our Saviour that day; and therefore, if these his followers should be prevailed upon to hold their peace, and say nothing in his praise, God would find out some other means, though not so competent perhaps, to make it effectually be known.—Beausobre's and Whitby's Annotations.

view of the city and temple, he paused and looked steadfastly on the city, and then, with tears in his eyes, ^e made this lamentation over it: ‘ Oh! that thou hadst known, at least in this thy appointed day, the things conducing to thy peace; but now, alas! they are hidden from thine eyes. For the fatal time shall come, when thy enemies ^f shall throw up trenches about thee, hem thee in on every side, destroy thy children, demolish thee, and ^g not leave in thee one stone upon another, because thou wouldst not know the time of thy visitation.’ ^h

¹ At a former passover, when the people, in admiration of our Saviour's miracles, would have paid him kingly honours, he withdrew, and refused that unseasonable testimony of their zeal, because the accompanying these honours then would have been liable to misrepresentation, and might have obstructed the efficacy of his preaching. But now that the course of his prophetic office was finished, and the time of his leaving the world and returning to his Father so near at hand, he thought it not amiss to accept of their readiness to acknowledge and proclaim his royal dignity, and himself to go up to Jerusalem in a more public manner than usual, that thereby he might exasperate his blood-thirsty enemies, and so draw on his intended passion.

^e The tears which our Saviour shed upon this occasion were such as proceeded from a profound charity and deep commiseration of the evils that were coming upon Jerusalem, in both which virtues he came to be an example to us; and therefore his behaviour in this respect could not be unworthy of himself. They farther show that the calamities which befell that impious city might have been avoided, had they made a right use of the time of their visitation; otherwise his tears may rather be looked upon as the tears of a crocodile than those of true charity and commiseration.—Whitby's Annotations.

^f How exactly this prediction was fulfilled by the Romans we may learn by the Jewish historian, who not only tells us that in this very mount Olivet, where our Lord spake these words, the Romans first pitched their tents, when they came to the final overthrow of Jerusalem; but that, when Vespasian began the siege of it, he encompassed the city round about, and kept them in on every side; that to this purpose, how impracticable soever the enterprise might seem, Titus prevailed with the soldiers to build a wall of thirty-nine furlongs, quite round the city, with thirteen turrets in it, which, to the wonder of the world, was completed in three days; and that, when this was done, all possibility of escaping was cut off, and the greatest distress that ever befell a city ensued, whereof that author gives a very lively but most dolorous account. (Joseph. War. b. vi. c. 13, &c.)

^g How exactly this was likewise fulfilled, the same historian relates, namely, that Titus, having ordered the soldiers to lay the city level with the ground, and to leave nothing standing but three of the most famous turrets, that overtopped the rest, as monuments to posterity of the Romans' power and conduct in taking the place, his orders were so punctually executed, and all the rest laid so flat, that the place looked as if it had never been inhabited. (Joseph. War. b. vii. c. 18.)

^h The word visitation may be taken either in a good or bad sense, for either the mercies or judgments of God; but here it denotes the former, and particularly the dispensation of the gospel, first by the ministry of John, then by the preaching of Christ himself, and afterwards by the labours of his apostles and disciples.—Beausobre's and Pool's Annotations.

To exasperate his enemies, indeed, a more pompous appearance might have been more conducive and more agreeable to his regal dignity; but in this our Saviour was not left to his own option. Since the prophet so long before had prescribed the form of his entry into Jerusalem, as a characteristic of his being the true Messiah, there could be no deviating from it, even though he could have procured his numerous guards and triumphal chariots, splendid attendants, and other ensigns of royalty, to adorn the day of his inauguration. ¹ 'Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Sion, shout, O daughter of Jerusalem, behold thy king cometh unto thee! He is just, and having salvation, lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt, the foal of an ass.' This is the prophecy whereby our Saviour was directed at this time, in his approach to Jerusalem; and, to justify his conduct in this particular, it may not be amiss to inquire a little into the true reason of it.

To this purpose we may observe, with a learned prelate ² of our own, that the law which God gave to the kings of Israel, whenever there should be any, ³ not to multiply horses to themselves, was founded upon a special promise, that he would continue to be, as he had all along been, ⁴ their defence against their enemies; that this was a law wherein every prince that was to succeed to the government of Israel was concerned, and designed for a standing trial, both of prince and people, whether they had trust and confidence in God; that, while this law was observed, the troops of Israel were victorious, and though few in number, and seemingly unfit for action, proved an overmatch for royal armies; that, when it came to be laid aside, and kings, as they declined in their confidence towards God, began to multiply their horses and chariots of war, they soon sunk in their military successes, till at length the whole land was carried away captive: and therefore, ⁵ 'woe unto them,' says the prophet, 'that stay on horses, and trust in chariots, because they are many, and in horsemen, because they are strong, but look not unto the Holy One of Israel, neither seek the Lord.'

Now, to apply this to the prophecy before us. Since the kings of Israel were obliged to renounce the assistance of horses and horsemen, and to depend on God for success in the day of battle; and since those who did so were their nation's deliverers, and those that did otherwise were destroyers of it, under which of these capacities, think we, should the king, whom God promised to the daughter of Jerusalem, come? should he appear, as some of the late kings of Israel did, in all the pomp and pride of war, surrounded with horses and chariots, in direct opposition to the law of God? Or should he appear, like some of the ancient worthies, ⁶ 'who by faith subdued kingdoms, and out of weakness were made strong?' Kings who feared God, and therefore feared no enemy; and who, though mounted on asses, were able to put to flight the thousands and ten thousands of chariots and horses that came against them? To resolve us in this inquiry, the prophet himself comes in to our aid; for immediately after his description of the promised king, he adds, ⁷ 'and I will cut off the chariot from Ephraim, and the horse from Jerusalem;' plainly showing that the character given of the Messiah, namely, that he should ride on an ass, was in opposition to the pride of their warlike kings, who, by their strength in chariots and horses, had ruined themselves and their people.⁸

Thus necessary it was for the promised Messiah, and for our Saviour, consequently, who came in that character, to approach the daughter of Zion, riding on an ass, even though it were a creature more despicable than we imagine it. But, after all, it is mere prejudice, and too fond an attachment to the manners and customs of our own country, that make us conceive any thing contemptible in an ass, or any thing ridiculous or inconsistent with the gravity and dignity of our blessed Saviour in riding upon one. For ⁹ if we look into other countries, particularly into Judea, we shall find persons of the highest distinction usually so mounted. We shall find ¹⁰ the chief governors of Israel, described in the song of Deborah, as riding on white asses; and ¹¹ the thirty sons of Jair, who was judge and prince of the country for two and twenty years, riding upon as many asses, and commanding in thirty cities. Nay, we shall find Absalom, though in other respects ¹² a man of pomp, in the very day of battle, mounted on a mule, the colt of an ass; and, on his coronation-day, Solomon provided with no better equipage. And therefore we can never account it any reproach for the meek and humble Jesus to ride into Jerusalem on the foal of an ass, when David, the greatest of his ancestors, and Solomon, the wisest, as long as he was wise, rode in the same manner.

a That the prophecy of Zechariah chap. ix. 9, is twice explained in the Messiah in the Talmud, few of the latter Jews disagree. One that is of the greatest authority with them, saith, it is impossible to expound this text of any other than the Messiah; and they that would divide it, between Messias the son of David, and Messias the son of Joseph, which is a late hypothesis to answer the two comings of the same Christ, at the same time acknowledge, that the true Messias is here prophesied of. Let them fancy what they will, the Jews in Jesus Christ's time knew but of one Messias, and to him they applied this text. For Jesus going up to Jerusalem upon an ass, at his last passover, to ease and defend himself from the crowd that followed upon the sight of his works, and the fame of Lazarus whom he had newly raised from the dead; the people were struck with this circumstance of his entry, which, however accidental it was, made them straight conclude he must be the Messias. Their actions and exclamations are ample proof of their sentiments. For what did they hereupon? 'Great multitudes spread their garments, and palm-branches in the way,' as at the reception of some great prince; 'before and behind they cried out, hosanna to the son of David, blessed be the king of Israel, blessed be the kingdom of our father David, blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord.' Seeing him equip, like Zechariah's Messias, they thought him to be no other than the king, that Saviour, whom they expected also at the time of the passover. After what had been thus said, and owned by the Jews, who could with any face question the evangelist for observing upon this action of Jesus, that so it was fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet Zechariah.—Chandler's Defence of Christianity.—Ed.

were a mixed multitude, consisting of disciples and common people, such as were moved to do thus, from the doctrines and miracles which they had heard and seen, and were forward to pay him what honour they could. They had no quality or outward splendour, indeed, no titles or eminent posts to recommend them: but they were very remarkable for their sincerity and honest zeal, their hearty affection to Christ, and firm persuasion of his being the true Messiah; and these, to him who is no respecter of persons, and who came to set up a kingdom not of this world, rendered those tributes of praise and acknowledgment, though from men mean and insignificant as to any temporal respects, more acceptable, more becoming his character, and more truly for his honour, than any dissembled or interested homage of rulers or rabbins, the greatest or wisest of the sanhedrim, could have been; for external advantages are of no consideration with God, while they want good dispositions within to recommend them.

Whether this was the same multitude, or not another spirited up, that clamoured so loudly against our blessed Saviour but five days after these joyful acclamations, it is much to be questioned; but supposing it was, whoever considers the subtle management of men in post and power, and the easiness and servile fears usual in those of a mean depending condition, will not be much surprised at such a sudden change. Popular applause is at all times a very fickle and uncertain thing; but in the case before us, there were some incidents which might occasion this instability. Our Saviour, after his triumphant entry into Jerusalem, seemed to assume a kind of sovereignty: he purged the temple from its abuses, healed the diseases of the people, received the hosannas of the children, and for some few days, preached, exhorted, and rebuked with all authority; so that during this time, no one almost doubted but that he was the mighty prince who was to gird his sword upon his thigh, and bring salvation unto Israel. But when, instead of this, they saw him fallen into the hands of his enemies, and quite deserted by his friends; apprehended by the public officers as a common malefactor, hauled from one high-priest to another, and there blindfolded, spit upon, buffeted, and insulted; when, in the midst of all this distress, they saw him left alone, without any disciple to stand by him; any messenger from heaven, as they might expect, or any exertion of his own power, to rescue him; nay, on the contrary, when they saw that one of his own servants had sold and betrayed him, another denied and abjured him, and all unanimously had fled and forsook him; and yet these were the persons who, for some years, had been his constant companions, and consequently were the best judges of his merit and pretensions: when the multitude, I say, saw matters reduced to this extremity, and that terror and desertion was on every side, while the rulers conspired to take away his life, it is no wonder, that, at the instigation of these rulers, they changed their tone, as they saw the scene change, and their hopes vanish, and struck in with the prevailing party: for, whoever has seen a great man disgraced at court, even though before he was the nation's darling, may easily satisfy himself, what very ready the affections of the populace are; how apt they are to bend to every wind of faction and interest, and to be swayed by every calumny, or malicious insinuation, even when most zealous, and seemingly most sincere.

If we take a view of the vast extent of the subject which the evangelists had before them, and the intended brevity of their books, to make them more useful to the generality of mankind, we cannot but perceive, that it was absolutely necessary for them to omit several things which must have occurred to their remembrance. The whole four gospels, bound together, make not a large volume, but each singly is a very small book; and yet, besides the miracles of our Saviour, attended, as they are, with the circumstances of place and time, the names of the persons and the occasions of their being wrought, they have, in these small tracts, inserted an account of the wonderful manner of our Saviour's birth, the dangers of his infancy, the miraculous appearances of providence in his favour, and his removals and journeyings from one place and country to another. They have recorded the substance of his doctrine in plain terms; they have set down many parables, spoken by him, together with their explications; and given us a full account of the mission of his twelve apostles, and the other seventy disciples. The cavils and questions of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians, together with his answers and solutions; the observations and reflections of the people; his public discourses before all, and his private instructions to his disciples; his predictions of his own sufferings; of the destruction of Jerusalem, and many other events; a long and particular account of his persecution, condemnation, and crucifixion; as also of his resurrection and ascension, not to mention the history of the birth, preaching, baptism, and sufferings of John the Baptist, his forerunner; are all comprised in a short volume. And therefore, having such plenty of matter before them, they were obliged to be silent as to some particulars, after they had related others of the like nature, for fear of incurring that prolixity which they had determined to avoid. And hence it is easy to suppose, in behalf of the three first evangelists, that, when they came to a certain period in their history of the ministry of Jesus, and observed, that they had given a sufficient account of his doctrine and miracles, being to reserve a space for his last sufferings and resurrection, they thought proper to pass over in silence whatever happened between that period and his last journey to Jerusalem. Thus some have observed, that, from the time when our Saviour returned into the coasts of Judea beyond Jordan, which, as St John¹ tells us, was soon after the feast of the Dedication, and that was always observed in winter, to the time of his last going up to Jerusalem, a little before Easter, these three evangelists make no mention at all of any journeys or movings from thence; and yet from this country, according to St John's account, it was, that Jesus afterwards came up to Bethany, and raised Lazarus, and then² went into the country near the wilderness, into a city called Ephraim, and there continued with his disciples.³ And therefore, since these sacred penmen, for the avoidance of prolixity, thought it not proper to take any notice of what passed in this interval of time, they could not, with any justness or propriety, introduce into their gospels an account of the resurrection of Lazarus.⁴

A. M. 4035. A. D. 31; OR, A. M. 5411. A. D. 39, FROM MAT. xii. 1—xvii. 14. MARK ii. 23—ix. 14. LUKE vi. 1—ix. 37. JOHN v. 1—vii. 1.

But there is a farther reason, which some learned men¹ have given us for their silence in this respect. They tell us, that, according to an ancient tradition, Lazarus lived thirty years after his being raised from the dead; and that, as the latest of these three evangelists wrote but fifteen years^a after our Lord's ascension, they might think it a needless matter to mention a miracle concerning a person living so near Jerusalem, when the fame of it was so great, and so many witnesses living to attest it: nor can they suppose, but that, in point of prudence, the evangelists declined mentioning this story, for fear of exasperating the Jews, and giving their rage and malice a fresh provocation to cut off Lazarus. But now St John, undertaking to write his gospel, on purpose to supply the omissions of the former evangelists, above sixty years after our Lord's ascension, when, by the death of Lazarus, and most of the witnesses, who were present at his resurrection, the fame of it might be much impaired, had good reason to perpetuate his memory by a full and particular rehearsal.

He had not however, given us so fair and unexceptionable an account of the matter, had he not represented our blessed Saviour compassionating the circumstances of his friends, and weeping upon so sad an occasion as the death of Lazarus. For 'there is something in human nature,' as an ingenious author² elegantly expresses it, 'resulting from our very make and constitution, while it perhaps out of delicacy to Lazarus, who was alive when they wrote. They did not choose to expose the friend of their master to the fury of the Jews, by holding him forth in writings that were to go through the world, as a monument of his power. But John, who lived to see the destruction of Jerusalem, probably survived Lazarus; and there was every reason why this evangelist, who has preserved other miracles and discourses which the former historians had omitted, should record this event. It is a subject suited to the pen of John: the beloved disciple seems to delight in spreading it out; for he has coloured his narration with many beautiful circumstances, which unfold the characters of the other persons, and discover his intimate acquaintance with his master's heart. It is a striking instance of that strict propriety which pervades all the books of the New Testament, and which marks them to every discerning eye to be authentic writings, that the tenderest scenes in our Lord's life, those in which the warmth of his private affections is conspicuous, are recorded by this evangelist. From the others we learn his public life, the grace, the condescension, the benevolence which appeared in all his intercourse with those that had access to him. It was reserved to 'the disciple whom Jesus loved' to present to succeeding ages this divine person in his family, and amongst his friends. In his gospel we see Jesus washing the feet of his disciples at the last supper that he ate with them. It is John, the disciple that leaned on the bosom of Jesus while he sat at meat, who relates the long discourse in which, with the most delicate sensibility for their condition, he soothes the troubled heart of his disciples, spares their feelings, while he tells them the truth, and gives them his parting blessing. It is John, whom Jesus judged worthy of the charge, who records the filial piety with which, in the hour of his agony, he provided for the comfort of his mother; and it is John, whose soul was congenial to that of his Master, tender, affectionate, and feeling like his, who dwells upon all the particulars of the resurrection of Lazarus, brings forward to our view the sympathy and attention with which Jesus took part in the sorrows of those whom he loved, and making us intimately acquainted with them and with him, presents a picture at once delightful and instructive.—Hill's Lectures in Divinity, vol. i.—Ed.

retains its genuine form, and is not altered by vicious habits, or oppressed by stupidity, which renders us obnoxious to the pains of others, causes us to sympathise with them, and almost comprehends us in their case. This compassion appears eminently in those, who, upon other accounts, are justly reckoned among the best of men. They, who, of all writers, undertake to imitate nature most, often introduce even their heroes weeping. The tears of men are, in truth, very different from the cries and ejaculations of children; they are silent streams, and flow from other causes; commonly some tender, and perhaps philosophical reflections.⁷ And in the case now before us, there might be other considerations, besides the loss of Lazarus, and the lamentation of his friends, that might draw from our Saviour these tears of compassion.

He might at that time be affected with the thought of the many afflictions to which human nature is liable in this imperfect state; and his groans and inward grief might proceed from the want of faith observable in the sisters, and the company attending them, and their diffidence of his ability to raise the dead, notwithstanding they had seen so many, so frequent manifestations of a divine and omnipotent power residing in him. He knew, that the obstinacy and inveterate prejudices of some of the spectators, and of the generality of the Jewish people were such, that the astonishing miracle he was going to work would not have its due effect upon them. This recalled to his mind that scene of misery and desolation which he foresaw would overtake them; and therefore he grieved, and sighed deeply at the prospect of the calamities which that perverse people were bringing upon themselves, and which all his endeavours, his miracles and sufferings, could not prevent. So that upon the whole, the concern which our Lord expressed upon this occasion, proceeded from the noblest motives, wisdom, goodness, friendship, compassion, and every view that is just and laudable, when he sympathised with his friends, and grieved for his enemies.

With these genuine expressions of solemn grief and sorrow, our Saviour drew near to his friend's sepulchre, which, as we may conjecture, was a hollow place hewn in a rock, whose entrance, which was closed with a stone, lay level with the surface of the earth; but then, we have so imperfect an account of the funeral habits that were in use among the Jews, that we can form no notion how far Lazarus, when revived, and set upon his feet, might be able of himself to walk to the mouth of his tomb.^b In this, however, we may satisfy ourselves, that our Saviour, who was able to recall his soul from its separate state, and convey fresh life into his body almost putrified, could give that body, though bound hand and foot, a power of moving forward, even though we suppose, as most of the ancients do, that herein he put himself to the expense of a second miracle, because the proper demonstration of the reality of the resurrection was, not to send any body into the tomb to unbind him, which might occasion a suspicion of some clandestine practice, but to have him come forth alive, in the presence of all the spectators, fairly, and without any change or alteration in his funeral dress; but what was

That some or other in the company was ready enough, upon this occasion, to obey our Lord's commands, can hardly be doubted; and therefore it is very wonderful, that, had there been any collusion in the matter, among so great a multitude, no one should have had sagacity enough to find it out. But the truth is, they none of them suspected any such thing. They none of them thought that, when a man had been four days buried, there wanted any proof of his being dead. They none of them thought, that Christ was only a pretended worker of miracles; for, how unwilling soever they were to own him for their Messiah, by long experience they were convinced that he was a person 'mighty in word and deed.'

Of all the wonderful deeds that we find recorded of him, there is none, I think, that is related so fully, and set off with so many circumstances, to prevent the least suspicion of fraud, as that of his curing the man who was born blind. The evangelist has expended a whole chapter upon it, and therein acquainted us with some previous questions of his disciples, which led to it; the uncommon manner of his performing it; the surprise and astonishment of the blind man's neighbours, when they saw such an alteration wrought in him; the man's open and undisguised relation of the matter, and repeated attestation of the greatness and reality of the cure; the great disturbance and perplexity which it gave the Jews; their examining, and cross-examining the man, who still continued firm and uniform in his account; their tampering with his parents, who avowed the truth of his being born blind; and at last, (when they saw that they could prevail nothing, but the more they examined, the more evidence they found,) their rage and malice, which carried them to such a degree as to excommunicate the poor man, and cast him out of their synagogue. These, and some more circumstances, are told in such a plain, convincing manner, as shows the whole story to be too well founded, for any cavils or fictions to weaken or impair.

Our Saviour might have had some sanative balsam in reserve; but what would all the balsam in the world have availed towards the cure of the distemper we are now considering? Physicians and surgeons, who have studied the texture of the eye, and made the cure of its maladies their chief employ, may give us indeed something that will strengthen the optic nerves, when weakened or relaxed: or, by some outward operation, may remove such obstructions as would otherwise impede the sight: 'but,' since the world began, 'as the poor man here excellently argues, 'was it ever heard, that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind?' And, as he might have added, by a medicine so incongruous as a plaster of clay; because the uncommonness of the application is so far from diminishing, that it rather raises, the credit and reputation of the miracle: at least, it must be allowed to be as great and triumphant a display of a supernatural power, to work a cure by means that have no fitness to that end, as it is to do it without any means at all. In the former case, the person who undertakes the cure, has only the distemper to contend with; but here, he has a double difficulty to conquer, and must not only control the power of the disease, but change the repugnant qualities of bodies, and make them productive of quite contrary effects. ²The fathers here say, that Christ, to illustrate his miraculous power, used that to anoint the blind man's eyes with, which was the greatest impediment to seeing, and most pernicious to the eyes. But though all must allow, that the method which he here made use of, was of no significance as to the cure of the man's blindness, yet was it, nevertheless, highly pertinent, in order to convince the spectators, as well as the patient himself, of his sovereign virtue, which could produce such a wonderful effect, by no other application but what was indifferent, if not obstructive to the cure.

Some of the ancient fathers were so rigid in their censures against adultery, that they would not admit any persons convicted thereof into the communion of the church, even after the longest penance; and carried their zeal and resentment to such an height, as to think it no great harm to kill them. No wonder then, if men of such severe opinions were unwilling to receive into the canon of Scripture the history of the woman taken in this crime, because, as they imagined, it gave permission to lewdness, since our Saviour sent her away without condemning her; whereas, ³in his present circumstances, he had no commission to pass sentence upon her, though, in bidding her ⁴go, and for fear of the divine judgment, repent, 'and sin no more,' he sufficiently declared himself against all such practices.

^a Upon a different persuasion however, it was, that this passage came at first to be marked as dubious, and, in time, was quite thrown out, as spurious, in many ancient, especially Greek copies: but, in opposition to this, we need only observe, ⁵that this part of history was found in the sixteen manuscripts, which Stephanus, in all the seventeen, save one, which Beza, and in that infinite number, which our learned Mills has made use of; that Tatian, who lived in the year 160, that is, sixty years after the death of St John, and Ammianns of Alexandria, who flourished about the year 220, and made their several Harmonies of the Gospel out of the copies then in use, do both, as appears from the canons of Eusebius, relate it; that most of the copies of the east, according to Selden's report, retain it; and though it be not found in some manuscripts, as the Greek code, cited by Cotelarius, expresses the matter, yet it is entire in the ancient manuscripts, and all the apostles make mention of it in the Constitutions which they set forth for the edification of the church.^b

^a The words of St Austin upon this occasion are these:—"So that some of little faith, or rather enemies of the true faith, fearing I suppose that impunity for sinning was given to their women, would take out of their copies that sentence which our Lord spoke concerning the pardon of adultery; as if he, who said, 'now henceforth sin no more,' granted permission to sin."⁷ On Adultery, b. ii. c. 7.

^b It is strange that the author should refer to the apocryphal book entitled the "Constitutions," as a work set forth by the apostles, when it has been clearly proved to be a spurious production, both from external and internal evidence. He seems to have gone into the absurd and untenable position of Whiston, who endeavoured to prove the evidence of the genuineness of the Apostolical Constitutions, to be equal to that of the New Testament

This is enough to vindicate the truth and sincerity of this part of St John's history from the censures of critics who suspect it; ^a and, to rescue his doctrine from such false constructions as the adversaries of our Lord's divinity would put upon it, we need only be mindful to distinguish between his divine and human nature, and not to apply such words and actions of his as relate to the one, to the prejudice of the other. Those who deny the Deity of Christ, do nevertheless acknowledge, that he was a prophet sent from God, and invested with a high commission. Now, under this character he could only appear and act in virtue of his human nature, and must thereupon be deemed subservient to the orders and commands of his heavenly Father; and therefore, as the very office of a prophet requires, that he should speak nothing of himself, nor deliver his own mind or doctrine, nor seek his own glory, but speak all things in the name, and do all things for the glory of him that sent him: so are we not to wonder that we find our blessed Lord, though he had in him 'all the fulness of the Godhead,' yet, in his prophetic capacity, speaking and acting as if he had no power but what was given him from above, even as ambassadors here on earth are obliged to pursue their master's instructions, and therefore professing so frequently, that he delivered no doctrine of his own invention, nor did any thing but what he had a commission to do.

The Socinians indeed allow, that the commission wherewith our Saviour was sent into the world, to do and reveal God's will, was reason enough to entitle him to the appellation of 'the Son of God,' and that this is all that he pretends to when he seems to clear himself to the Jews from any higher assumption. But now ¹ it appears, from a due inspection of the context, that Christ did not intend to say or prove, that he was the Son of God, as being only his ambassador, extraordinarily instructed, and so sent into the world; but on a far more excellent account, namely, that, before he came into the world, he was with God the Father, and so was his true and essential Son, as being God of God, and partaking of the same nature as a son does with his father. From the 25th to the 30th verse inclusively, it is manifest that our Lord discoursed to the Jews in such a manner, that they still thought he was asserting his Godhead; and therefore, ² 'we stone thee,' say they, 'because thou, being a man, makest thyself God,' namely, by calling God so emphatically, and with such peculiarity, his Father, as that he was so to him alone, and so that ³ 'he and his Father were one.' But to this our Saviour does not answer, by denying, either that he was God, or that he had ever challenged to himself that dignity, which, had he been only man, had been the most proper thing he could have said to take off the objection of his blasphemy; but, instead of that, he seems rather to argue, that he was so the Son of God, as to have the divine nature in him: 'for if judges and magistrates,' says he, 'are called gods, from an imperfect resemblance, and participation of the divine authority, how much more may I be called God, who am both by nature the Son of God, and, in the most excellent manner, authorized by him?' For this he signifies, by saying, that ⁴ 'his Father had sanctified him, and sent him into the world;' wherein he still declares, that God was his Father, and that he was first sanctified, and then sent, which plainly implies, that he was the Son of God in heaven before his mission into the world; and therefore, as an additional proof of his divine original, he appeals to the divine operations he performed: ⁵ 'if I do not the works of my Father, believe me not; but if I do, though you believe not me, believe the works; that ye may know and believe, that the Father is in me, and I in him.'

When therefore our blessed Saviour says of himself, that ⁶ 'all power was given unto him both in heaven and earth;' and that unto his disciples, ⁷ 'he had appointed a kingdom, even as his Father had appointed unto him;' when St Paul styles him the ⁸ 'righteous Judge, who shall give a crown of righteousness to all that love his appearance;' and St Matthew, ⁹ 'that king, who shall separate the sheep from the goats,' and ¹⁰ 'reward every one according to his works;' it can hardly be thought, that to distribute rewards in the Kingdom of glory, is a prerogative peculiar to the Father alone, and such as no way belongs to the Son; because our Saviour, in his reply to Zebedee's children, tells us, ¹¹ 'that to sit on his right hand, and on his left, was not his to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it was prepared of his Father;' since the whole and only design of the passage is to show, that these rewards shall not be distributed, upon such conditions, and in such a manner, as these petitioners vainly imagined. ¹² To this purpose we may observe, that the words, 'shall be given to them,' are only a supplement made by the translators, for they are not in the original, which is literally thus, 'to sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but, or except to them alone, for whom it is prepared of my Father;' and this means no more than that the honours and degrees of happiness in the other world are not the Son's to give, in the sense that these apostles fancied, that is, he does not give them absolutely and arbitrarily: he is not led by partiality and fondness, and respect of persons; he is not carried by humour, or vanquished by the importunity of friends and suitors, as earthly princes are, but is limited by the considerations of equity and strict justice, from which it can never be consistent with the perfections of his nature to depart: for that the whole process of the final judgment, and consequently the dispensation of future rewards and punishments, is to be transacted by our blessed Saviour, we have this itself; but, whatever value may be attached to these and other apocryphal writings belonging to the early ages of the church, as serving to increase the evidences, and corroborate the truth of the Gospel history; they can never be received as genuine productions, much less a guide in matters of faith and practice. express testimony in Scripture, ¹ ‘the Father judgeth no man; but hath committed all judgment to the Son, that all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father.’

Though we are not much acquainted with the condition of angels, or the ingredients of their happiness, yet thus much the scripture has informed us concerning them, that ² ‘they are ministering spirits, sent out to minister for them that shall be heirs of salvation;’ and therefore we may reasonably presume, that they are full of tenderness for their charge, solicitous for their particular safety, and extremely glad of any good that befalls them. ³ ‘How these heavenly hosts were affected with the salvation of mankind in general, is evident from the hymn with which they attended at the birth of Christ, to welcome him into the world; and though their nature be far distant from us mortals, and their bliss exquisite beyond what we are able to conceive; yet, in regard that both their nature and their bliss are finite, their joy may certainly admit of an increase; and as often as a sinner is converted from the evil of his ways, there may spring up a fresh object, and a large and literal addition to it.’

But can this properly be said of God too, whose perfection of happiness allows no such accumulation? No, doubtless; and therefore with respect to him, we must interpret this, as reason and religion oblige us to understand many such like passages where human parts and passions are attributed to him. As therefore the Holy Ghost, meaning to represent his displeasure and our baseness, does it, by saying, that we provoke him to anger, kindle his fury, grieve and weary his spirit, and the like; so here, by saying, that God rejoiceth over a repenting sinner, is intended, that such repentance is highly agreeable to him, and that, were his nature capable of the same unequal motions with ours, the joy of a father or a friend, for retrieving the person he loves best, and had been most in pain for, would be but a feeble and a very faint image of that satisfaction which this excites in him, who loves us better than the tenderest parent, or most affectionate friend upon earth does, or can do.

But why should the degree of joy be so intense upon this occasion? Why should the reformation of one sinner raise it above the safety of many souls, who never fell from their integrity? and the ninety-nine sheep which never strayed, excite less of it than one poor silly wanderer? In order to resolve this difficulty, we must observe, ⁴ ‘that, in the parables of the gospel, it is usual to represent all of the same kind, though they be sometimes the greater number, by one man.’ Thus, in the parable of the marriage supper, the man who had not on his wedding garment, according to the sense of most interpreters, represents all wicked men; and in that of the several talents, the slothful servant, who hid his in a napkin, is said to be one; whereas they who improved theirs, are three; and yet it can hardly be doubted, but that there are fewer who receive the grace of God to any good purpose, than they who receive it in vain; and in like manner, though, in the preceding parables, there is mention made but of one lost piece of silver, and of one strayed sheep, yet is that one the representative of the whole tribe of sinners, which do certainly out-number the few that are righteous; and therefore, according to this acceptance, the joy in heaven may be allowed to be greater, because the objects that give occasion to it are more.

But even if this were not, as these words were spoken of God after the manner of men, so they are to be understood in a sense agreeable to human passions. Now, in ourselves we perceive, that, in obtaining what we passionately desired, in regaining what we looked upon as lost, and in securing what was in great and imminent danger, our joy is strong, and our delight transporting. The surprise of an escape, which we did not expect, and the regaining of a treasure we had given over as gone, is entertained with rapture, because it is a kind of new accession to our fortunes, and like a thing we never enjoyed before. A loving father, no doubt, finds great comfort in seeing all his children in a perfect state of health; but if one of them chance to fall sick beyond expectation of recovery, to see him out of danger, administers more present joy than does the constant health of all the rest; and, in like manner, though a continued course of goodness be in itself most valuable, yet the recovery of a lost sinner, the reviving one dead in trespasses and sins, the seeing him snatched as a firebrand out of the fire, when he was just going to fall into it, gives a more fresh and lively joy; and therefore, ⁵ ‘it is meet,’ says the father in the parable, ‘that upon this occasion we should make merry and be glad; for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again, was lost, and is found.’

Some interpreters are of opinion, that the parable of the Lord of the vineyard paying all his labourers alike, is to be understood of the gift of grace, or first admission to the privileges of the gospel, and not of the fruition of glory; because the wages here mentioned are given to the envious and unthankful. But allowing this to be no more than a passage inserted for ornament and illustration only, or that it may mean a reward so surprisingly great, as among men, would provoke the envy of others; yet, if we state the case of the several labourers in the parable, as it includes the Jews and Gentiles in general, and private Christians in particular, we shall find no injustice in what the Lord of the vineyard did unto them.

⁶ To the Jews God was pleased to make the first express discoveries of his will by a written law. In process of time the like benefit was extended to the Gentiles. They readily accepted it, and, by so doing, became partakers of the same grace and precious promises with those who had long been brought up under the legal, and from that, removed sooner under the evangelical dispensation. The apostles left all and followed Christ. The primitive Christians gave in their names to his doctrine, and continued steadfast in it, at the certain peril of their liberties, their fortunes, their lives: and yet, in any after ages of Christianity, they, who live and die, though quietly and peaceably, in the sincere profession of this religion, are promised the king-

In like manner, some have the happiness of a pious education, and carry on their early virtue through the several stages of life; others, who either wanted that advantage, or have neglected to improve it, run into the same excess of riot with the unthinking part of the world; and yet if these, though late, see their follies, and effectually forsake them, the promise of God standeth sure,¹ 'that, at what time soever the wicked man turneth away from the wickedness he hath committed, and doth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive.' This is the whole sense of the parable, and these are the common cases to which it is applied: but we mistake the meaning of it widely, if we think that it denotes an equality of rewards in the kingdom of heaven, since we have this assurance given us, that as there² 'is one glory of the sun, another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars, so also is the resurrection of the dead.' Those that are raised to everlasting life shall indeed be all glorious; but still the glory of some shall be greater than that of others. Every good Christian shall, no doubt, be admitted to a state of felicity; but when we consider these words of our Saviour,³ 'I have appointed unto you a kingdom, that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel,' we cannot but infer, that there are some particular marks and instances of glory, where-with the apostles of our Lord will be honoured above other Christians. And, in like manner, though a late penitent, if he be sincere, shall be received to mercy at last, yet he has not ordinarily any reason to expect a degree of glory equal to his, who has never swerved from his duty, or has quickly returned to it. His bliss shall be perfect indeed, though it be not the most exalted, and though he be less happy than some other Christians, yet he shall be much happier than he deserves.

Though the difference between the Jews and Samaritans, in matters of religion, was great, and no small obstruction to all civil intercourse, yet it was not at all times carried to such a height as to deny to each other the common rights of hospitality. Our Saviour himself was, once upon a time,⁴ when he met the Samaritan woman at Jacob's well, kindly received by the people of Sychar, for the space of two days; but then he was returning out of Judea; whereas he was now going up to Jerusalem, with a purpose to celebrate the feast of Tabernacles. The Samaritans had likewise a feast of the same kind, though not observed at the same time,⁵ of as old a date as the first separation under Jeroboam, and instituted both in imitation of, and in opposition to, the great festival that our Lord was now going to solemnize; and therefore⁶ this travelling through their country, with a set purpose to do this, was looked upon as an affront to their way of worship. For it argued our Lord's judgment in this case to be, that Jerusalem was the only place where these feasts could be regularly celebrated, and consequently that the keeping them on mount Gerizzim, and the temple there, was a presumptuous innovation, directly contrary to the will and law of God.

"But why was our Saviour alone treated in this rude manner, when every traveller to Jerusalem, upon the like occasion, declared against the Samaritan schism as much as he did, and yet, for any thing we find, met with better entertainment?" Now this different sort of treatment can be resolved into nothing but the different character of the travellers. The Samaritans might think, that the opinions and practices of common people were not worth their regard, but that it would be of mighty consequence if a person so eminent as Jesus should declare against them; and therefore, since his going to worship at Jerusalem, on this solemn occasion, would, in all common acceptance, bear this meaning, they contrived to prevent, as much as in them lay, the influence which that supposed indignity might have, by revenging it with another, of not receiving him; because such refusal, they thought, was a constructive disowning of his authority, and a plain declaration to all people, that whatever esteem and veneration others might have for this famed man, they themselves took him for no prophet.

Now, whoever looks into the method of our Saviour's preaching may easily perceive, that it was customary with him to take occasion, from some obvious thing or other, to discourse of spiritual blessings, and frequently to make use of phrases metaphorically taken from the matter in hand. Pursuant hereunto we find him, in allusion to the customs of this feast, beginning his invitation with words not unlike what we have cited from the prophet,⁸ 'if any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink.' Water is, by God himself, represented as no bad emblem of the dispensation of grace; for⁹ 'I will pour water,' says he, 'upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground.' Which he explains in this manner: 'I will pour my spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring;' and¹⁰ the frequent libations, in the feast of Tabernacles, were supposed, by the Jewish doctors themselves, to have had a mystic sense in them: and therefore the meaning of our Saviour's words is this, 'That whoever was desirous of the spiritual blessings which were figured in this festival rite if he would become his disciple, and believe in him as the promised Messiah, he would communicate to him such gifts of the Holy Ghost, and in such a plentiful measure, as the world was not yet acquainted with; for ¹ 'out of his belly shall flow rivers of running water.'

Whence it is, that our Saviour borrowed this metaphorical expression, is a matter not so well agreed by the learned; some think from the proverbs of Solomon;² 'The words of a man's mouth are as deep waters, and the well-spring of wisdom a flowing brook.' Others, from the thirty-second of Isaiah,³ 'Behold a King shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment, and a man shall be as rivers of waters in a dry place;' and others, with more probability, from the fifty-eighth of that prophet;⁴ 'Thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not.' However this be, it is certain,⁵ that our Saviour, taking the rise of his discourse from the customary libations at this time, had under his view and consideration the make and figure of the water-vessels that were used on this occasion, which, by reason of their large bellies, being able to hold a great quantity of water, were therefore proper emblems of that plentiful effusion of the Holy Ghost, which he intended to send upon the christian church, when ⁶ 'to one should be given, by the Spirit, the word of wisdom; to another, the word of knowledge, by the same Spirit; to another, faith, by the same Spirit; to another, the gifts of healing, by the same Spirit; to another, the working of miracles; to another, prophecy; to another, discerning of spirits; to another, divers kinds of tongues: and to another, the interpretation of them.'^a

^a This is the account which is usually given of our Lord's exclamation to the people on the last day of the feast of tabernacles; and it is surely a sufficient answer to the preceding objection. The whole transactions of that day may be placed however in a light somewhat different, in which the words of Jesus will appear to have a meaning more obvious, and at the same time equally important. "The feast of tabernacles," says Bishop Horsley, "continued eight days. At what precise time I know not, but in some part of the interval between the prophets and the birth of Christ, the priests had taken up a practice of marching daily, during the feast, round the altar of burnt-offerings, waving in their hands branches of the palm, and singing, as they went,—“Save, we pray, and prosper us!” This was done but once on each of the first seven days; but on the eighth and last, it was repeated seven times. When this ceremony was finished, the people, with extravagant demonstrations of joy and exultation, fetched buckets of water from the fountain of Siloam, and presented them to the priests in the temple; who mixed the water with the wine of the sacrifices, and poured it upon the altar, chanting all the while that text of Isaiah,—“With joy we shall draw water from the fountain, or wells, of salvation.” The fountain of salvation, in the language of a prophet, is the Messiah; the water to be drawn from that fountain is the water of his Spirit. Of this mystical meaning of the water, the inventors of those superstitious rites, whoever they might be, seem to have had some obscure discernment; although they understood the fountain literally of the fountain of Siloam: for, to encourage the people to the practice of this laborious superstition, they had persuaded them that this rite was of singular efficacy to draw down the prophetic spirit. The multitudes, zealously busied in this unmeaning ceremony, were they to whom Jesus addressed that emphatical exclamation,—“If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink.” The first word,—“if any man thirst”—are ironical. “Are ye famished,” says he, “with thirst, that ye fatigue yourselves with fetching all this

THAT the accomplishment of ancient prophecies, in the person and actions of our blessed Saviour, was one of the external evidences of his divine mission, and consequently of the truth of our most holy religion, was the subject of our last chapter; and how far the evidence of the miracles which he wrought is available to the same great end, we shall now endeavour to set before our reader.

⁷ To this purpose we must observe, that a true miracle is properly such an operation as exceeds the ordinary course of things, and is repugnant to the known laws of nature, either as to its subject, matter, or the manner of its performance. For though we readily acknowledge, that there are beings in the spiritual world, which are able to perform things far exceeding the power of men, and therefore apt to beget wonder and amazement in us; yet, that any created beings, and, consequently agents of a limited power, are capable of working such miracles as our Saviour did; are capable of controlling the course of nature, of supplying men's natural defects, of giving sight to the blind, speech to the dumb, and life to the dead, which are miracles relating to the subject-matter, or of doing any of these things in an instant, by a touch, by a word, at a distance, and without any kind of outward means, which are miracles regarding the manner of their performance, is a thing impossible; unless we can suppose, that limited, inferior, and created beings, have an equal power of creating, controlling, and restoring, with Almighty God, which is contradiction enough in all conscience.

It was upon this persuasion, therefore, namely, 'that true miracles are the sole operation of God,' that the world has all along agreed to acknowledge and accept of miracles as an authentic and indisputable testimony, water up the hill? O! but ye thirst for the pure waters of Siloam, the sacred brook that rises in the mountain of God, and is devoted to the purification of the temple! Are ye indeed athirst for these? Come, then, unto me and drink. I am the fountain, of which that which purifies the temple is the type: I am the fountain of salvation of which your prophet spake: from me the true believer shall receive the living water,—not in scanty draughts, fetched with toil from this penurious rill, but in a well perpetually springing up within him." The words of Isaiah, which the priests were chanting, and to which Jesus alludes, are part of a song of praise and triumph, which the faithful are supposed to use in that prosperous state of the church, which, according to the prophet, it shall finally attain under Jesse's root:—"In that day shalt thou say, behold, God is my salvation: I will trust, and not be afraid: for the Lord Jehovah is my strength and song, he also is become my salvation." Consider these words as they lie in the context of the prophet: consider the occasion upon which Jesus, standing in the temple, applies them to himself; consider the sense in which he applies them; and judge whether this application was less than an open claim to be the Lord Jehovah come unto his temple. It is remarkable that it had, at the time, an immediate and wonderful effect. "Many of the people, when they heard this saying, said, Of a truth this is the prophet." The light burst at once upon their minds. Jesus no sooner made the application of this abused prophecy to himself, than they acknowledged the justness of it, and acknowledged in him the fountain of salvation."—Bishop Horsley's Sermons.—Ed.

that the persons intrusted with such power were certainly sent and commissioned by God. To this purpose we find Pharaoh's magicians confessing,¹ that the miracles which Moses and Aaron exhibited were the finger of God; and, in the controversy between Elijah and the priests of Baal, it was readily accepted as a fair proposal, that he² 'who answered by fire from heaven' should be unanimously served and worshipped as God. The less reason have we then to wonder, that we hear a learned ruler of the Jews accosting our Lord in these words,³ 'Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher sent from God; for no man can do these miracles that thou dost, except God be with him:' or that a mean man, who had been born blind, should confront the whole assembly of the Pharisees, with this one argument,⁴ 'since the world began, was it not heard, that any man opened the eyes of the blind: if this man were not of God, he could do nothing;' or, that our blessed Saviour himself should so frequently appeal to the miracles he wrought, as proper testimonies of his divine mission,⁵ 'the works which my Father hath sent me to finish; the works which I do in my Father's name, the same bear witness of me, that my Father sent me.'

Our Saviour indeed, and his apostles both, do often appeal to the predictions of the prophets relating to the promised Messiah, as fulfilled and accomplished in him; and the truth is, unless the validity of this appeal can be supported, miracles alone, or exclusive of this testimony, would not be a sufficient evidence of our Lord's commission: but then it ought to be considered, that when, among the particular predictions of a person promised to the Jews as their Messiah, it was foretold, that he should⁶ 'be like unto Moses;' that⁷ 'the Spirit of the Lord should rest upon him;' that⁸ 'he should open the eyes of the blind, and unstop the ears of the deaf; and that he should make the lame to leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb to sing.'⁹ Miracles became then an essential ingredient of his character, and a sure test of his being a prophet sent from God.

⁹ Some modern Jews, indeed, when pressed with the evidence of our Saviour's miracles, make this their subterfuge, that the Messiah, at his coming, was not to perform any wonders of this kind, but only to manage the Lord's battles, and to overcome the people that were round about him. But that this was not of old the sense of the Jewish nation, is evident from the words of the people in our Saviour's time:¹⁰ 'when Christ cometh, will he do more miracles than these which this man hath done?' Nay,¹¹ an author of theirs, of no great antiquity, after his having mentioned the three glorious gifts, namely, prophecy, miracles, and the knowledge of God, which the Israelites, in the time of their captivity, had lost, gives us to understand, that, upon the appearance of the Messiah, the return of miracles was justly to be expected, in completion of this prophecy,¹² 'I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophecy, your old men shall dream dreams, and your young men shall see visions.'

Since the Messiah then was to work miracles when he came into the world, if we consider the design of our blessed Saviour's mission, namely,¹³ that he was a teacher sent from God to abolish a form of worship, which had incontestably been established by the power of miracles in Moses, and to introduce a new religion, repugnant to the wisdom of the world, in many mysterious doctrines, and abhorrent to the vicious inclinations of men, in all its righteous laws and precepts; that he was appointed, in short, to destroy the kingdom of the devil, and upon its ruins to erect a kingdom of righteousness, there was an absolute necessity for him to be invested with a power of working miracles: otherwise, his pretensions to this high character had been ridiculous, and the Jews with good reason might have demanded of him,¹⁴ 'Master, we would see a sign from thee; what sign therefore dost thou do, that we may see, and believe?' But this demand is effectually silenced by our Saviour's being able to make the reply,¹⁵ 'if I had not done among you the works which none other man did, ye had not had sin; but now ye have both seen, and hated both me and my Father.'

John the Baptist, who was born a little before our Saviour, was his fore-runner.¹⁷ He appeared at the time, when the Messiah was expected; and, being much famed for his virtue and sanctity of life, was followed by the people, who were prone to take him for the prophet who was to come, as there was not indeed, at that time, a greater person born among women: and yet the divine providence so ordered the matter, that, as great as he was, he wanted this character of the true Messiah, namely, the working of miracles; and therefore our Saviour, comparing himself with the Baptist, a burning and a shining light indeed, but who himself did no miracles,¹⁸ 'I have a greater witness,' says he, 'than that of John; for the works which my Father hath given me to finish, the same works that I do, bear witness of me, that I am the Messiah,' or, which is all one, 'that my Father hath sent me.'

And well indeed might our Lord be allowed to claim a pre-eminence, not above the Baptist only, but above every prophet that went before him; when, upon so many occasions, he exercised a power and authority, not inferior to that of God; when, by the same omnipotence wherewith he created all things at first, he multiplied a few loaves, and two fishes, into a sufficiency to feed five thousand; when, at his command, the wind and the sea grew still; and unclean spirits departed from men's bodies, confessing him to be the Son of God; when acute diseases, and chronical griefs,¹⁹ such as no length of time, no skill, no remedies, no expense could assuage, were equally cured with a touch, nay, with the touch of his garment, with a word, nay, with a word that operated effectually upon the absent, and at a distance; when persons at death's door, nay, actually dead, and dead for some time, were commanded back to life and health; and himself, when slain by the Jews, and committed to the grave, was, according to his own prediction, raised from the dead, by the same divine Spirit whereby he quickeneth and enliveneth all things.

These, and many more actions of the like nature, recorded in the gospel, are plain demonstrations of a divine power residing in our blessed Saviour: but then there is something farther to be said concerning these miraculous acts of his, namely, that they were exceedingly well chosen to characterize the Messiah, in regard of their suitableness to the end and design of his coming.

When John the Baptist had heard of the works which ⁴ Christ did, he sent two of his disciples with this message to him, 'Art thou he that should come, (that is, the promised Messiah) or look we for another?' To whom our Lord returned this answer, 'Go, and show John again these things which ye do hear and see; the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk; the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, and the dead are raised up.' The answer is in a great measure taken from the prophet ⁵ Isaiah, describing the great operations of the Messiah; and, by remitting the Baptist to them, our Saviour intended to show that he must of necessity be the person he sent to inquire after, because he had not only the power of doing miracles, but even of doing the self same miracles that the evangelical prophet had predicted of the Messiah.

tive mistakes. And yet, if God should communicate any part of his power to an impostor to enable him to work miracles, and such miracles in kind as were foretold of the true Messiah, in confirmation of his pretences, what would become of these two sacred attributes? To suspect, I say, that Almighty God is capable of employing his infinite power, with a design to mislead and delude mankind, in what relates to their eternal concerns, is to destroy and subvert his very nature, and to leave ourselves no notion at all of such a being. Nay, for him to permit the same evidences to be produced for errors as for truth, is, in effect, to cancel his own credentials, and to make miracles of no significance at all. And therefore, how artfully soever some impostors may contrive their delusions, yet we are not to doubt, but that, if we examine, 1st, the works themselves, and their manner of being done: and, 2dly, the persons themselves, and the ends for which they do them, we shall be able to discern the difference between real miracles and lying wonders.

2dly. In relation to the person pretending a divine mission, it is required that he be a man of good report for his unblameable conversation; and that he be in the perfect exercise of his reason and senses, and constant and uniform in the message he delivers; that the doctrine which he endeavours to establish by his miracles be consistent with the principles of true reason, and natural religion, consistent with great notions and worship of God, and consistent with the former revelations he hath made of his will: of a tendency to destroy the devil's power in the world, to recover men from their ignorance, to reform them from their vices, and lead them into the practice of virtue and true godliness by proper motives and arguments, and, in short, to advance the general welfare of societies, as well as every man's particular happiness in this life, and in his preparation for a better. And now to observe a little how all these characters meet in the blessed Jesus.

That Jesus of Nazareth was a person of great virtue and goodness, in full possession of his reason and senses, and constant and uniform in the message he delivered to mankind, not only the whole tenor of his conduct, as it is recorded by the evangelists, but the nature of his doctrine and excellency of his precepts, the manner of his discourses to the people, and the wisdom of his replies to the insidious questions of his adversaries, are a plain demonstration: and that ⁸ 'this Jesus was a man approved of God by miracles, wonders, and signs, which God did by him in the midst of all the people,¹ is manifest, not only from the testimony of his friends and disciples, but ¹ “from the concession of heathen historians, as well as the traditions of the Jewish Talmud, wherein the memory of them is preserved.”

These miracles indeed were above the skill of men or spirits to effect; but they were not therefore impossible, because subject to the power of Almighty God; for the same agent, who formed the eye, could restore the blind to sight; he, who wrought the whole frame of our bodies could as easily cure the maimed, or heal the diseased; and he, who causes the rain to descend, and to water the earth, that it may minister bread to the eater and seed to the sower, could be at no loss to change water into wine, or to multiply the loaves and fishes for the relief of the hungry.

These miracles again, being acts of mercy as well as power, were not consistent with the character of an impostor, or the agency of any wicked spirit; but that God should have compassion on his creatures, and exercise his tender mercies over ‘the works of his own hands;’ that he should give bread to the hungry, limbs to the maimed, and release to such as were under the captivity of Satan, is no improbable thing at all. These were actions suitable to his majesty, and highly comporting with his wisdom and goodness, since they naturally tended both to beget reverence in the minds of men towards his messenger, and to reconcile them to the belief and obedience of his heavenly will.

Now these miracles our Saviour did openly, in the temple, in the synagogues, and on the festivals, when the concourse of people was greatest, and when the doctors of the law, who came on purpose to ensnare him, were sitting by and beholding what was done. These he did readily, and with a word’s speaking: for ² ‘peace be still,’ quelled the raging of the winds and waves; ³ ‘Young man arise,’ revived the widow’s son; ⁴ ‘Ephphatha, be opened,’ gave the deaf man hearing; and ⁵ ‘Lazarus, come forth,’ raised him from the grave who had been four days dead. These he did frequently, and upon all proper occasions; for, from the time that he entered upon his ministry, scarce a day passed without some fresh instance of his power and goodness, insomuch that if all his actions of this kind had been particularly recorded, ⁶ ‘the world itself,’ as St John, by an elegant hyperbole, declares, ‘would not contain the books which should be written.’ and, what crowns all, these he did with a design to establish a religion, whose business it is to give men the most exalted thoughts of God and his providence, and the greatest certainty of future rewards and punishments; to oblige them, by the strongest motives, to observe and practice whatsoever things are true and honest, and just, and pure, and lovely, and of good report; to persuade them to mortify every inordinate affection, and to attain these excellent dispositions of mind, which will make them resemble God, and best prepare them for future happiness; in a word, to establish the practice of the two great virtues, the love of God, and the love of our neighbour, upon these two excellent principles, of faith in God, as the rewarder of those that seek him, and faith in Jesus Christ, as the Saviour and Judge of mankind.

And, if such be the end and design of the Christian religion, there is little reason to suppose, as the Jews are very willing to object, that the devil could have any hand in assisting our Saviour to effect such miracles as gave credit to the first appearance, and strength and success to the propagation of these doctrines, which were calculated on purpose to destroy his dominion in the world, and upon its ruins, to erect the kingdom of God and his Christ. The devil is not so silly a being as to join forces with his avowed enemy, in order to ruin and depose himself: and if our Saviour could hope for no assistance from that quarter, the pretence of his doing his miracles, ^a by virtue of the name Jehovah, stolen out of the sanctuary, and used as a charm, is a fiction too gross and palpable to stand in need of any confutation.

^a The account which some later Jews give us of this transaction, is thus related:—“That, in the time of Helena the queen, Jesus of Nazareth came into Jerusalem, and in the temple found a stone, on which the ark of God was wont to rest, wherein was written the Tetragrammaton, or more peculiar name of God; that whosoever should get the name into his possession, and be skilled in it, would be able to do what he pleased; that therefore their wise men, fearing lest any of the Israelites should get that name, and destroy the world, made two dogs of brass, and placed them at the door of the sanctuary; that whenever any had got in, and learned that name, these dogs were wont at their coming out, to bark so terribly, that they forgot the name, and the letters they had newly learned. But when Jesus of Nazareth, say they, went in, he not only learned the letters of this name, but wrote them in a parchment, and hid it, as he came out, in an incision which he made in his flesh; and though, through the barking of the dogs, he had forgot the name, yet he learned it afterwards from his parchment: and it was by virtue of this, say they, that Jesus restored the lame, healed the leprous, raised the dead, walked upon the sea, and did all his other miraculous works.—Pag. Fidei, pt. ii. c. 8, s. 6, as quoted in Kidder’s Demonstration, pt. i. p. 40.

^b This Apollonius is, by the enemies of Christianity, set up as a rival to our blessed Saviour, in point of his life, miracles, and predictions; and therefore it may not be improper, in this place, to give our readers a short sketch of some of the principal incidents of his life and transactions. About three or four years before the vulgar Christian era, he was born at Tyaia, a town of Cappadocia, from whence he was named Tyaneus, of an ancient family, and rich parents; but to make his birth more resemble our Saviour’s, it is said, that Proteus, under the form of a sea-god, acquainted his mother, that he himself was to be born of her, and that, at the same time, she was surrounded with swans, which assisted at her labour, and, by their singing and gaiety, seemed to presage the infant’s future glory. However this may be, while he was a youth, he was observed to have a great natural genius, an excellent memory, and was in his person so very beautiful, that he drew the eyes of all men upon him. When he was fourteen years of age, his father sent him to Tarsus in Cilicia, in order to study rhetoric; but he chose rather to apply himself to philosophy, and, in a few years, professed himself of the Pythagorean sect. Pursuant to this he abstained from the flesh of all animals, as reputed impure, lived upon nothing but fruits and vegetables; and though he did not condemn the use of wine, yet he chose rather to abstain from it, as being apt to disturb the serenity of the mind. He was a person of great mortification and abstinence, renounced marriage, and professed continence, and affected to live in the temple of Æsculapius, to make it be believed that he was his peculiar favourite, and, by some, of late times, have been bold enough to name him in competition with our blessed Saviour. But, besides that, this history of Apollonius has no other voucher than his servant Damis, who was confessedly a weak and ignorant person, and consequently very capable of being imposed upon by the artful juggles of his master, the very miracles related therein are, for the most part, ridiculous, unworthy the character of a prophet, and, as the learned Photius speaks, full of follies and monstrous tales. Nay, in the highest instance of his miraculous power, namely, his raising a dead woman to life again, ¹ Philostratus himself suspects, as he says the company did, that there was some confederacy and collusion in the matter; but, if even it were not so, the doctrines which Apollonius taught, and the zeal he professed for the Pagan idolatry, together with his excessive pride, ambition, and vain affectation of divine honours, are a his assistance, was enabled to perform cures. Before he appeared in a public character, he kept silence for the space of five years; but as he did not totally refrain from company, he usually spoke by signs, or, when there was a necessity for it, wrote some words. After this five years' silence he came to Antioch, and there endeavoured to improve upon the Pagan religion. The doctrines which he taught were delivered in a plain preceptive manner, and with a better grace and authority than the philosophers at that time were accustomed to. After some stay at Antioch, he undertook a long journey, in order to converse with the Brahmans of India, and, in his way to visit the Persian Magi. At Nineveh he contracted an acquaintance with one Damis, who attended him ever after, and wrote an account of his life, sayings, and actions, which have been transmitted to us in the history of Philostratus the Sophist. Upon his return from the Indies he went to Ephesus, where he was received with all the tokens of respect imaginable, was followed and admired by people of all ranks and conditions, and by making his observations upon the chirping of a bird, which came to call its companions to pick up some corn which happened to be spilt, gained himself the reputation of a very great prophet. From Ephesus he removed to Athens, where he instructed the people in the ceremonies of their religion; in the manner, and time, and place, of their offering up sacrifices, libations, and prayers, with other superstitious rites; and where, by commanding a devil to go out of a young man, and in token of his being dispossessed, to overturn a statue which stood by, he obtained the character of a mighty worker of miracles. In the twelfth year of Nero he came to Rome, where, having spoken some disrespectful words against the emperor, he was prosecuted by his favourite, Tigellinus; but, to his great surprise, when his prosecutor opened the bill of accusation against him, he found nothing but a fair piece of paper, without one word written in it; and not long after, upon his restoring a young woman, who seemed to fall down dead as she was going to be married, to life again, he was accounted by all a great magician at least, if not a person sent from heaven. When Nero ordered all philosophers to depart from Rome, he left the place, and, to pass by other circumstances of his itinerant life, he was in Asia Minor, when Domitian ordered him to be apprehended for speaking with some freedom against his tyranny, and sent to Rome: where, notwithstanding the emperor's cruel usage of him, he behaved with incredible magnanimity, and, upon his trial, being honourably acquitted, immediately vanished out of the court, and was that very day seen at Puteoli, which is very near fifty leagues from Rome. When Domitian was slain, he resided at Ephesus; and, as he was then discoursing to the people, he gave them to understand, that the fatal stab was that moment given him; which accordingly proved true: for not long after an express arrived, that Domitian was dispatched in the manner he had mentioned, and Nerva unanimously declared emperor. Nerva, upon his accession to the throne, is said to have sent Apollonius a letter, desiring him to come and assist at his councils, to which he returned an answer by his servant Damis; but before Damis came back his master was dead; though as to the place and manner of his death, we have no certain account. After his death, however,

Tacitus ² indeed tells us of two cures, one of a blind and the other of a lame person, which Vespasian pretended to work at Alexandria; but, whosoever reflects on the situation of his affairs at that time, will perceive some reason to suspect a collusion. He was now in a dispute with himself what to do, whether to assume the Roman empire, or restore the ancient form of government, a commonwealth. The restoration of the latter, was what Dion and Euphrates, two eminent philosophers, advised; but Apollonius, whom he likewise consulted upon this occasion, with great vehemence persuaded the contrary, and, being himself accustomed to such artifices, might not improbably suggest to Vespasian the necessity of some miracle or other, in order to recom-

he had statues erected, and divine worship paid to him; but, as he left few or no disciples behind him, his memory, which for a little while was greatly honoured, dwindled away by degrees, and, upon the downfall of idolatry, utterly ceased. This account we have from Philostratus, who, from the commentaries of Damis, and a book of one Maximus, which he happened to light upon, wrote the life of Apollonius, above an hundred and twenty years after his death: but whoever looks into it will see how much his fabulous history falls short of the gravity and simplicity of the gospel. The truth is, Julia, the wife of the emperor Severus, affected to be thought a learned woman, and therefore she set up for a wit, which was attended with an immoderate desire and thirst after novelty. She was continually surrounded with poets, sophists, grammarians, &c. Philostratus made one of the number, and from her he had the memoirs of Damis, to which he added, either from common fame, or his own fancy, whatever he thought would hit the taste of the empress, or work himself into the favour of Caracalla, who had Apollonius in high esteem, and were both great admirers of the marvellous. So that, wherever the subject came not up to the magnificence which the author desired, he usually added all the ornaments which his imagination could invent, and, without any regard to truth, or even probability itself, witnessed the conversation between Apollonius and the ghost of Achilles, and the long digressions on the panthers of Armenia, the elephants, the phoenix, the satyrs, the pygmies, &c., made it not so much an history, as a wild romance; in which light all the great men, not only Christians but Pagans, and ancient as well as moderns, that have had occasion to mention it, look upon it. Philostratus, however, might have a farther design in writing the life of Apollonius: for, as the Christian religion, by the strength of its miracles, had now made its way in the world, those who endeavoured to oppose it, and yet could not deny the reality of its facts, were at length reduced to this expedient, namely, to produce miracles in Paganism, and every other argument that they thought Christianity could boast of, by way of contraposition. As therefore the actions of Jesus were handed down to us by the four evangelists, who wrote an account of the principal occurrences of his life, so they, in like manner, set about writing the lives of their philosophers, in hopes of finding their account in thus opposing miracles to miracles, and magic to the power of God; and, for this reason, they have been more especially careful to accommodate the transactions of their great men to the more remarkable passages in our Saviour's life, as the learned Huetius shows, in many instances relating to Apollonius, and thereupon concludes in these words: "Philostratus besides seems to have had for his object, the depression of the increasing belief on Christ and his doctrine, by setting up this fictitious image of every doctrine of holiness and wonderful virtue. Wherefore he formed this image in imitation of Christ, and accommodated to Apollonius several things belonging to the history of our Saviour, that the Gentiles might envy the Christians in nothing."—See *Huet. ment him to the people as a person highly favoured by the gods.

And indeed if we consider what an obscure person, and of what mean original, Vespasian was, there seems to be the greater reason why Apollonius, and others of that party should think of some expedient or other to raise him a reputation in the world, answerable to the new station of life they had advised him to accept: and, whoever considers farther, ¹ what various artifices were at that time made use of, to procure an opinion of divinity in the emperors, will not much wonder, that such report should be spread of them, or that certain persons should be suborned to feign such distempers, and then to give it out, that the touch of the emperor's hand had cured them; though it must be confessed, ² some are of opinion, that what is reported of Vespasian to this purpose, cannot fairly be denied, and might perhaps be providentially intended, to give some dignity and superior character to a person, who in conjunction with his son Titus, was appointed by God to be a signal instrument of the divine vengeance on the Jewish nation.

Allowing then, that God, for wise ends of his providence, might, now and then, permit some eminent person to do a real miracle; yet what is this to that vast number and great variety recorded of our Saviour, who, in the small space of his ministry, did more wonderful works of this kind, than what Moses and all the prophets put together, from the earliest account of time that we read of, are known to have done.

³ The Jews indeed, to swell the account of Moses's miracles, reckon each of those that he did in Egypt double; one, as a miracle of justice, in punishing Pharaoh and his people, and the other as a miracle of mercy, in preserving the Israelites from the like destruction. But, after all their pains and contrivance, the sum amounts to very little, in comparison to the many that are recorded of our blessed Saviour. The miracles of all the prophets put together, by the Jews on computation, do not equal those of Moses; and yet we must remember, that Moses lived an hundred and twenty years, forty of which were one continued scene of action; and that the compass of the prophets, from the creation of the world, to the destruction of the second temple, includes three thousand and some hundreds. Lay this together, and it evidently follows that such extraordinary demonstrations of the divine presence and power were very thin, and sparingly exhibited, when set against the innumerable instances of them, in the three, or, at most, four years' preaching of the blessed Jesus. And, if the wonders related by the evangelists, as done by himself, in so short a time, do far exceed what both Moses and all the prophets did, what shall we say to those many more that are not related? What to the infinitely more still, that were done by the apostles and disciples, in confirmation of the doctrine he had taught? Doubtless, the miraculous power which he communicated to them was infinitely great, when, in order to obtain cures, ⁴ 'the people brought forth the sick into the streets, and laid them on beds, that at least the shadow of Peter passing by might overshadow some of them;' and when, from ⁵ 'Paul's body were brought unto the sick handkerchiefs, and aprons, and the diseases parted from them, and evil spirits went out of them.'

To sum up what has been said on this subject. Since a real miracle is such an operation as can be done by none but God, or such as are appointed by him, and was therefore, in all ages, acknowledged as an authentic proof of a divine mission; since the prophets, in their predictions of the Messiah, represent him as working miracles of a kind and merciful nature; and our Saviour, when he entered upon his ministry, and assumed that character, displayed a wonderful power in works of the same kind; since that power could proceed from no other cause but a communication from God, and yet to imagine, that God would communicate any part of his power to give sanction to an impostor, is a thing repugnant to his sacred attributes; since, upon examination, it appears, that all the marks and characters of true miracles concur in the works of Jesus, but violent suspicions of trick and artifice in those that are named in competition with him; since besides these characters of their truth, the number of those which he did, besides those that were done by persons acting in his name, and by his authority, was greater than what all the true workers of miracles, namely, Moses, and the prophets, had done through the whole compass of the Old Testament: since these things appear to be thus, I say, we are under a necessity to conclude, that our blessed Saviour must have been the true Messiah promised to the Jews, and characterized in the writings of their prophets; that he was the great messenger of the covenant sent from God; for ⁶ 'if he had not been of God, he could have done nothing;' and consequently, that the message which he delivered to us, containing this covenant, or, what is all one, that the religion which he hath settled in the world, and confirmed by so many incontestible proofs, so far as the testimony of miracles is available, cannot but be true.

CHAP. IV.—On miracles.

SUPPLEMENTAL BY THE EDITOR.

THE preceding dissertation on miracles is satisfactory, so far as it goes, but it does not meet all the objections which the ingenuity of modern infidelity has devised with regard to this branch of the Christian evidences. The object of this chapter is to supply the author's deficiencies, and to present the reader with a comprehensive view of the arguments by which the objections of the infidel may be refuted, and the truth of Scripture miracles completely demonstrated.

The advocates of Revealed religion affirm, without any fear of refutation, that the argument resulting from the completion of prophecy is one that is continually increasing in force; while they are often as ready to admit, that the argument from miracles diminishes in proportion as we recede farther from the apostolic times. But we shall endeavour to show, that this is a concession which need not be made: but that we have as good reason to believe the miraculous facts of Scripture, as any except eye-witnesses, or those who received their information immediately from the lips of eye-witnesses.

The evidence flowing from the performance of miracles is indeed so summary and convincing, that it may be stated satisfactorily in very few words: for this reason, however, as it should seem, it has been selected by ingenious unbelievers to exercise their dexterity and acumen upon; and thus it becomes requisite to discuss this subject with a minuteness and comparative prolixity which might, otherwise, have been altogether avoided.

By miracles, we do not mean "juggling tricks," but supernatural events. This genuine notion of miracles has been sometimes obscured by definition; yet a candid inquirer after truth cannot well mistake. Most of the opinions entertained by men of good sense, apart from any controversial views as to this topic are correct. No man would think that curing lameness, by a regular surgical or medical process, was miraculous: every man would say that the instantaneous production of a limb, and "making the maimed whole," was miraculous. And this exactly reaches the logical scientific notion of miracles: for, when such effects are produced as, cæteris paribus, are usually produced, God is said to operate according to the common course of nature: but when such effects are produced as are, cæteris paribus, contrary to, or different from, that common course, they are said to be MIRACULOUS."

Now no man will presume to affirm that it is impossible a teacher should be sent from God. It may be necessary that one should be sent; and we think that a train of observation and deduction of facts might readily be produced to establish that necessity. If one or more be sent, they must bring credentials to evince that their mission is divine; and what can those credentials be but miracles? In fact, the very idea of a revelation includes that of miracles. A revelation cannot be made but by a miraculous interposition of Deity: so that the probability of a revelation implies a correspondent probability of the occurrence of miracles; and the necessity of a revelation, a like necessity of miracles. Nay, we may venture to affirm farther, that there is a mutual and necessary correlation between the two; for, as, on the one hand, miracles, or prophecies, which are in fact miraculous, being contrary to the course of nature, are necessary to prove the divine authority of an agent; so, on the other hand, the performance of uncontrolled miracles, or the delivery of true predictions, immediately suggests to the mind the conviction that they have been permitted solely for the purpose of proving that the person, by whom they are performed, is employed by God to do something, or reveal something, which mankind would not have known in any other way.

It is, one would suppose, almost an intuitive truth, that, when a person performs evident and uncontrolled miracles in proof of any doctrine, those who have sufficient evidence of the reality of such miracles ought to admit the doctrine to be true, or from God. At all events, the proposition is easily deduced from a few steps of obvious reasoning; limiting it, as we have done, with Baxter, Barrow, and Chandler, to uncontrolled miracles, or those the apparent design of which is not contradicted either by the absurdity of the thing they are intended to prove, or by some equal or greater miracles opposed to them. We thus exclude every thing like juggling from the idea of miracles; and at the same time free ourselves from all consideration of pretended miracles, such as those performed by the Egyptian magicians, with the permission or the performance of which, as they were controlled, we have nothing to do. The reasoning from which our proposition flows is simply this: a genuine miracle cannot be performed without an extraordinary divine interposition, either mediate or immediate. If the Supreme Being would confirm the truth of a proposition to one man, by the testimony of another to whom it was immediately revealed, we can conceive no method by which it would be so effectually accomplished, as by conferring on him power to work a miracle in confirmation of it. When a miracle is uncontrolled, we can conjecture no particular by which it can be distinguished from a miracle wrought to confirm a truth. If God were to suffer an uncontrolled miracle to be wrought in confirmation of a falsehood, there would seem to be no criterion by which his testimony could be distinguished. It is inconsistent with the wisdom and goodness of God, to suffer an uncontrolled miracle to be wrought to establish a falsehood; since it would leave his creatures in a perpetual uncertainty, and an uncertainty that would be most painful to the most virtuous, who have always most wished for a revelation. Since, therefore, God is both wise and good, it follows that a proposition, attested by uncontrolled miracles, is attested by him, and is of necessity true.

From this reasoning it is natural to expect, that in the Scripture history there should be recorded many miracles; and thus, on examining the sacred volume, are our expectations realized. The faith of Moses was confirmed by the miracle of the burning, yet unconsumed, bush. Moses convinced the children of Israel that God employed him to lead them out of Egypt, by performing miracles by means of his rod: he appealed to similar miracles before Pharaoh for the same purpose: the passage through the Red Sea, which opened to deliver the Israelites from the Egyptians, who were afterwards swallowed up in the collapsing waters, was miraculous: the gushing of waters from a solid rock, on its being struck by Moses, was miraculous; the passage of the river Jordan, under Joshua, the standing still of the sun and moon at his command, and the falling of the walls of Jericho, were miraculous: the sacrifice kindled by fire from heaven; the raising of the Shunamite's and of the widow of Sarepta's sons; the destruction of the captains and their fifties by fire from heaven; the dividing of the waters of Jordan by means of the mantle of Elijah, and the translation of that prophet, are events of the same class; and so are those recorded in Daniel, respecting the fiery furnace and the den of lions. From the numerous New Testament miracles, beginning with that wrought at the marriage at Cana, we cannot attempt to make an adequate selection. Though it may be proper to remark, that those performed by Jesus Christ differed essentially from others: Moses could not work miracles without his rod; the apostles performed theirs, for the most part expressly, and always virtually, 'in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth:' the Messiah exerted miraculous power from himself, without any reference to another. And, farther, the miracles of Jesus Christ were uniformly benevolent:—he cured the sick,—he healed the lame, he made the maimed whole,—he made the deaf to hear, the blind to see, the dumb to speak, he raised the dead, and finally he raised himself; thus evincing at once the greatest miracle, and the sublimest act of benevolence; for, as he ‘died for our sins,’ so he ‘rose again for our justification.’ So numerous, indeed, and so beneficial were his miracles, that ‘the multitude were astonished, saying, it was never seen so in Israel;’ and well might their astonishment be excited, as our Lord wrought more benevolent miracles in one afternoon, (See Mat. ix. 18—34.) than had been performed by any of the prophets in all their lives.

That one great object, kept in view by Christ and his apostles in performing miracles, was to furnish awakening and convincing proofs of their divine mission, is evident from the uniform tenor of the New Testament Histories. The language of the Jewish Ruler was the pure unadulterated language of common sense, the force of which all the sophistry in the world cannot weaken: ‘Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him.’ (John iii. 2.) The chief priests and the Pharisees had the same conviction; for, said they, after Lazarus was raised from the dead, ‘this man doeth many miracles: if we let him alone, all will believe on him.’ (John xi. 47, 48.) Jesus Christ himself appeals to his miracles: ‘I have greater witnesses, says he, than that of John, for the works which the Father hath given me to finish, the works that I do, bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me.’ (John v. 36.) And again, when the Jews asked him, if thou be the Christ tell us plainly. How long dost thou make us to doubt? Jesus answered, ‘the works that I do, they bear witness of me. If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. But if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works; that ye may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in him.’ ‘If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin.’ (John x. 24, 25, 37, 38; xv. 24.) And on another occasion, when John sent his disciples to Christ to ask, ‘Art thou HE that should come, or do we look for another? Jesus answered and said unto them, go and show John again those things which ye do hear and see: the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached unto them.’ (Mat. xi. 3, 4, 5.) In like manner, with regard to the apostles, ‘God also bare them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his own will.’ (Heb. ii. 4. Acts xiv. 9; x. 38, 39, &c.)

Consistently with this, the early Christian writers and apologists, in all those cases where they do not assume the history as true, and thence argue that Jesus ought to be received as the Messiah, appeal in very express terms to his miracles. Thus Quadratus appeals very strongly to those miracles. Justin Martyr asserts the performance of miracles by Jesus in as forcible words as language will admit, and assigns the reason why he rather had recourse to the argument from prophecy, than that from miracles; namely, that his opponents would ascribe the latter to magic. Irenæus, Lactantius, Tertullian, Origen, Augustin, and Jerome, speak of Christ’s miracles, and often, indeed, of those wrought subsequently to the apostolic times, and notice the same evasion on the part of the adversaries to Christianity.

It is highly worthy of remark, too, that none of the early opposers of the religion of Jesus, pretend to dispute that he performed miracles. Lucian, Julian, Porphyry, Hierocles, Celsus, &c., admit that miracles were wrought. Julian, it is true, endeavours to make light of them, and wonders that so much stir should be made about a person, who merely ‘opened the eyes of the blind, restored limbs to the lame, and delivered persons possessed.’ Celsus, again, ridicules the miracles, but never disputes that they occurred. “Well, said he, suppose that you really did those things that ye talk of; pray must we deem the persons who perform such wonderful operations to be sons of God; or must we not rather deem them vile wretches, well versed in a diabolical art?” Now, who can imagine, for a moment, that so violent an opposer of Christianity would have admitted the miracles of Christ as real facts, had he not been compelled to it by the universal consent of all inquiring men of the age in which he lived? Hence it may be asked, with Mr F. Cunningham, “whether modern infidels who have ventured to contradict the miracles of Christ, a weapon Celsus was afraid to take up, have estimated the rashness of their enterprise? Are they competent to deny what a spectator no less malevolent than themselves was compelled to admit? Has the lapse of eighteen hundred years enabled them to ascertain a fact of daily occurrence with more accuracy than a bystander? Are objects best seen at the greatest distance?”

Thus it appears, that we have the most marked and direct testimony of the friends of Revealed religion, those, too, who had been converted from heathenism by the weight of its evidence, and the concessions of its enemies, in favour of those miracles, which were performed in order to prove that the religion came from God; and this testimony, and these concessions, were delivered so near the period in which the miracles were supposed to have been wrought, that they cannot be accounted for in any other way than by admitting that both Christians and unbelievers, in the early ages, were convinced that something which required more than human energy had occurred. Why, then, should this be disputed in these remote ages?

Voltaire and Mr Hume will answer this question, by telling us in effect, though not in express words, “that since miracles are not wrought now, they never were wrought at all.”

The substance of Mr Hume’s argument, which I describe, because almost all later Deists have echoed his sentiments, is this: “experience, which in some things is variable, in others is uniform, is our only guide in reasoning concerning matters of fact. Variable experience gives rise to probability only; a uniform experience amounts to proof. Our belief of any fact, from the testimony of eye-witnesses, is derived from no other principle than our experience of the veracity of human testimony. If the fact attested be miraculous, there arises a contest of two opposite experiences, or proof against proof. Now, a miracle is a violation of the laws of nature; and as a firm and unalterable experience has established these laws, the proof against a miracle from the very nature of the fact, is as complete as any argument from experience can possibly be imagined; and if so, it is an undeniable consequence, that it cannot be surmounted by any proof whatever derived from human testimony."

A. M. 4035. A. D. 31; OR, A. M. 5411, A. D. 30. FROM MAT. xii. 1—xvii. 14. MARK ii. 23—ix. 14. LUKE vi. 1—ix. 37. JOHN v. 1—vii. 1.

Now, to this reasoning, or the most prominent and essential parts of it, several decisive answers have been, or may be given. A few of these may properly find a place here.

I. Dr Campbell, in his celebrated "Dissertation on Miracles," shows the fallacy of Mr Hume's argument thus: "The evidence arising from human testimony is not solely derived from experience: on the contrary, testimony has a natural influence on belief, antecedent to experience. The early and unlimited assent given to testimony by children, gradually contracts as they advance in life: it is, therefore, more consonant to truth to say, that our diffidence in testimony is the result of experience, than that our faith in it has this foundation. Besides, the uniformity of experience in favour of any fact is not a proof against its being reversed in a particular instance. The evidence arising from the single testimony of a man of known veracity will go farther to establish a belief of its being actually reversed. If his testimony be confirmed by a few others of the same character, we cannot withhold our assent to the truth of it. Now, though the operations of nature are governed by uniform laws, and though we have not the testimony of our senses in favour of any violation of them; still if, in particular instances, we have the testimony of thousands of our fellow-creatures, and those, too, men of strict integrity, swayed by no motives of ambition or interest, and governed by the principles of common sense, that they were actually witnesses of these violations, the constitution of our nature obliges us to believe them."

II. Mr Hume's reasoning is founded upon too limited a view of the laws and course of nature. If we consider things duly, we shall find that lifeless matter is utterly incapable of obeying any laws, or of being endued with any powers: and, therefore, what is usually called the course of nature can be nothing else than the arbitrary will and pleasure of God, acting continually upon matter according to certain rules of uniformity, still bearing a relation to contingencies. So that it is as easy for the Supreme Being to alter what men think the course of nature, as to preserve it. Those effects, which are produced in the world regularly and insensibly, and which are usually termed the works of nature, prove the constant providence of Deity; those, on the contrary, which, upon any extraordinary occasion, are produced in such a manner as it is manifest could not have been either by human power, or by what is called chance, prove undeniably the immediate interposition of the Deity on that especial occasion. God, it must be recollected, is the governor of the moral as well as of the physical world; and since the moral well-being of the universe is of more consequence than its physical order and regularity, it follows, obviously, that the laws, conformably with which the material world seems generally to be regulated, are subservient, and may occasionally yield, to the laws by which the moral world is governed. Although, therefore, a miracle is contrary to the usual course of nature, and would indeed lose its beneficial effect, if it were not so, it cannot thence be inferred that it is "a violation of the laws of nature," allowing the term to include a regard to moral tendencies. The laws by which a wise and holy God governs the world, cannot, unless he is pleased to reveal them, be learned in any other way than from testimony; since, on this supposition, nothing but testimony can bring us acquainted with the whole series of his dispensations, and this kind of knowledge is absolutely necessary previously to our correctly inferring those laws. Testimony, therefore, must be admitted as constituting the principal means of discovering the real laws by which the universe has been regulated; that testimony assures us, that the apparent course of nature has often been interrupted to produce important moral effects: and we must not at random disregard such testimony, because, in estimating its credibility, we ought to look almost infinitely more at the moral, than at the physical, circumstances connected with any particular event.

III. But the defence of miracles against the objections of infidels need not be thrown wholly upon these general and abstract reasonings, satisfactory and cogent as they are. The miracles recorded in Scripture, and especially those performed by Moses, by Jesus Christ, and his apostles, are accompanied by evidence such as you will find it difficult to adduce in support of any other historic fact, and such as cannot possibly be brought in support of any pretended fact whatever; evidence, such as the pretended miracles of Mahometanism, and those of the Romish church, are totally destitute of.

The truth of a matter of fact may be positively inferred and known, if it be attended by certain criteria, such as no pretended fact can possibly have. These criteria are at least four. It is required, first, that the fact be a sensible fact, such as men's outward senses can judge of: secondly, that it be notorious, performed publicly in the presence of witnesses: thirdly, that there be memorials of it, or monuments, actions, and customs, kept up in commemoration of it: fourthly, that such monuments and actions commence with the fact. There may be facts in favour of which these four marks cannot be produced; but the argument of Leslie, and St Real, is, that whatever has all these four marks cannot be false.

For example, could Moses have persuaded six hundred thousand men that he had led them through the Red Sea in the manner related in Exodus, or have instituted the passover in commemoration of the destruction of the Egyptian first-born, if these circumstances had never occurred? Could he make the Israelites fancy that they were fed miraculously with manna forty years in the wilderness, or that, during all that period, their 'raiment waxed not old, neither did their feet swell,' (Deut. viii. 4; xxix. 5.) unless those things, however extraordinary, were facts? Here our four criteria apply. The first two secure from any cheat or imposture, at the time the facts occurred, and the last two preserve equally against any imposition in after ages; because the authors of the book in which these facts are related, speak of it as written at that time by the actors or eye-witnesses, and as commanded by God to be carefully kept and preserved to all generations, and read publicly to all the people at stated times. (Deut. xxxi. 10, 11, 12.

A. M. 4035. A. D. 31; OR, A. M. 5441. A. D. 30. FROM MAT. xii. 1—xvii. 14. MARK ii. 23—ix. 14. LUKE vi. 1—ix. 37. JOHN v. 1—vii. 1.

Josh. viii. 34, 35. Neh. viii.) And farther, the institutions appointed in this book were to be perpetually observed from the day of each institution for ever, among these people, in memory of the miraculous facts. Now, suppose this book to have been forged a hundred or a thousand years after the time of Moses; would not every one say when it first appeared, "We never heard of this book before; we know of no such institutions, as of a passover, or circumcision, or sabbaths, and the many feasts and fasts therein appointed; we know nothing of a tribe of Levi, or of a tabernacle in which they were to serve in such an order of priesthood: this book must be an arrant forgery, for it is destitute of all those marks which it gives of itself, as to its own continuance, and of those institutions which it relates." No instance can be shown since the world began of any book so substantiated that was a forgery, and yet passed off, as exhibiting truth, upon any people.

Mr Leslie, however, does not stop here, but adds a fifth mark as peculiar to our Bible, distinguishing it from all other histories, relating facts that formerly occurred: that is, that the book, in which the facts are related, contains likewise the law of that people to whom it belongs, and is their statute book by which their causes are determined. This will render it impossible for any one to coin or forge such a book, so as to make it pass as authentic among any people. If, for example, a person should forge a statute-book for England, and publish it next term, could he make all the judges, lawyers, and people believe that this was their genuine and only statute book by which their causes had been determined for centuries past? They must forget their old statute-book, and believe that this new book, which they never saw or heard of before, was the very book which had been referred to in the pleadings in Westminster-hall for so many ages, which had been so often printed, and of which the originals are now kept in the Tower, to be consulted, as there is occasion. Thus it is that the books of Moses contain, not only the history of the Jews, but also their municipal law, as well civil as ecclesiastical: and thus, also, it is with respect to the New Testament, which is the spiritual and ecclesiastical law to the Christian church in all nations; and which cannot, therefore, be corrupted, unless all persons in all nations whithersoever Christianity is spread, should conspire in the corruption of the Gospel.

Mr Leslie selects some striking, though familiar, examples in illustration of his general argument; among others, he adverts to the Stonehenge on Salisbury Plain, and compares it with the stones set up at Gilgal. Every one, as he observes, knows this Stonehenge, or has heard of it; and yet none know the reason why those great stones were set there, or by whom, or in memory of what. Now, suppose a person should publish a book to-morrow, and therein affirm that these stones were set up by Hercules, Polyphemus, or Garagantua, in memory of such and such of their actions: if he merely make the affirmation, some few may perhaps give him credit. But if, for farther confirmation of his assertion, he should say in this book, that it was written at the time when such actions were performed, and by the very actors themselves, or by eye-witnesses: and that this book had been received as true, and quoted by authors of the greatest reputation in all ages since: moreover, that this book was well known in England, and enjoined by act of parliament to be taught our children; and that in consequence we did teach it our children, and had been taught it ourselves when we were children; it would seem impertinent to ask any Deist whether he thinks such a delusion could be passed upon the people of England.

Let us now compare this with the Stonehenge, as we may call it, or twelve great stones set up at Gilgal, and erected in order that when the children of the Israelites in after ages should inquire their meaning, it should be told them. (Josh. iv. 6, 7.) The occurrence, in commemoration of which these stones at Gilgal were set up, is as wonderful and miraculous as the passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea, and free from the puerile carpings which have been raised by unbelievers against that remarkable event. Notice of this miraculous passage over the Jordan at Gilgal was given to the people on the preceding day. (Josh. iii. 5.) It took place at noonday before the whole nation. And when the waters of the Jordan were divided, it was not at any low ebb, but at the time when the river overflowed its banks. (Josh. iii. 15.) It was effected, too, not by winds, or in length of time, which winds would require to accomplish it; but all on a sudden, as soon as the 'feet of the priests that bare the ark were dipped in the brim of the water, then the waters which came from above stood, and rose up upon an heap: and they that came down toward the sea of the plain, even the salt-sea, failed, and were cut off; and the people passed over right against Jericho. And the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord stood firm on dry ground in the midst of Jordan, until all the people were passed clean over Jordan. And it came to pass, when the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord were come up out of the midst of Jordan, and the soles of the priests' feet were lift up unto the dry land, that the waters of Jordan returned into their place, and flowed over all his banks, as they did before. And the people came out of Jordan on the tenth day of the first month, and encamped in Gilgal, in the east border of Jericho. And those twelve stones, which the twelve men, from every tribe a man, took out of the midst of Jordan, did Joshua pitch in Gilgal. And he spake unto the children of Israel, saying, when your children shall ask their fathers in time to come, saying, what mean these stones? then ye shall let your children know, saying, Israel came over this Jordan on dry land. For the Lord your God dried up the waters of Jordan from before you, until ye were passed over, as the Lord your God did to the Red Sea, which he dried up from before us until we were gone over: that all the people of the earth might know the hand of the Lord, that it is mighty: that ye might fear the Lord your God for ever.' (Josh. iii. 15—17; iv. 18—24.)

Now to frame our argument, let it be supposed that there never was any such occurrence as that passage over Jordan; that these stones at Gilgal were set up on some other occasion, in some after age; and then that some designing man invented this book of Joshua, and pretended that it was written by Joshua at this time; adducing this erection of stones at Gilgal as a testimony of the truth of it. Would not the Israelites say to him, "we know the stoneage at Gilgal, but we never before heard this reason assigned for it: nor of this book of Joshua. Where has it been all this while? and where, and how came you, after so many ages, to find it? Besides, we are told in this book, that this same passage over Jordan was ordained to be taught our children, from age to age; and therefore that they were always to be instructed in the meaning of that stonage at Gilgal, as a memorial of it. But we were never taught it when we were children; nor did we ever teach our children any such thing. And it is not at all likely that could have been forgotten, while so remarkable a stonage continued, which was set up for that and no other purpose.”

If, then, for the reasons before assigned, no such imposition could be practised successfully upon us as to the Stonehenge upon Salisbury Plain, how much less could it be with regard to the erection at Gilgal?

And farther, if, when we know not the reason of an insulated monument, such a delusive reason cannot be imposed; how much more impossible is it to impose on us in actions and observances which we celebrate in memory of particular miraculous events? How impossible to make us forget those passages which we daily commemorate; and to persuade us that we had always observed such institutions or ceremonies in memory of what we never before heard of; that is, that we knew it before we knew it! And if it be found thus impossible to practise an imposition upon us, even in some things which have not all the four criteria before-mentioned, how much more impossible is it that there should be any deceit with regard to particulars in which all those criteria actually meet.

Similar reasoning is applied with equal success by this acute writer to the principal facts, including the miraculous ones, recorded in the Evangelical history. The works and the miracles of Jesus Christ are said, by the Evangelists, to be done publicly in the face of the world; and so, indeed, himself affirmed in reasoning with his accusers: ‘I spake openly to the world, and in secret have I said nothing.’ (John xviii. 20. See on this point, Horne on the Study of the Scriptures, vol. i. p. 541, 1st edit.) We learn also in the Acts of the Apostles, that three thousand at one time, and more than two thousand at another, (Acts ii. 41; iv. 4.) were converted, upon conviction of what themselves had seen and known, what had been done publicly before their eyes, and in particulars respecting which it was impossible to impose upon them. So that here we find the two first of Mr Leslie’s criteria.

Then for the two second:—Baptism and the Lord’s Supper were instituted as perpetual memorials of these things: they were not instituted in after ages, but at the very time when the circumstances to which they relate took place; and they have been observed without interruption, through the whole Christian world, in all ages down from that time to the present. Besides, Christ himself ordained apostles, and other ministers of his Gospel, to preach and administer the sacraments; and that always ‘even unto the end of the world.’ (Mat. xxviii. 20.) Accordingly, they have continued by regular succession to this day. So that the Christian ministry is, and always has been, as notorious in point of fact, as the tribe of Levi among the Jews. The Gospel also is as much a law, a rule of conduct to the Christians, as the books of Moses to the Jews: and it being part of the matters of fact or truths related in the Gospel that ‘pastors and teachers,’ (Ephes. iv. 11.) were appointed by Christ, and to continue till the end of the world; consequently if the Gospel history and doctrines were invented, as they must be, if forged at all, in some ages after Christ; then, at the time of the invention, there could be no such order of clergy or ministers as derived themselves from the institution of Christ; a circumstance which must give the lie to the Gospel, and demonstrate the whole to be false. The miraculous actions of Christ and his Apostles being affirmed to be true no otherwise than as there were at that identical time, whenever the Deist will suppose the Gospel history to be forged, not only sacraments or ordinances of Christ’s institution, but an order of Christian pastors, &c., to administer them; and it being impossible there could be any such things before they were invented, it is as impossible they should be received and accredited when invented. Hence it follows that it was as impossible to have imposed these miraculous relations upon mankind in after ages, as it would have been to make persons believe they saw the miracles, or were parties concerned in the beneficial effects resulting from them, if they were not.

IV. Notwithstanding all that has been said, however, by Leslie and others, since there is no making a fence high enough to keep out extravagant conjectures and surmises, we find unbelievers exclaiming after all, that still men’s senses might be imposed upon. To reasoning we may always oppose reasoning; and it is often perfectly legitimate to oppose conjecture to conjecture; yet, with regard to the New Testament miracles, we cannot have so ill an opinion of the intellects of infidels as to conjecture that they really believe—

“That persons afflicted with the most excruciating maladies and diseases should be juggled into perfect ease and health, and cured, as Celsus pretended, by legerdemain:

“That blind men should see, the lame walk, the deaf hear, the dumb speak, lepers be cleansed, and dead men come to life, merely by the play of fancy, and the force of imagination:

“That the senses of whole multitudes should be imposed upon to such a degree that they should all fancy together, they saw, heard, spake, ate and drank, repeated these actions many times over, and that in different places and circumstances, too, and yet, after all, did nothing of all this; but were either asleep, or in ecstasy, or under the influence of some strange charm all the while:

“That five thousand men, for example, at one time and four thousand at another, besides women and children, should persuade themselves they fed only upon a few loaves and fishes; should publish it to all the country that they did so; refer to time, place, and persons present; and yet, instead of this, have been in fact at a splendid and magnificent feast, where plenty and variety of all provisions, fit to entertain such multitudes, were set before him.”

If these things may be, of what utility are our senses? What dependence can be placed upon them? or what credit can be due to a Deist who attests nothing but upon experience, and yet admits that thousands together may be deceived in reference to some of the most common and frequent actions and functions in human life?

In truth, there are but four hypotheses that can be assumed with respect to the miracles of Jesus Christ, one or other of which a reasonable being must adopt.

Either, first, the recorded accounts of those miracles were absolute fictions wickedly invented by some persons who had a wish to impose upon mankind :

Or, secondly, Jesus Christ did not work any true miracles ; but the senses of the people were in some way or other deluded, so that they believed he really did perform miracles, when in fact he did not :

Or, thirdly, that the spectators were not in any way deluded, but knew very well he wrought no miracles : yet were all, both enemies and friends, the Jews themselves not excepted, though they daily “sought occasion against him,” united in a close confederacy to persuade the world that he performed the most surprising things. So that, while some actively circulated reports of these amazing occurrences, the rest kept their counsel, never offering to unmask the fraud, but managing the matter with so much cunning and dexterity, and such an exact mutual harmony and correspondence, that the story of Jesus Christ’s performing miracles should become current, should obtain almost universal credit, and not a single person be able to disprove it :

Or, fourthly, that he did actually perform these astonishing works, and that the accounts given of them by the Christian writers in the New Testament are authentic and correct.

He that does not adopt the last of these conclusions will find it a matter of very small consequence which of the three others he chooses. For that the stories cannot be fictions is evident from the reasoning of Leslie already adduced : and it will be seen farther, from a few moments’ consideration, that the denial of the miracles of Jesus Christ, in any way, leads necessarily to the admission of a series of real miracles of another kind.

The progress of the human mind, as may be seen by all the inquiries into it, is a thing of a determinate nature : a man’s thoughts, words, and actions, are all generated by something previous ; there is an established course for these things, as well as for the physical part of the universe, an analogy, of which every man is a judge from what he feels in himself, and observes in others : and to suppose any number of men in determinate circumstances to vary from this general tenour of human nature in like circumstances is a miracle, and may, as Dr Hartley remarks, be made a miracle of any magnitude, that is, incredible to any degree, by augmenting the number and magnitude of the deviations. It is therefore a miracle in the human mind, as great as any that can possibly be conceived to take place with regard to the body, to suppose that multitudes of Christians, Jews, and heathens, in the primitive times, should have borne such unquestionable testimony, some expressly, others by indirect circumstances, as we learn from history they did, to the miracles said to be performed by our Lord upon the human body, unless they were really performed. In like manner, the reception which the miracles recorded in the Old Testament met with is a miracle, unless those miracles were true. These are not however the only miracles which unbelievers in the Scripture miracles must admit. The very determination of the apostles to propagate the belief of false miracles, independent of the additional difficulty arising from the silent concurrence of the Jews and Gentiles in the story, according to the third hypothesis suggested above, in support of such a religion as that taught in the New Testament, is as great a miracle as human imagination can conceive. For when they formed this design, whether they hoped to succeed, or conjectured that they should fail, in their undertaking, they chose what they knew to be moral evil, with the contingency of experiencing natural evil ; nay, so desirous were they to obtain nothing but misery, that they made their own persecution a test of the truth of their doctrines ;—thus violating the strongest possible of all laws of human nature, namely, that “no man can choose evil for its own sake.”

Here, then, an unbeliever must either deny all analogy, association, uniformity of action, operation of motives, selection of good in preference to evil, &c., and become an absolute sceptic in the most extensive acceptance of the term, or acknowledge that very strong physical analogies may sometimes be violated ; that is, he must have recourse to something miraculous in order that he may get quit of something miraculous. Let him next inquire which of the two opposite classes of miracles will agree best with his other notions : whether it be more analogous to the nature of God, the course of providence, the history of the world, the known progress of man in this life, &c., to allow that God imparted to certain select persons, of eminent piety, the power of working miracles ; or to suppose that he confounded the understandings, affections, and whole train of associations, of thousands of persons, nay, of entire nations, in such a manner that men, who in all other things seemed to have acted like other men, should, in respect of the history of Jesus Christ, the prophets, or the Apostles, abandon all established rules of thinking and acting, and conduct themselves in a way miraculously repugnant to all our ideas and all our experience. In order to determine this inquiry, let it not be forgotten that the object of the class of miracles against which the Deists contend, is worthy of a God of infinite wisdom, power, and goodness : while the object of the latter is decidedly and absolutely inconsistent with wisdom and goodness, attributes which all Theists ascribe to that Great Being by whom alone miracles can be performed, allowing that they can be wrought at all.

V. Much of the preceding reasoning is entirely independent of any minute investigation of the nature of concurrent or successive testimony ; and the whole discussion might safely be terminated without any reference to these abstruser inquiries, were it not that Hume and his disciples have frequently adverted to them, and that silence might be construed into inability to break through their web of sophistry. The argument of Dr Campbell has already been briefly sketched ; we shall here add a few distinct considerations. And, first, with regard to concurrent testimony, it has been demonstrated upon genuine mathematical principles, that where the credibility of each witness is great, a very few witnesses will be sufficient to overcome any contrary probability, derived from the nature of the fact ; that the evidence resulting from testimony can not only approach indefinitely near to certainty, but can at length exceed the evidence of any inference, however cogent, which can possibly be deduced from personal experience, or from personal and derived experience conjointly; that is, that the evidence of testimony can overcome any degree of improbability, however great, which can arise from the nature of the fact. The reason is, that the evidence of testimony admitting of an unlimited increase on two different accounts, namely, that of the veracity of the witnesses, and that of the number of concurrent witnesses, while the probability of the happening of any specific event admits only one of them, the former is capable of indefinitely surpassing the latter.

But, indeed, the force of the evidence resulting from concurrent testimony, is avowedly so great upon the minds of all who have not been biassed by the perusal of deistical speculations, or an indulgence in them, that the matter scarcely needs the support of mathematical investigation. Let it be supposed that twelve men of probity and good sense were circumstantially and seriously to tell, each independently of the others, on his own personal conviction, “a round unvarnished tale” of a miracle performed before their eyes, and respecting which it was impossible, as they affirm, for them to be deceived, we believe few persons would wait to receive a thirteenth concurrent testimony, before they yielded their assent to the truth of the relation, however extraordinary. Let it be supposed, farther, that the twelve evidences, on being suspected of “bearing false witness,” subjected themselves to be scourged, tortured, nay strangled, rather than deny the truth of their attestation; could any reasonable or reasoning man refuse to believe their testimony? According to Mr Hume’s argumentation, we are not to believe them, were we to witness such a story and such sufferings; but we are so persuaded that no person in his senses would disbelieve them, that we will venture to say even Mr Hume, under such circumstances, could not have withheld his assent to the truth of their story.

“But,” say his disciples, “whatever might be done or conceded in such a case, those who live a thousand years after the event, can have no reason to believe it: if we admit that concurrent testimony may augment; still successive testimony diminishes, and that so rapidly, as to command no assent after a few centuries at most.” This is specious; but, as we remarked at the commencement of this letter, far from correct. We do not deny that there may be cases in which credibility diminishes with time; but no testimony is really, in the nature of things rendered less credible by any other cause, than the loss or want of some of those conditions which first made it rationally credible. A testimony continues equally credible, so long as it is transmitted with all those circumstances and conditions which first procured it a certain degree of credit amongst men, proportionate to the intrinsic value of those conditions. Let it be supposed that the persons who transmit the testimony are able, honest, and diligent, in all the requisite inquiries as to what they transmit, and how should the credibility due to their testimony be weakened, but by the omission of circumstances? which omission is contrary to the hypothesis. No calculation of the decrease of the credibility of testimony, in which a man bears witness respecting realities, and not the fictions of his own brain, can ever proceed upon any other principle than that of the characters and qualifications of the witnesses: and therefore, so far as the credibility of any matter of fact depends upon pure testimony, they who live at the remotest distances of time, may have the same evidence of the truth of it, as those persons who lived nearest to the time in which the thing was said to be done; that identical time being, of course, excluded.

In what possible manner, for example, can the evidence on which we believe the facts related in the gospels be less than that on which those facts were credited by Christians in the second or third centuries? They possessed the standard writings of the evangelists; so do we: what those books then contained, they now contain; and the invention of printing seems likely under the care of Providence, to preserve them genuine to the end of time. This admirable invention has so far secured all considerable monuments of antiquity, that no ordinary calamities of wars, dissolutions of governments, &c., can destroy any material evidence now in existence, or render it less probable to those who shall live in a thousand years’ time, than it is to us. With regard to the facts of the Christian religion, indeed, it is notorious that our evidence in favour of them has increased instead of diminished since the era of printing, the reformation of religion, and the restoration of letters: and as even the recent inquiries of learned men have produced fresh evidence there is every reason to hope it will continue to increase.

Indeed, it is only with regard to the facts related in the Bible, that men ever talk of the daily diminution of credibility. Who complains of a decay of evidence in relation to the actions of Alexander, Hannibal, Pompey, or Cæsar? How many fewer of the events recorded by Plutarch, or Polybius, or Livy, are believed now, on account of a diminution of the evidence, than were believed by Mr Addison, or Lord Clarendon, or Geoffrey Chaucer? It might be contended with some semblance of probability, that we know more of those ancients than the persons now mentioned: but that it is widely different from accrediting less. We never hear persons wishing that they had lived ages earlier, that they might have had better proofs that Cyrus was the conqueror of Babylon, that Darius was beaten in several battles by Alexander, that Titus destroyed Jerusalem, that Hannibal was entirely routed by Scipio, or Pompey by Julius Cæsar: though we sometimes find men of ardent and enterprising minds exclaiming, “O that I had lived and been present when such and such splendid events occurred: how lively an interest should I have taken in such scenes, how much concern in their termination!” And, indeed, it is the frequent hearing of like exclamations that causes men to confound weight of testimony, with warmth or depth of feeling; and to lose sight of the essential difference between real evidence, or the true basis for belief of history, and the sensible impression or influence which such history may make upon the mind. We believe as firmly, as that Lucretia stabbed herself in the delirium of a fever, as that she had received from Tarquin’s son; yet we feel a much more lively interest in the latter event than in the former. The fate of Carthage, or the result of the contest between Antony and Octavius respecting the empire of the world, would doubtless be much more deeply felt, and much more warmly conversed about, within two centuries of the circumstances, than they ever are now: yet those who then conversed about them, had just as much reason to doubt their occurrence as we have; that is, just none at all. Similar reasoning will apply to all the circumstances recorded in authentic history. So that, having established the genuineness and authenticity of the books of Scripture, on evidence far superior to that on which other historic books are received, it is the most idle and ridiculous thing imaginable, to affect to disbelieve any of the facts therein recorded, on account of the remoteness of the times in which they occurred.

Let me now attempt to collect the scattered arguments, in this letter, with a few additional suggestions, to one point, and conclude. If, then, we have found, upon careful examination, that the miraculous facts proposed for our belief, and on the credit of which the divine authority of a particular system of doctrines and precepts depends, are such,—1. As do not imply a self-contradiction in them. 2. If they appear to have been performed publicly, in the view of several people, and with a professed intention to establish the divine authority of the person or persons who wrought them. 3. If they were many in number, frequently repeated, and continued for a series of years together. 4. If they were of an interesting nature in themselves, likely to have made strong impressions upon the minds of all who saw and heard of them; and for that reason, probably, much attended to, talked of, and examined at the time of their performance. 5. If the effects produced by them were not transient, but lasting, such as, however instantaneous the change might be, must have existed for many years, and were capable all the while of being disproved if they were not real. 6. If the relations were committed to writing at or very near the time when the facts are said to have occurred, and by persons of unimpeachable integrity, who tell us, that ‘that which they have seen and heard, the same declare they unto us;’ by persons who, having sufficient opportunity of knowing the whole truth of what they testify, could not possibly be deceived themselves; and who, having no conceivable motive or temptation to falsify their evidence, cannot, with the least shadow of probability, be suspected of an intention to deceive other people. 7. If there be no proof, or even well-founded suspicion of proof, that the testimony of those who bear witness to these extraordinary facts was ever contradicted, even by such as professed themselves open enemies to their persons, character, and views, though the accounts of the facts were first published upon the spot where they were affirmed to have been originally performed, and amongst persons who were engaged by private interest, and furnished with full authority, inclination, and opportunity, to have manifested the falsity of them, and to have detected the imposture, had they been able. 8. If, on the contrary, the existence of these facts be expressly allowed by the persons who thought themselves most concerned to prevent the genuine consequences which might be deduced from them; and there were originally no other disputes about them than to what sufficient cause they were to be imputed. 9. If again the witnesses from whom we have these facts were many in number, all of them unanimous in the substance of their evidence, and all, as may be collected from their whole conduct, men of such unquestionable good sense as secured them against all delusion in themselves; if they were men who evinced the sincerity of their own conviction, by acting under the uniform influence of the extraordinary works to which they bore witness, in direct contradiction to all their former prejudices and most favoured notions; in direct contradiction also to every flattering prospect of worldly honour, profit, or advantage (as was remarkably exemplified in the case of St Paul); and when they could not but be previously assured that ‘bonds and afflictions waited them;’ (Acts xx. 23.) that ignominy, persecution, misery, and even death itself, most probably would attend the constant and invariable perseverance in their testimony. 10. If these witnesses, in order that their evidence might have the greater weight with a doubting world (each nation being already in possession of an established religion), were themselves enabled to perform such extraordinary works as testified the clear and indisputable interposition of a divine power in favour of their veracity; and after having experienced the severest afflictions, vexations and torments, at length laid down their lives in confirmation of the truth of the facts asserted by them. 11. If great multitudes of the contemporaries of these witnesses, men of almost all nations, tempers, professions, and scales of intellect were persuaded by them that these facts were really performed in the manner related, and gave the strongest testimony which it was in their power to give of the firmness and active tendency of their belief, by immediately breaking through all their previous attachments and connections of interest or friendship, and acting in express contradiction to them. 12. If concurring testimony, carried to a sufficient extent, and especially of this kind, be in its nature really irresistible; and if successive testimony, under the circumstances of the case before us, rather increase than diminish in credibility. 13. If ceremonies and institutions were grounded upon the miraculous facts, and have been uninterruptedly observed in all the successive periods of time, from the date of the facts in commemoration of which they were established. 14. If we have all the proof which the severest rules of criticism can require, that no alterations have been made in the original writings and records left us by these witnesses in any material article of their evidence since their first publication, either through accident or design; but that they have been transmitted to us in all their genuine purity, as they were left by their authors. In such a situation of things, where so great a variety of circumstances, where indeed all imaginable circumstances mutually concur to confirm, strengthen, and support each other’s evidence; without a single argument on the other side, but what arises merely from the extraordinary nature of the facts, and the admission of which inevitably leads to consequences at least as extraordinary as those our opponents are inclined to reject; may not they be justly accused of an unreasonable incredulity who refuse their assent to them? And will not such incredulity be as dangerous as it is ridiculous? If facts, attested in so clear, decisive, and unexceptionable a manner, and delivered down to posterity with so many conspiring signs and monuments of truth, are, nevertheless, not to be believed; it is, I think, impossible for the united wisdom of mankind to point out any evidence of historical events which will justify a wise and cautious man in accrediting them. Where there is the strongest assurance of the occurrence of any particular series of miraculous facts, which we are capable of acquiring, according to the present frame of our nature, and the state of things in the world; to reject these miracles after all, and the religion in attestation of which they were wrought, and to pretend to exculpate ourselves for not believing them, upon the bare suspicion of a possibility that they may be false, is, instead of being an indication of freedom from shackles, and erectness and greatness of mind, a monstrous contradiction to the principles of common sense, and the universal practice of mankind.

SECT. IV.

CHAP. I.—From our Lord's last entry into Jerusalem to his ascension into heaven; containing the term of six weeks and five days.

THE HISTORY.

UPON our Lord's entry into Jerusalem with such a vast retinue of people, the citizens were alarmed, and began to inquire who this great person was? To which the multitude that accompanied him answered aloud, that it was Jesus, the prophet of Nazareth, a town in Galilee. Having therefore permitted his kingdom and divine authority to be thus proclaimed by others, he proceeded in the next place to exert it himself: for going to the temple, and there looking about him, he found the court of the Gentiles notoriously profaned and dishonoured by trading and merchandize. That therefore he might end, as he had begun his ministry, with the reformation of his Father's house, he drove out all the buyers and sellers, as he did three years before,^a from the sacred ground; he overthrew the tables of the money-changers,^b

^a It appears from Mark xi. 11. that Jesus did not do this on the day of his entry into Jerusalem, though it is there said that he entered into the temple and looked round the whole of it, but the day after; spending the night at Bethany, and returning to Jerusalem in the morning; and in the way thither working the miracle of the fig-tree. As Mark is so positive and particular in his account, and as Matthew does not expressly connect our Lord's driving out the traders with the events of the day, we ought, it should seem, to adopt Mark's account. To do which there cannot be a greater inducement than the consideration, that those who adopt the other hypothesis are compelled to suppose that the circumstances in question happened twice on two successive days. Nay, thrice; for our Lord had done much the same thing in the first year of his ministry (John ii. 14.) The reason why he did not then do it is suggested by the words of Mark, ὥσπας δὲ γυμνάσας, that is, because it being evening, the buyers and sellers had most of them retired. That it should then be evening was likely enough, considering the events of the day, which must have occupied a considerable time.—Bloomfield.—Ed.

^b These money-changers were not unlike our merchants or bankers who deal in bills of exchange, and either remit money to foreign parts, or answer such draughts, as, by their correspondents abroad, are made upon them. And considering that the Jews, how far soever they lived from it, were obliged to repair to Jerusalem, there to offer their sacrifices, and pay their half shekel for the use of the temple, (Ex. xxx. 13.) the institution of such dealers in money was highly necessary, that the Jews, in their several dispersions, who were to come up to Jerusalem to worship, paying their money to merchants at home, might have it to answer their occasions, safe from thieves, and and the stalls of those that sold doves; telling them that they had made the temple, which was deservedly called an 'house of prayer, a den of thieves.'^c And to let the people see that he had both commission and authority to act as he did, he cured in that instant many blind and lame persons that were brought to him into the temple.

The people indeed were filled with admiration at the sight of these things; but the chief priests and scribes, when they saw the miracles which he wrought, and heard from the trouble of carriage when they arrived at Jerusalem. Whether therefore the business of these money-changers was only to return money from distant parts, or to change foreign money into current coin, or larger money into less pieces, or perhaps to do all this, there was certainly nothing blame-worthy in the profession, had it not been for some intervening abuse. In like manner, it may be said of those who bought or sold cattle for sacrifices, since it would have been highly inconvenient for every worshipper who lived at a considerable distance to bring them up with them, such men were necessary in their way, as were likewise the sellers of doves, because every Israelite did not keep this kind of birds, and yet no one creature was so often required in sacrifice as they. Our Saviour therefore in this transaction must not be thought to blame all such traffic in general, but only to find fault with the people for having taken up an improper place for the exercise of their respective callings. And therefore, to let them know that it was not out of passion or any peevish resentment against them, but purely in obedience to a divine command that he made this reformation, he told them, that it was written, 'My house shall be called a house of prayer.' This is the character which the prophet Isaiah gives of it, (chap. lvi. 7.) and if it be a house appointed for prayer and other religious offices, then it is no proper place for 'the tables of money-changers, and the seats of those that sell doves,' who have the markets of Jerusalem and their own shops and houses to trade in.—Hammond's and Whitty's Annotations, and Surenhusii Conciliationes, in loca V. T. apud Matthæum.

^c This expression is thought by some to be an allusion to those gangs of robbers which at this time infested Judea, and used to hide themselves in holes and dens of the mountains, as appears from the history of Josephus in several places. But our Lord here plainly refers to that passage in Jeremiah, where the prophet introduces God complaining, 'Is this house, which is called by my name, become a den of robbers in your eyes? Behold, even I have seen it, saith the Lord,' (chap. vii. 11.) But how could the house of God become a den of robbers? How could such violence be committed in so sacred a place? St Jerome, in his commentary upon Mat. xxi. 12, 13., ascribes all this to the avarice of the priests, and gives us a lively description of the several artifices whereby they endeavoured to extort money. "In the temple of Jerusalem," says he, "the finest and most spacious of any in the whole world, whither Jews assembled almost from all countries, sacrifices of different kinds, some for the rich, and others for the poorer sort, were prescribed by the law; but because those who came from afar often wanted such sacrifices, the priests took the advantage to buy up all those beasts which were appointed for this purpose, and having sold them to those that wanted, received them at their hands back again. Because some who came to worship were so very poor that they had not money enough to purchase so much as the lesser sacrifices, which were birds; to remedy this inconvenience, the priests set up bankers in one of the courts of the temple, to lend them money upon security. But finding that they could not do this without transgressing the law, which forbade usury, they had recourse to another device, which was to appoint a kind of pawn-brokers, instead of bankers, that is, men who, for the advance of a small sum, took fruits, herbs, and other consumables, instead of use-money. Our Lord therefore having observed this way of traffic, which the priests had set up in his Father's house, not only expelled their agents, but arraigned them likewise for a pack of thieves; 'for he is a robber,' says the Father, 'who makes lucre of religion, and whose worship is not so much the veneration he has for God, as the opportunity of making his own interest and advantage.'"—Beausobre's Annotations, and Calmet's Commentary.

the acclamations of the children, who cried out in the temple, 'Hosanna to the son of David!' were greatly enraged, and discovered their anger by asking him, 'If he heard what they said?' But he silenced their question by showing them that what was so displeasing to them, did really fulfil the scriptures, particularly that passage in the psalmist where it is said, that ^a 'out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise.' This answer, however, did but enrage them the more, and put them upon seeking all occasions to destroy him, though their dread of the people, who heard him with the greatest eagerness and attention, was some check upon their malice.

The Jews were not the only persons who came up to Jerusalem at the passover; for many devout Greeks ^b used likewise to resort thither at that feast; and some of these, being desirous to have a sight of Christ, addressed themselves ^c to Philip, one of the apostles, and he, by the assistance of Andrew, had them introduced. Our Lord was at that time discoursing to the disciples of many things relating to his passion, and particularly, of ^a These words are cited from Ps. viii. 2., and seem to vary a little from the original, which is thus rendered, 'Out of the mouth of the very babes and sucklings thou hast ordained strength.' But when it is considered that the only strength which can proceed from the mouth of children must be praise, or words put in their mouths, to celebrate the praises of the Messiah, the phrase in the psalmist and in the evangelist must needs mean the same thing; and our Saviour in the application of it to the chief priests and scribes seems to insinuate,—that these acclamations of the children were not fortuitous, but by divine instinct, and for the fulfilling of an ancient prophecy; and that therefore their declaring him to be the Messiah, or the son of David, should be looked upon as a kind of call from heaven, to inform and instruct others in what they were to do.—Beausobre's Annotations, and Surenhusii Conciliat. ibid.

^b Who these Greeks were, the best of our commentators are not agreed. Some are of opinion, that they were mere Gentiles, who, either out of curiosity, namely, to see the magnificence of the temple, the solemnities of the feast, or the person of Jesus, of whose fame they had heard so much, or perhaps out of a principle of devotion, and to worship the God of Israel, might, at this time, resort to Jerusalem: for the pagan religion, which admitted a plurality of gods, restrained none from worshipping the gods of other nations, so long as they were not thereby tempted to abandon those of their own. Others imagine, that they were real Jews who being scattered in Grecian provinces, after the conquests which Alexander the Great, and his successors, made upon the Jews, still continued in these countries, but kept so close to their ancient religion, as to come in great numbers to Jerusalem, upon the return of every passover. These were generally called Hellenists; and that there was great plenty of them in several provinces of Asia, is manifest from St Peter's address of his first epistle to the strangers, as he calls them, who were scattered through Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia Minor, and Bithynia, (1 Pet. i. 1.) but the most general opinion is, that these Greeks were proselytes of the gate, who worshipped the God of heaven and earth, lived among the Jews, and conformed to their political laws, but would not engage in circumcision, or the observance of their ceremonies; and they came to Jerusalem, at this time, not because they were permitted to celebrate the feast along with the Jews, but because they were indulged the privilege to behold their solemnities, and to pay their adorations to the Creator of the universe, even while the Jews were in the height of their public worship, in the court of the Gentiles, as appears from the case of the eunuch of Queen Candace, Acts viii. 27.—Basnage's History of the Jews, b. v. c. 6; Calmel's Commentary; Poole's and Hammond's Annotations.

^c These Greeks, says Grotius, seem to have been Syro-Pheenicians, who dwelt perhaps about Tyre and Sidon, and so might easily be acquainted with the Galileans, with whom they had commerce, and with Philip of Bethsaida, to whom they made application for access to Christ.

the efficacy of his death, and what a powerful means it would prove to convert the world to his religion, more powerful indeed than his life could possibly be, even as corn, though it dies in the ground, ^d when sown, rises again with a vast abundance and increase. While he was thus discoursing of his death, he seemed, on a sudden, to be seized with a natural horror ^e of its approaching hour, and was going to request of God a reprieve from it; but then recollecting, that for this purpose it was that he came into the world, he changed his petition, and, with a resolved acquiescence in his good pleasure, desired of him, in what method he should think most proper, to glorify his name; whereupon he was answered by a voice from heaven, ^f which some of the company took for a clap of thunder, and others for an angel's speaking to him, 'that he had already glorified it, ^g and would glorify it again.'

This voice, he told them, was not so much for his information in the will of heaven, as it was for their conviction of his divine mission; and so he went on discoursing to them of his death, and the beneficial effects of it, until some of them, perceiving in what he said an inconsistency, as they thought, with some passages of scripture, told him, that they could not rightly comprehend what he meant by his death, since some prophecies ^h

^d Our Saviour's words upon this occasion are not amiss paraphrased in this manner,—'Look, as you see in your ordinary husbandry, the grains of wheat are first buried in the earth, and lose their form before they spring, and shoot up again, and bring forth fruit; so it must be with me. I must be first lifted up, before I shall draw men after me; I must first be crucified, before my gospel shall be preached to all nations, and all the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in; but when I am once dead, and have risen, then shall ye see this abundant fruit.'—Poole's Annotations.

^e The mention of his death, brought before him its approaching horrors; its pains; its darkness; its unparalleled woes: Jesus was full of acute sensibility, and his human nature shrunk from the scenes through which he was to pass, See Luke xxiii. 41—44.—Barnes on the Gospels.—Ed.

^f The only way of revelation which the Jews, since the Babylonish captivity, and the extinction of their prophets, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, pretend to, is that of Bath-Koll, or the daughter of a voice, so called, because it has some resemblance, though, as to distinctness, but an imperfect one, of that voice, which was uttered from the holy of holies, when the Lord spake to Moses, and, according to them, it is the will of God revealed in thunder from heaven; and therefore, though, upon this occasion, some of the company thought it thundered, and others, that an angel spake, yet neither of them were mistaken, because in this Bath-Koll there was always thunder joined with an articulate voice.—Hammond's Annotations.

^g I have glorified it, by causing my glory to be published and proclaimed in the world, by the preaching, and by the miracles which I have given in testimony of thy mission; and I will glorify it again, by thy resurrection and exaltation to the right-hand of glory, by the mission of the Holy Ghost upon thy apostles, and by their carrying the sound of the gospel even unto the ends of the earth.—Poole's and Whitby's Annotations.

^h The prophecies, from whence the Jews may be supposed to have drawn this conclusion, are, (2 Sam. vii. 16.) where God, by the mouth of Nathan, promises David, 'Thine house, and thy kingdom, shall be established for ever before thee; thy throne shall be established for ever.' In much the same words wherein he had sworn unto David himself, (Ps. lxxxix. 29.) 'His seed will I make to endure for ever, and his throne as the days of heaven.' To the same purpose they found the prophet Isaiah promising, (chap. ix. 7.) 'My servant David shall be their king for ever, and of his government there shall be no end.' But what seemed to express the matter in the clearest terms, was this passage in Daniel, (chap. vii. 13, 14.) 'And behold one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came had assured them that the Messiah was to live for ever. But to this objection he made no other reply, than that it well behoved them to make good use of his instructions for the short time they were to have them; and so he withdrew from them, as well perceiving that neither his divine discourses nor miraculous cures could gain the faith of any, except the populace; for though some of their rulers might believe in him, yet such was their timidity, that they durst not declare it openly, for fear of excommunication, and because 'they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God.'

Towards the evening, however, he returned again to the temple, ^a and exhorted the people to believe in him as a messenger sent from God to offer salvation to mankind; and in case that they persisted in their infidelity, he threatened them with divine vengeance in the last day, when the very gospel which he then preached to them, would rise up in judgment against them, and condemn them; and, with these words, he left the temple, and taking his apostles with him, returned to Bethany, where he lodged that night.

The next morning as he returned to Jerusalem, finding himself a little hungry, he went to a fig-tree that was in the way, in hopes of finding some fruit upon it: but when he found none, to signify his almighty power, he cursed the tree, ^b and so, proceeding to the temple, began again to clear it of all the traders that were got again into it; and there continued all the day long teaching and instructing the people. While he was doing this, the chief priests, scribes, and rulers of the people, knowing that he had no commission from the sanhedrim, ^c came, and demanded of him by what authority he proceeded in that manner; but instead of answering their question directly, he put another to them, namely, 'Whe-to the ancient days, &c., and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, &c.: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.' Thus the Jews wrongfully applied to the person of the Messiah, the things which related to his kingdom; but then they gave little or no heed to what the same prophets said of the body, wherein the Messiah was to suffer, and of his hands and feet which were to be pierced, (Ps. xxii. 16.—xi. 6. of 'his giving up his life a sacrifice for sin,' Is. liii. 12. and of his being 'cut off, but not for himself,' Dan. ix. 26. All which was not incompatible with his abiding for ever; seeing that, after his sufferings, he was to rise again, (Ps. xli. 10.) and enter into glory. (1 Pet. i. 11.) So that by comparing these things together they might have easily removed this scruple, especially when he had told them so often, and they so well remembered that he had told them, that, 'after three days, he would rise again.'—Whitby's and Beausobre's Annotations.

^a It is very probable that the priests, who had the advantage of letting these shops, and were therefore not so well pleased with the reformation which our Saviour had made, ordered the traders to reassume their places, promising to know of him by what authority he made these innovations.—Calmet's Commentary.

^c It is pretended by some that the person who preached in the temple was to have a licence from the sanhedrim, but that any might speak publicly in the synagogues without any such faculty; because we find our Saviour preaching in the latter, almost every sabbath day, without any molestation. However this be, it was certainly a vain question for the chief priests and rulers to ask our Lord, 'by whose authority he did those things,' after they had seen his miracles, and knew that he claimed his commission from God.—Calmet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

ther the baptism of John was of divine or only of human institution?' To say that it was of divine institution, would be to accuse themselves of impiety and incredulity; and to say that it was purely human, would be to provoke the people, who all looked upon him as a prophet, to stone them; and therefore in this dilemma they concluded that ignorance would be the best answer, and thereupon declared 'that they could not tell;' to which our Saviour rejoined, 'Neither is it necessary for me to give you an account of my commission and authority, since you seem to grant that a man may lawfully preach and baptize, and entertain disciples, as John did, without the appointment and permission of the sanhedrim.' And so he proceeded in several parables, such as the parable ¹ of the two sons, ² that ² of the wicked husbandmen, ³ and that ³ of the guests invited to the marriage

^d By the man in the parable is signified God, and by his two sons, the Jews and the Gentiles. The Jews are the second son; they promised to God a perfect obedience, and yet did nothing. The Gentiles are the other son, who at first refused to obey, and gave themselves up to idolatry and all manner of wickedness, but, upon the preaching of the gospel, repented; and after their conversion, applied themselves in earnest to do the will of God. The parable, according to our Lord's own interpretation of it, (Mat. xxi. 32.) is applicable likewise to two kinds of Jews—the scribes and Pharisees, who pretended to so much religion, and such mighty zeal for the performance of the law, when in reality they observed none of its weightier precepts; and the publicans and sinners, who, though at first they lived in practices quite abhorrent to the precepts of religion, yet, upon the preaching of John the Baptist, were several of them converted, and attending to the doctrine of Christ, and his apostles, in process of time, became obedient to their heavenly Father's will (ver. 31.)—Calmet's Commentary.—Scott and others consider this parable to refer to the profligate Jews, the publicans, and harlots, who were at length brought to repentance and became disciples of Jesus; and to the Pharisees, scribes, and priests, who were the greatest enemies of the gospel.—Ed.

^e For the explication of this parable we must observe,—that the householder here (Mat. xxi. 33.) is almighty God, and the vineyard is the Jewish people, considered in their spiritual capacity; that his planting and hedging it about, signifies his peculiar favour and providence, in communicating to them his will, and, by laws and ordinances peculiar to themselves, distinguishing them from all other nations to be his own people; that the wine press and tower, and other suitable conveniences, denote the temple and altar which he built among them, together with all those advantages and opportunities of serving him acceptably which he afforded them; that the husbandmen to whom this vineyard was let out were the priests and Levites, the doctors and rulers of that church and people, who are here represented as wanting in their duty, and negligent in cultivating the vineyard, or instructing the people committed to their charge; that the fruits are no other than returns of duty, proportioned to the advantages of knowing and performing it; that the servants sent to demand the fruits were the prophets, whom God from time to time commissioned to reprove, exhort, and quicken to their duty, both priests and people, by denunciations of vengeance, and promises of rewards; that the Son, whom he sent at last, was our blessed Saviour, whom the Jewish priests and rulers treated in no better manner than they had done the prophets of old, but, instead of reverencing him as the Son of God, and as he proved himself to be by divers manifestations of divine power, put him to a cruel and ignominious death: and therefore well might the Lord of the vineyard 'destroy these wicked men,' &c., as we find from the Jewish historian Josephus, as well as other writers, that God, for their great impiety, brought the Roman armies upon that nation, and by them burned their city and temple, destroyed and dispersed the people, and carried his gospel to the gentiles, 'to other husbandmen, who should render him the fruits in their seasons.' (ver. 41.)—Calmet's Commentary, Whitby's Annotations, and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iv.

feast,^a to upbraid them with their hypocrisy, cruelty, and contempt of religion, and for these to denounce the severe judgments of God against them.

The Pharisees, who had as great a share in the application of these parables as any other, went away much enraged, and with a firm resolution to find out some occasion against him. To this purpose, therefore, they sent some of their disciples, together with the Herodians,^b to propound this insidious question to him, c a The king in this parable represents God the Father; the Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, who is frequently described as the spouse of his church; and the marriage feast, the dispensation of the gospel. The guests, that were first invited to the feast, were the Jews; the servants sent forth to call them, were the prophets, John the Baptist, and the apostles; upon their refusal, the other guests brought in to supply their room, were the Gentiles; and the person who wanted the wedding garment, is an emblem of all those who profess and receive, but do not live up to, the principles of Christ's religion.—Calnet's Commentary, and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iii.—Anciently kings and princes were accustomed to make presents of changes of raiment to their friends and favourites, to refuse to receive which was an expression of highest contempt. (Gen. xlv. 22. 2 Kings x. 22. Esther vi. 8; viii. 15.) It was, of course, expected that such garments would be worn when they came into the presence of the benefactor. The garments worn on festival occasions were chiefly long white robes; and it was the custom of the person who made the feast to prepare such robes to be worn by the guests. This renders the conduct of this man more inexcusable. He came in his common ordinary dress, as he was taken from the highway; though he had not a garment of his own suitable for the occasion, yet one had been provided for him, if he had applied for it. His not doing it, was expressive of the highest disrespect for the king. This beautifully represents the conduct of the hypocrite in the church. A garment of salvation might be his, wrought by the hands of the Saviour, and dyed in his blood. But the hypocrite chooses the filthy rags of his own righteousness, and thus offers the highest contempt for that provided in the gospel. He is to blame: not for being invited; not for coming, if he would come, for he is freely invited; but for offering the highest contempt to the King of Zion, in presenting himself with all his filth and rags, and in refusing to be saved in the way provided in the gospel.—Barnes on the Gospels.—Ed.

b It is not certainly known who these were. It is probable that they took their name from Herod the Great—perhaps first a political party, and then distinguished for holding some of his peculiar opinions. Dr Prideaux thinks that those opinions referred to two things; the first respecting subjection to a foreign power. The law of Moses was, that 'a stranger should not be set over the Jews as a king. (Deut. xvii. 15.) Herod, who had received the kingdom of Judea by appointment of the Romans, held that the law of Moses referred only to a voluntary choice of a king, and did not refer to a necessary submission, where they had been overpowered by force. They supposed, therefore, that it was lawful in such cases to pay tribute to a foreign prince. This opinion was, however, extensively unpopular among the Jews, and particularly the Pharisees, who looked upon it as a violation of their law, and all the acts growing out of it as oppressive. Hence the difficulty of the question proposed by them. Whatever way he decided, they supposed he would be involved in difficulty. If he should say it was not lawful, the Herodians were ready to accuse him as being an enemy of Caesar; if he said it was lawful, the Pharisees were ready to accuse him to the people of holding an opinion extremely unpopular among them, and as being an enemy of their rights. The other opinion of Herod, which they seem to have followed, was, that when a people were subjugated by a foreign force, it was right to adopt the rites and customs of their religion. This was what was meant by the 'leaven of Herod;' (Mark viii. 15.) The Herodians and Sadducees seem on most questions to have been united.—Barnes on the Gospels.—Ed.

c The state of the question, truly taken, seems to be this,—The government of the Jews had fallen into the hands of the Maccabees, and, in succession, to one of them named Alexander. He had two sons, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, the younger of

'Whether it was lawful for them to pay tribute to Caesar, or not?' never doubting but that, which way soever he answered, his business was done: if in the affirmative, the multitude would detest him, as a betrayer of their ancient liberties; if in the negative, the Herodians would then accuse him as a rebel against the emperor Tiberius: but he, knowing their treacherous design, demanded a sight of the tribute-money, and when they acknowledged that the signature^d on it was Caesar's he sent them away quite confounded with this answer: e 'Render therefore unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God, the things that are God's.'

which made war upon the elder, and assumed to himself the government. Hyrcanus and his party being not able to resist him, called in the assistance of the Romans. Pompey, at their request, besieges Jerusalem, and had the gates surrendered to him by a faction within, that favoured Hyrcanus; but Aristobulus and his adherents fought it out, till at last they were vanquished and overpowered. The Romans put Hyrcanus in possession of the government; but, at the same time, obliged him to hold it by their favour and permission, which laid the foundation of great and lasting dissensions among the Jews, some submitting to the Roman power, as thinking they had a fair title both by conquest and surrender; while others objected, that the surrender was made by a party only, and not the whole body of the people: that it was not conquest, but treachery, which brought Jerusalem to their mercy; and, consequently, that they were usurpers, and Hyrcanus and his followers betrayers of their country. That which contributed not a little to make this controversy still greater, was that Josephus and Eusebius relate concerning Judas the Gaulonite. He, about the time of the taxation, in which, as St Luke says, our Saviour was born, disquieted the minds of many, and represented the decree of Augustus for that purpose as a mark of infamy and servitude not to be borne. This man is said to have instituted a particular sect, one of whose tenets was,—That no Jew ought to pay tribute, or to acknowledge any sovereign Lord, but God only; and that they were his peculiar people, and therefore bound to maintain their liberty, especially against prophane and uncircumcised pretenders, such as the Roman emperors were. So that the paying of tribute to Caesar was not, at this time, a question of mere curiosity, but a matter of moment with regard to practice; nor was it a point of bravery only, in the esteem of the Pharisees, and others of that party, but a scruple of conscience, and a debate of religion, whether this tribute should be paid or not.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iv.

d Every one knows, that the Roman emperors were wont to disperse their money through all the provinces belonging to their jurisdiction; that this money was stamped with the image or bust of the emperor on one side, and on the reverse, with some figure or other, representing victory, plenty, peace, or the like; and that this tribute, or capitation tax, which according to Ulpian, the males from fourteen, and the females from twelve years old, were obliged to pay, was usually collected in this money, and no other, as the only current coin at Rome.—Calnet's Commentary.

e Some interpreters are of opinion, that our Saviour's words do not determine Caesar's right to demand tribute: but since the Jews had now submitted to the Roman government, as they had formerly done to the Assyrian, which national submission, with promise of fidelity, having now obtained about an hundred years, was a just ground for Caesar's rights; since besides this, Caesar had indulged them in the exercise of their religion, and the enjoyment of their civil rights; had fought their battles, and protected them against the common enemy, the Arabians, and Parthians, and the like; since, more especially, it was a received maxim among the Jews, that wherever the money of any person was owned as the current coin of the kingdom, there the inhabitants acknowledged that person to be their lord and governor; and since the Jews accepted, and trafficked with Caesar's money, and held it current in all their payments, our Saviour's answer, 'Render therefore unto Caesar,' which is founded upon their own principles, must needs be deemed a positive declaration of Caesar's right to receive tribute, and such other acknowledgements as belonged to the state and dignity of the post wherein providence had placed him. It might indeed be objected, says

Upon the defeat given to these two parties, the Sadducees came to him with a question, and a difficulty, that they thought insurmountable. For, as they had no belief of a resurrection, they put a case to him of one woman, who, according to the direction of their law, had been married to seven brothers successively, and thereupon desired to know whose wife she was to be at the general resurrection? ^a In answer to which our Lord gave them to understand, that though marriage was necessary in this state, in order to raise up a posterity to mortal man, yet, that, after the resurrection, men would be immortal, and live like angels devoid of passions, and incapable of decay; and then proved the reality of the resurrection ^b from one of God's appellations in a book which themselves allowed to be canonical.

Grotius (Mat. xxii. 20.) that the Romans ruled over the Jews, and Cæsar over the Romans, in fact only, and without any right to do so; but Christ shows, that this objection signifies nothing to the matter in hand; for since peace cannot be secured without forces, nor forces had without pay, nor pay without taxes or tribute, it follows, that tribute ought to be paid to the person actually governing, so long as he continues to govern, in consideration of the common safety and protection, which are secured by the present possessor of the government, whoever the possessor be.—Whitby's Annotations, and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iv.

^a The discourse of the Sadducees was founded upon this mistake.—That if there would be a resurrection of bodies, there would necessarily follow a revival of the same relations likewise, and that the state of the world to come, would be like the state of this present world, in which, for the propagation and continuance of mankind, men and women marry, and are given in marriage; which gross notion of theirs our Saviour endeavours to rectify.—Poole's Annotations.—It would appear that the Pharisees though they believed in the resurrection entertained very erroneous notions respecting the condition of mankind in the future state. On this point there was much difference of opinion among the Jewish rabbins. Some maintaining that there is marrying in heaven; others that there is not. The general opinion was, that the dead would be raised either in their former or with other bodies. And it was the common notion, that the offices of the new bodies would be precisely the same with those of the former ones. The wiser few, however, were of quite another opinion. But of these some went into the other extreme—and maintained that the raised would have no bodies, (So Maimonides de Penit. viii. 3.) in the future state.—Bloomfield's Greek Testament, note to Mat. xxii. 30.—Ed.

^b The words which our Saviour produces in proof of the resurrection are those which God uses to Moses, 'I am the God of thy Father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob,' (Exod. iii. 6.) And the argument which is implied in them is this—That since to be the God of any one, is a federal expression, which denotes God to be a kind benefactor, who either doth or will do good to such persons as are in his favour, and under his protection; since God is not the God of the dead, and can have no regard or consideration for such as are mere nonentities, or so dead as never to return to life again; since, in this life, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, received no such signal kindnesses from the Almighty, as answer the emphatical expression of his being 'their God,' it must necessarily follow, that God, in declaring himself to be 'their God,' did solemnly engage himself to make them happy after this life, according to what the author to the Hebrews observes, 'wherefore God is not aslamed to be called their God; for he hath prepared for them a city,' (Heb. xi. 16.) This way of arguing was of great force against the Sadducees, who denied the immortality of the soul, as well as the resurrection of the body; and, at the same time, it fully proves the resurrection of the body: for since the souls of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were not the entire persons of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob which consisted of bodies as well as souls, it would from hence follow, that God could truly be their God, that is, their rewarder and bounteous benefactor, no other way than by a resurrection of their bodies, to be reunited to their proper souls.—Poole's and Beausobre's Annotations, and Tillotson's Sermons, vol. i.

The Pharisees, hearing that the Sadducees were silenced, began to rally again; and one of their doctors ^c in hopes to insnare our Saviour, in case he should prefer one part of the law above another, desired to know his opinion ^d 'which was to be accounted the greatest commandment of all?' Whereupon our Lord reduced the whole law to two general precepts of equal obligation to all mankind, 'the love of God above all things,' and the ^e 'love of our neighbour as ourselves;' in the former of which we obey the first, and in the latter, the second table of the law; ^f and with this answer the doctor was

^c The person whom we here render doctor, is, by St Matthew, (chap. xxii. 35.) called a lawyer, and by St Luke, (chap. xx. 39.) a scribe; but in this diversity of words there is no difference of sense: for the scribes were of two sorts, or had at least two offices; the one was, to sit in the chair of Moses, (Mat. xxiii. 2.) that is, to read and interpret the law of Moses to the people; the other, to expound to them the traditions which they pretended to have received from their forefathers. The name of scribe they seem to have derived from Ezra, about 500 years before, who is so frequently styled 'a scribe of the law of the Lord, who read in the book of the law, and expounded it,' (Ezra vii. 12. Neh. viii. 1. and xii. 36. &c.) And because the traditions which they taught, and obliged the people to observe, were called νόμους, or laws, they thence had the appellation of νόμικοι, or lawyers: and as some of the scribes were the persons appointed to copy out the Bible for such as had occasion for it, and to take care of the preservation of the purity of the text; so others employed themselves in taking the like pains about the traditions of the elders, and from thence, very likely, though they were all of the same order of men, they might have different denominations.—Whitby's Annotations, and the Introduction to Eachard's Ecclesiastical History.

^d This was a point that often was disputed by the Jewish doctors; some contending for the law of circumcision, others for that of sacrifices, and others for that of the phylacteries. And though it was a rule among them, that the law of the sabbath was to give place to that of circumcision, yet they were not agreed as to the rest, which was the principal and most important precept; only in general they were inclined to give the preference to the ceremonial part.—Dr Lightfoot remarks, (in his Hor. Heb. on Mark xii. 28.) that Christ answers the scribe out of a sentence which was written in the phylacteries, in which he avoided all occasion of offence, and plainly showed, as the scribe afterwards observes, (Mark xii. 33.) that the observance of the moral law was more acceptable to God than all the sacrifices they could offer to him.—Doddridge's Family Expositor.—Ed.

^e That by our neighbour here, we are to understand every other person who is capable of kindness from us, or stands in need of our help, is evident from our Saviour's determination in the case of the Jew and the good Samaritan; from the examples we are called upon to imitate in this affection, namely, the love of God and our blessed Saviour; and from these evangelical precepts, which extend this duty to all men; but by the 'loving our neighbour as ourselves, it is not required, either that we should love him from the same inward principles, which excite our affections to ourselves, or that we should love him to the same degree and proportion that we love ourselves; but only that we should make the affection which we bear to ourselves, the rule we are to follow in expressing our love to him; or, in other words, that we should love him in all the instances wherein we express our love to ourselves, though not in an equal measure.—Whitby's Annotations.

^f The words in the text are,—'On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets' (Mat. xxii. 40.) which are a metaphor taken from the custom mentioned by Tertullian, of hanging up their laws in a public place to be seen of all men; and import, that in them is contained all that the law and the prophets do require, in reference to our duty to God and man. For, though there be some precepts of temperance which we owe to ourselves, yet are they such as we may be moved to perform from the true love of God and of our neighbour. For the love of God will preserve us from all impatience, discontent, and evil lustings. It will make us watchful over ourselves to keep a good conscience, as being solicitous for our eternal welfare:

well pleased. When our Saviour had thus resolved all their questions, he, in his turn, at last put this one to them, namely, in what sense the Messiah could be David's son, when¹ David himself, by divine inspiration, 'called him his Lord?' But to this they could give no answer, because they were ignorant, that the Messiah, as God, was really the Lord of David; but as man, and descended from his family, he was his son: and after these disputes, which were the last he had with them, he went again, in the evening, with his disciples, to Bethany.

On the next morning, as our Lord was returning to Jerusalem the third time, the apostles, observing that the fig-tree, which he had cursed the day before,^a was withered away, and dead to the very root, took notice of it to him as a thing very strange and surprising; whereupon he exhorted them to have steadfast faith in God; fervency and perseverance in their prayers, and^b a forgiving temper to those that had offended them, in order to make their prayers accepted, and then they would not fail, in the course of their ministry, to perform as great or greater miracles^c than this.

When our Lord was come into the temple, he began to teach the people, as he had done the day before; and to raise an aversion in his disciples, and in all that heard him, to the principles, and practices of the scribes and Pharisees, he took the freedom to expose their vices without reserve, their pride, their hypocrisy, their covetousness, their hard heartedness to parents, impiety to God, and cruelty to his faithful servants; and, upon his

and the love of our neighbour will restrain us from all angry passions, such as envy, malice, and other perturbations, which arise against him; so that these two commands may be very justly called an abridgment or compendium of the whole Scripture.—Whitby's Annotations; and Cabnet's Commentary.

^a It is remarked of our blessed Saviour's miracles, that they were all works of mercy and beneficence; and that if any of them had a contrary tendency, they were always shown upon brute and inanimate creatures, and that too, not without a charitable intent of conveying some symbolical instruction to the spectators, as this withering of the fig-tree was to represent to the Jewish nation their approaching doom.—Beausobre's Annotations.

^b The command to forgive those that have offended us, before we pray, not only shows that no resentments of what our brother hath done should stick long upon our spirits, because they indispose us for that duty which we ought continually to be prepared for, but that there is likewise some kind of forgiveness to be exercised, even towards him that does not ask it, nor show any tokens of his repentance, namely, that we should not only free our minds from all desires of revenge, and so far forget the injury as not to upbraid him with it; but be inclined likewise to show him kindness, and ready to do him any good turn; for what the law required of a Jew to do to his enemy's beast, (Exod. xxiii. 4, 5.) that, without all controversy, the gospel requires of a Christian to do to his offending brother.—Whitby's Annotations.

^c It was a common saying among the Jews, when they were minded to commend any one of their doctors for his great dexterity in solving difficult questions, that such an one was a rooper up of mountains; and, in allusion to this adage, our Saviour tells his disciples, that 'if they had faith, they might say to a mountain, be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea, and it should be done,' (Mat. xxi. 21.) that is, that, in confirmation of the christian faith, they should be able to do the most difficult things. For, besides that our Saviour's words are not to be taken in a literal sense, they are likewise to be restrained to the age of miracles, and to the persons to whom they were spoken, namely, the apostles, and first propagators of the christian religion, because experience teaches us, that this is no ordinary and standing gift belonging to the church.—Whitby's Annotations.

mentioning this last particular, he broke out into the same pathetic exclamation against Jerusalem, for her murdering the prophets, and other messengers sent from God, that had been the matter of his frequent lamentations before.

Before he left the temple, he took notice how the people threw their money into the treasury,^d and among many, who offered very plentifully, observing a poor woman cast in her two mites, which amount to no more than a farthing, he called his apostles, and assured them, that that poor widow had been more liberal than any of the rest, because their oblations proceeded from their superfluity, but she from her indigence had given all she had.

In the afternoon, as they were returning to Bethany, his apostles took a view of the several buildings of the temple, and were making their remarks of the largeness of its stones,^e the richness of its ornaments,^f and the beauty and stateliness of the whole; when our Saviour acquainted them, that how glorious soever it might appear at present, it would not be long before the whole structure should be so entirely ruined, that there should be^g 'not so much as one stone be left upon another.'

^d The first institution of this treasury, we find in (2 Kings xii. 9.) where it is said, that 'Jehoiada the priest took a chest, and bored an hole in the lid of it, and set it beside the altar, on the right side, as one goeth into the house of the Lord, and the priests that kept the door, put therein all the money that was brought into the house.' This money was at that time given for the reparation of the temple, and, in after-ages, the money cast into the treasury, even in our Saviour's time, was designed, not only for the relief of the poor, but for sacred uses, and the adorning of the temple, which might occasion Josephus (in bello Jud. b. vi. c. 14.) to say, that the temple was built, not only with the bounty of Herod, but with the money contained in the holy treasury likewise, and with the tributes which were sent from all parts of the world.—Whitby's Annotations.

^e Josephus, who gives us a description of the temple built by Herod, tells us, among other things, that the 'whole fabric was made of durable white stones, some of which were five and twenty cubits long, eight in height, and twelve in breadth.'—Antiq. b. xv. c. 14.

^f These ornaments were the spoils which their kings had taken in war; the rich presents which foreign princes, upon certain occasions, had made, and the costly gifts, which the Jews, from all parts of the world, used to send to the temple at Jerusalem. These were called ἀναθήματα, because they were hung against the walls and the pillars of the temple, for the people to behold; and when Herod rebuilt it, he not only replaced all the former ornaments, but added several others, especially the spoils which he took in his war with the Arabians, and a vine of massy gold, of prodigious weight and value, which was his own free gift.—Joseph. Antiq. and Cabnet's Commentary.

^g This prophecy of our blessed Saviour was, in a great measure, accomplished about forty years after, when, as several Jewish authors tell us, Taurus, that is, Terentius Rufus, whom Titus left chief commander of the army in Judea, did with a plough share tear up the foundations of the temple, and thereby signally fulfilled the words of the prophet: 'Therefore shall Zion for your sakes be ploughed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the Lord as the high places of the forest,' (Micah iii. 12.) It can hardly be thought, however, but that, notwithstanding this demolition, there might probably be left one stone upon another; and therefore something more was wanting towards the literal completion of our Saviour's prophecy to which the emperor Julian in some measure contributed: for having given the Jews license to rebuild their temple at Jerusalem, they took away every stone of the old foundation to help to build their new edifice; but heaven prevented their design: for flashes of lightning, as our best historians tell us, burst out from the foundation they had dug, and so blasted, and terrified them, that they were forced to give over their enterprize, after they had

The general notion was, that this temple was to last¹ even until the end of the world. And therefore, when our Saviour had seated himself upon mount Olivet, in full view and prospect of it, his apostles desired to know, when this destruction would happen, and what would be the previous signs of it. The signs of it, he told them, would be the coming of many impostors,^a and false Christs, the rumours of wars,^b and famines,^c and pestilences, dreadful earthquakes,^d prodigies^e and amazing sights in the air, the persecution^f of Christians, and the propagation^g of the gospel all the world over: but that they might escape the calamity which would suddenly come upon their country, and utterly destroy^h the Jewish state and government, he advertised them, that, when-pulled up and removed all the remains of the old temple. Whitby's Annotations; and Calmet's Commentary; See Ammian. Marcell. b. xxiii. Socrat. b. iiii. c. 2.

^a Never were there so many impostors of this kind, as in the time a little before the destruction of Jerusalem, (Joseph. Antiq. b. xx. c. 6.) doubtless, because this was the age wherein the Jews, from the prophecy of Daniel, were taught to expect their Messiah. — Beausobre's Annotations.

^b Besides the war which the Jews waged with the Syrians, not long before the destruction of their city, (Joseph. Antiq. b. 2, c. 19.) the contests between Otho and Vitellius, and Vitellius and Vespasian at Rome, were much about the same time, and the oppression of the governors of Judea, who minded nothing but to enrich themselves, had so irritated the minds of the people, that, for some time before their final calamity, we read of nothing but rebellions and revolts, parties, and factions, and bands of robbers harassing and infesting the country. — Calmet's Commentary, and Beausobre's Annotations.

^c In the fourth year of Claudius, as Eusebius informs us, there happened a great famine, which oppressed all the Roman empire, but more especially Palestine where many perished, according to Josephus, for lack of food. (Antiq. b. xx. c. 3.) And the same historian informs us, that when one Niger was slain by the Jews, he imprecated famine and pestilence upon their cities which God accordingly inflicted. — On the Jewish War, b. iv. c. 23.

^d In the reigns of Claudius and Nero, there happened many earthquakes in Asia Minor, and the isles of the Archipelago, where the Jews inhabited, (Euseb. Chron. and Tacit. Annal. b. ii.) and Josephus acquaints us, that in the night, when the Idumæans encamped before Jerusalem, "there blew a dreadful tempest of wind and rain, accompanied with such terrible flashes of lightning, claps of thunder, and bellowing of earthquakes, as put all the people to their wits' end to think what these prodigies might portend." — On the Jewish War, b. iv. c. 7.

^e In his preface to the history of the wars of the Jews, Josephus undertakes to record the miseries and calamities which befel that nation, and the signs and prodigies which preceded their ruin. To this purpose he tells us, that, for a whole year together, a comet, in the figure of a sword, hung over the city, and pointed, as it were, directly down upon it; that there were seen in the clouds, armies in battle array, and chariots encompassing the country, and investing their cities; that, at the feast of the pass-over, in the middle of the night, a great light shone upon the temple and altar, as if it had been noon day; that, at the same feast, the great gate of the temple made all of massy brass, and which twenty men could hardly shut, opened of itself, though fastened with bolts and bars; that, at the feast of Pentecost soon after, when the priests went into the temple to officiate, they heard at first a kind of confused noise, and then a voice calling out earnestly, in articulate words, 'Let us be gone, let us be gone;' and that these prodigies were really so, we have the testimony of Tacitus, a Roman historian of that age, who has thus recounted them, "Prodigies happened, conflicting armies were seen rushing through the sky, along with the appearance of gleaming armour; and by a sudden ignition of the clouds, the temple itself seemed enveloped in flames. The doors of the most sacred places were dashed open, and a voice more than human was heard exclaiming, 'That the Gods were departed;' the voice of the earthquake was loud amid the crash of falling battlements." — Hist. b. v., and Joseph. on Jewish War, b. vii. c. 12.

began to spread, the Jews wrote letters to every part of the world against the professors of it, in order to raise persecutions against them. St Paul, before his conversion, 'breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of Christ,' (Acts ix. 1.) 'shut up many of them in prison, both men and women,' (Acts xxii. 4,—xxvi. 10. Himself, when converted, and Silas, were not only imprisoned, but beaten in the synagogue, (Acts xvi. 23.) as were likewise Peter and John, (Acts v. 18.) Stephen, the first martyr, was slain by the council, (Acts vii. 59.) James the Greater, by Herod, (Acts xii. 1.) and James the Less, by Ananus the high priest: multitudes of Christians were persecuted to death by Saul, (Acts xxii. 4.) by the Jews, as Justin Martyr testifies, and by the emperor Nero, as Tacitus relates, (Annal. b. xv.) For the professors of our most holy religion, before the principles of it came to be inquired into, were looked upon as the common enemies of mankind, insomuch, that whosoever killed them, thought that he did God service, (John xvi. 2.) — Whitby's Annotations, and Calmet's Commentary.

^g That before the dissolution of the Jewish state, the Christian religion had spread itself over all the parts of the then known world, we may reasonably conclude from the labours of St Paul, who alone carried the gospel through Judea, Syria, Arabia, Greece, Macedonia, Achaia, Asia Minor, Italy, &c. And if the other apostles, whose travels we are not so well acquainted with, did the like, there is no doubt to be made, but that 'their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world,' (Rom. x. 18.) St Peter addresses his first epistle to the elect that were in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia; and Clemens, who was his contemporary, and immediate successor in the see of Rome, in his epistle to the Corinthians, tells us, 'that the nations beyond the ocean were governed by the precepts of the Lord.' An event this, which he only could foretell, who, having all power in heaven and earth, was able to effect it. — Calmet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^h The words in the text are, 'Immediately after the tribulation of those days, shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heaven, shall be shaken,' (Matth. xxiv. 29.) That these words are not to be taken in a literal sense, is plain; because, that, after the sacking of Jerusalem by Vespasian's army, no such thing as here is mentioned happened to the sun, moon, or stars. The expressions therefore must be metaphorical, and do here denote, as they frequently do in the writings of the prophets and other authors, that entire destruction and utter desolation which it brought upon any nation. For in this language the prophet Isaiah speaks of the destruction of Babylon: 'The day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger, to lay the land desolate; and he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it; for the stars of heaven, and the constellations thereof, shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine,' (chap. xiii. 9.) which, according to Maimonides, are "proverbial expressions, importing the destruction and utter ruin of a nation, and of such persons more especially, who, for their state and dignity, might be compared to the sun, moon, and stars." (More Nevoch. b. ii.) And, accordingly, the sense of our Saviour's words must be, 'that, after the taking and destroying of Jerusalem, God's judgments shall still pursue the people, so that those who survived the ruin of their country, should be dispersed into different regions, sold for slaves, or reduced to a condition worse than slavery.' And so the event proved: for those who were carried to Rome served only to adorn the triumph of their conqueror: those that fled to Antioch for shelter, were cruelly massacred there: those that maintained the castle of Massada, rather than fall into the hands of the enemy, agreed to slay one another. Those that escaped to Thebes and Alexandria were brought back and tortured to death; and those of Cyrene, who joined a false prophet named Jonathan, were all cut to pieces by the Roman general. All this happened immediately after the taking of Jerusalem; and, without any farther search into their history, is enough to verify our Saviour's expression, that 'the sun was darkened, and the moon gave no light' upon that wretched people. (Joseph. War, b. vii. c. 24, &c.) ever they should see the city of Jerusalem invested with armies, and the temple polluted with abominations, they might then conclude that this desolation ^a was approaching, and that therefore it was high time for them to provide for their safety ^b by a quick retreat.

Of the precise time of its coming, however, no created being, as he told them, could certainly know; ^c and therefore it was incumbent upon them to keep themselves in a state of perpetual watchfulness, in a faithful discharge of their respective duties, and in a constant perseverance in prayer to God, all which he endeavoured to enforce with several parables; such as that of the faithful servant, whom his master at his return from a journey found employed in his proper business, when he of a contrary character was surprised in his riot and debaucheries, and accordingly punished: ^d that of the

^a The desolation which the Jews suffered in this last war with the Romans was so vastly great, that all history can scarce furnish us with an example of the like nature. The number of the slain was eleven hundred thousand; the number of prisoners was ninety-seven thousand. Those that were above seventeen were sent into Egypt to work in the mines; those that were under that age, were sold for slaves into different countries; and a great number of others were distributed in the Roman provinces, to be exposed to wild beasts on the theatre, and as gladiators, to kill one another, for the sport and diversion of the spectators: 'Until the cities were wasted without inhabitants, and the houses without a man, and the land was utterly desolate, and the Lord had removed men far away, and there was a great forsaking in the midst of the land,' as the prophet expresses it. (Is. vi. 11, 12. Joseph. War, b. vii. c. 17.)

^b Which accordingly they did: for when Cestius Gallus had besieged Jerusalem, and, without any visible cause, on a sudden raised the siege, the Christians that were in the city took this opportunity to make their escape to Pella in Perea, a mountainous country, and to other places under the government of king Agrippa, where they found safety. Thus punctually were all the predictions of our blessed Saviour fulfilled; so that whoever shall compare them, as Eusebius, in his Eccles. Hist. b. iii. c. 7, expresses it, with the account of Josephus concerning the war of the Jews, cannot but admire the wisdom of Christ, and own his predictions to be divine.—Hammond's and Whitby's Annotations.

^c The text in St Matthew (chap. xxiv. 36.) is, 'but of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only,' which Boothroyd renders as follows: 'but that day and hour none maketh known; no, not the angels of heaven, but the Father only;' and adds in a note, "Whether we refer this to the time when Jerusalem was to be destroyed, or to the day in which the heavens and earth shall pass away, it is attended with difficulties, especially as it is read Mark xiii. 32. where we have 'nor the Son,' &c. By regarding the rest as transitive with Macknight, the difficulties are removed, and a plain and easy sense arises. As to the very day and hour, it was granted to no one to make known, neither to the angels of heaven nor to the Son; but the Father only had reserved this time and season in his own power. (comp. Zech. xiv. 7.; Acts i. 7.)—Boothroyd.—En.

^d The punishment inflicted on the evil servant is said to be cutting asunder, (Mat. xxiv. 51.) in the same manner as Samuel used Agag, (1 Sam. xv. 33.) and David the Ammonites, (2 Sam. xii. 31.) and Nebuchadnezzar threatened the blasphemers of the true God. (Dan. iii. 29.) This punishment was, in old times, inflicted on those that were false to their creditors, rebels to their prince, or betrayers of their country.—Whitby's Annotations.—Many instances occur in ancient writers of this method of executing criminals; and from Dr Shaw and other modern travellers we learn that it is still in use among some nations, particularly the western Moors in Barbary (Shaw's Trav. vol. i. p. 456, 457.) It is thought to have come originally from Persia or Chaldea; and it certainly corresponds with the barbarous dispositions which those bitter and hasty nations too much indulged. Calmet informs us that not many years ago the Swiss executed this terrible punishment in the plain of wise and foolish virgins, who were differently prepared at the coming of the bridegroom: ^e and that of the talents intrusted with diligent and slothful servants. ^f And as this destruction of Jerusalem was no small emblem of the final consummation of all things, from hence he proceeds to describe ^g the manner of his com-

Grenelles, near Paris, on one of their own countrymen who had been guilty of a great crime. They put him into a coffin and sawed him at length, beginning at the head, as a piece of wood is sawn. Parisates the king of Persia caused Roxana to be sawn in two alive (Journey to Mequinez, p. 157.) According to Windus, the same dreadful punishment is often inflicted in Morocco, where the criminal is put between two boards, and sawn from the head downwards till the body fall in two pieces. The laws of the twelve tables, which the Romans borrowed from the Greeks, condemned certain malefactors to the punishment of the saw; but the execution of it was so rare, that, according to Aulus Gellius, none remembered to have seen it practised. But in the time of Caligula the emperor, many people of rank and fortune were condemned to be sawn in two through the middle. (Suetonius, b. iv. s. 26.)—Paxton's Illustrations, vol. iii. pp. 305, 306.—En.

^e The letter to understand the sense of this parable, we should do well to observe what the custom at marriages was to which our Saviour seems to allude. When the bridegroom was to bring home his bride, which was generally the conclusive ceremony, and done in the night time, the young women of the town to which she was to come, in order to do her honour, went to meet her with lighted lamps; she too, according to her quality and condition, had her companions and servants attending her, and some of the most beautiful ladies in the place from whence she came, going before her. Statius describes a marriage, whereat the nine muses appeared with their lamps: "The goddesses remove from Helicon, and shake the sacred fire in their nine lamps for the approaching nuptials." (Sylv. b. i.) And most of our modern travellers inform us, that among the eastern people, especially the Persians, this way of conducting the bride home, with lamps and lighted torches, still prevails. None need be told, that by the bridegroom we are to understand our Saviour Christ; by the bride his church; by the virgins, Christians in general; and by the oil in their lamps, the necessary qualifications of faith and good works.—Calmet's Commentary.

^f For an explication of this parable we may observe, that the man travelling into a far country, is our Saviour Christ, who, by ascending into heaven, has deprived the church of his corporeal presence; that his servants are Christians in general, or more particularly, his apostles and first ministers, who succeeded him in the propagation of the gospel; and that the talents committed to their management are the supernatural gifts which he bestowed upon them, and all the endowments both of body and mind, all the helps and means and opportunities which he gives us, in order to serve him, and to work out our own salvation.—Calmet's Commentary.

^g The reason of our Lord's mingling the signs of the particular destruction of Jerusalem, and of the general dissolution of the world together, was to engage us, at the approach of particular judgments upon cities and nations, to be always mindful and prepared for the general judgment of the last day. There is one thing, however, peculiar in his expression upon this occasion, namely, that 'this generation should not pass away, until all these things were done,' (Mark xiii. 30.) for if his words immediately foregoing related to the coming of the day of judgment, and general dissolution of all things, it will be hard to conceive how that great event should be said to come to pass before the extinction of the race of mankind then in being. But in answer to this, it may be observed, that the Jews were wont to divide the duration of the world into three grand epochs, which, according to their style, were called generations, each consisting of 2000 years; whereof the first was before the law, the second under the law, and the third under the gospel; and it is to the last of these generations, as they called them, that this latter part of our Lord's prophetic discourse does properly belong. A misconception of this expression indeed led some primitive Christians into a mistake concerning the approach of the final judgment; and as long as that mistake had no other tendency than to make

ing to the last and general judgment, when, surrounded with the refulgent rays of his majesty, and seated upon his bright throne of glory, with all the holy angels of heaven attending him, he should summon all the people that ever lived in the world, to appear before him; and having made inquisition into the discharge of the great duty of charity ^a should punish or reward mankind them more fervent, and zealous, and heavenly-minded, more patient and heroic under sufferings and persecutions, and more fervent and diligent in preaching the gospel, &c., the generality of the inspired writers might think this a sufficient reason to overlook it. But St Peter we find takes particular care to rectify the mistake and to obviate the objection, which a spirit of infidelity had taken occasion to raise from it, as we may see at large in 2 Pet. iii.—Universal Hist. b. ii. c. 11.

^a It may seem strange that in this representation of the judgment, the inquiry should be said to turn not upon the commission of crimes, but upon the performance of duties. The reason may be, that, generally speaking, men look upon the neglect of duties as a trivial affair, but dread the commission of crimes. And hence it comes to pass, that while they keep themselves clear of the latter, they are apt to find many excuses for the former. Wherefore, as there is not a more pernicious error respecting religion and morality than this, it was highly becoming the wisdom of Jesus to give such an account of the judgment as should be the most solemn caution possible against it. But since the inquiry is said to turn wholly upon the performance of duties, it may seem more strange still, that the offices of charity only are mentioned, and not a word spoken of any search made into men's conduct with regard to the duties of piety; notwithstanding the Judge himself, upon another occasion, declared such to be of greater importance than the duties of charity, that are so highly applauded in the parable. Nevertheless, to justify this part of the representation, let it be considered that piety and charity never can subsist separately: piety and its root, faith, always producing charity; and charity, wherever it subsists, necessarily presupposing piety. The connection between piety and charity will clearly appear, provided this dictate of reason and experience is attended to, namely, that no man can be truly benevolent and merciful, without loving those dispositions. If so, he must love benevolence in God, that is, must love God himself. I speak of those who believe there is a God, for piety, or the love of God, is nothing else but the regard we cherish towards God on account of his perfections. Piety and charity being thus essentially connected together, to examine men's conduct with respect to either of these graces was sufficient. In the parable the inquiry is represented as turning upon the duties of charity, perhaps because in this branch of goodness there is less room for self-deceit than in the other. Hypocrites, by showing much zeal in the externals of religion, oftentimes make specious pretensions to extraordinary piety, and uncommon heights of the love of God, while in the mean time they are altogether defective in charity; are covetous, unjust, rapacious, and proud, consequently really void of the love of God. The case is otherwise with the love of man. None can assume the appearance of this grace but by feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, relieving the distressed, and performing the other friendly offices of love. Charity therefore does not easily admit of self-deceit. It is true works of charity may, in some particular cases, proceed from other principles than the holy root of a pious benevolent disposition; such as from vanity, or even from views of interest. But then it must be remembered, that an ordinary hypocrisy will hardly engage men to undertake them. They are by far too weighty duties to be sustained by those hollow false principles which support bad men, and by that means are seldom counterfeited. For which cause, wherever a genuine, extensive, and permanent charity is found, we may safely conclude that there the love of God reigns in perfection. This parable therefore teaches us in the plainest manner, that pretensions to piety, however loud, will avail a man nothing at the bar of God, if he be deficient in works of charity. At the same time, taken in its true light, it gives no man reason to hope well either of himself or others, if they be wanting in their duty to God, and that although they should not only be charitable, but grateful also, and just, and temperate, and outwardly blameless in all their dealings with men. The reason is this, according as he finds that they have acquitted themselves in that respect.

As soon as our Lord had finished this prophetic discourse, he went in the evening to Bethany, and there supped at the house of one Simon, whom he had formerly cured of a leprosy. At supper, Mary, to testify her love and respect, came, and, out of an alabaster craise, poured a large quantity of such rich ointment upon his head as filled the whole house with its fragrant smell. This seeming prodigality raised the indignation of the rest of the apostles as well as Judas; and, as they made the same objection, so our Saviour's defence of Mary turns upon the same topics; only he adds, 'that as she had done a great and generous action, wheresoever his gospel should be preached through the whole world, there should her munificent regard to him be the duty we owe to God is no other than what is due to men in the like circumstances, and which if we neglected we should be unjust to them. It consists of dispositions and actions the same in kind, but different in degree, proportionable to the perfection of the object. He who loves and admires holiness, justice, goodness, and truth in men, cannot but love these perfections in God, that is, must love God. So likewise he that is truly grateful to an earthly benefactor, cannot be ungrateful to one from whose bounty all the good things he enjoys do flow. And since ingratitude in men consisteth in this, that the person obliged forgetteth the benefit he has received, never thinks of his benefactor, and is at no pains to make suitable returns; how can he acquit himself from the charge of ingratitude to God, who never thinks of God, nor of the favours that he hath received from him, hath no sense of the obligations he lieth under to him, and is not at the pains so much as to return him thanks, that is to say, wholly neglects the external and internal exercises of devotion. Since therefore the duty we owe to God is the same in kind with that which men claim from us in like circumstances; it is unquestionable that true morality never can exist where there is no piety; and that for one to pretend to morality who is destitute of piety, is altogether ridiculous. But if this parable gives persons no encouragement who are destitute of piety, although they should make a fair show of many moral virtues, it much less gives those any ground of hope, who not only are void of piety, but are faulty almost in every respect, unless it be that they have a lovely kind of tenderness and humanity in their disposition, which leads them on some occasions to do excellent acts of beneficence. For though there be nothing said of any inquiry made concerning the duties of justice, temperance, chastity, and fidelity, we are by no means on that account to fancy these virtues shall not be inquired after at the judgment, and rewarded wherever they are found. Or, that the contrary vices of falsehood, and fraud, and debauchery, shall not be taken notice of, and punished. Charity being the end of the commandment, so far as it respects our duty to men, is the higher branch, and therefore has for its supports justice, veracity, and the other social virtues. Moreover, being connected with temperance, elasticity, and self-government, it can never be without these attendant graces, the neglect of which is evidently a direct and gross breach of charity, or leadeth thereto. In a word, as among the vices, so among the virtues, there is a natural affinity and close connection. They are somehow absolutely essential and necessary to each other, and so can in no case subsist separately. For which reason, if any of them be wanting, much more if so capital a virtue as the love of God be wanting, it is a sure proof that our charity, our justice, our temperance, or whatever other grace we seem to have, is but the mimicry of these virtues, and not the virtues themselves. At the same time it cannot be denied, that the parable is formed so as to give us the highest idea of works of charity; they are demanded at the judgment as the fruit and perfection of all the virtues, and loudly applauded wherever they are found. On the other hand, hard-heartedness, cruelty, and uncharitableness are branded with the blackest mark of infamy, being the foundation on which the sentence of condemnation passed against the wicked is unalterably and eternally fixed.—Macknight's Harmony.—Ed.

When supper was ended, our Lord repaired to his usual lodgings at Martha's house: and, on the day following, in all probability, continued at Bethany, without going to Jerusalem, as he had done the days before. In the mean time the sanhedrim ^a assembled at the palace of Caiaphas, ^b the high priest, where the priests, scribes, and elders of the people had a solemn debate and consultation how they might take Jesus by some secret stratagem, and put him to death. This was the second council that they had held upon this occasion; and though therein it was determined that he should die, yet they thought it not so advisable to put the thing in execution in the time of the ensuing solemnity, lest it should cause a sedition among the people, who had the highest veneration for him. ^c

When evening was come, he, with his apostles, supped very probably, at Martha's house, and while they were at table, considering with himself that his time was now short, he was minded to give them a testimony of his love, and, from his own example, teach them two virtues which, of all others, were more especially requisite in their ministry of the gospel, humility and charity. To this purpose, rising from the table, laying aside his upper garment, and girding himself with a towel, ^d as the manner of servants then was when they waited on their masters, he poured water into a basin, and began to wash his apostles' feet, and to wipe them with the towel.

^a The consultation which the sanhedrim held, and the agreement which Judas made with them to betray our Lord, were on Wednesday; and therefore the church gives it as a reason why we ought to fast on Wednesday and Friday, because on the one Christ was betrayed, and suffered on the other.—Whitby's Annotations.

^b This Caiaphas is called by the Jewish historian Joseph. The high priesthood he purchased of Valerius Gratus: and after he had ten years enjoyed that dignity, was deposed by Vitellius, governor of Syria, and succeeded by Jonathan, the son of Ananus or Anas.—Cabnet's Dictionary and Commentary.

^c It, however, pleased God to defeat this intention, as it was proper that Christ, the true Paschal Lamb, should be sacrificed at that season; and that his death and resurrection should be rendered the more extensively known, "Maimonides saith, it was the custom among the Jews to punish those who rebelled against the sentence of the judge or the high priest, or were notoriously criminal, at one of the three feasts, because then only, by reason of the public congress of the people, all might hear and fear. (Deut. xvii. 12, 13.) From this received custom the fathers of the sanhedrim seem willing to recede, for fear of the multitude, but having so fair an offer made by Judas, they embrace that season.—Whitby.—God himself and not man appointed the time in which Christ should be crucified."—Beza.—Scott's Comment.—Ed.

^d The towel which was used to wipe the feet after washing was considered through all the east as a badge of servitude. Suetonius mentions it as a sure mark of the intolerable pride of Caligula, the Roman emperor, that when at supper he suffered senators of the highest rank, sometimes to stand by his couch, sometimes at his feet, girt with a towel. (chap. xxvi.) Hence it appears that this honour was a token of the deepest humiliation, which was not, however, absolutely degrading and inconsistent with all regard to decency. Yet our blessed Redeemer did not refuse to give his disciples and Judas Iscariot himself that wonderful proof of his love and humility. On the very night in which he was betrayed into the hands of his enemies, while his thoughts were intensely occupied with the glory which he had with his Father before the creation of the world, to which he knew well he was in a few days to return, triumphant over all his foes, he resolved to neglect no service which might Amazed at this condescension, St Peter, when he came to him, refused at first to admit of such a servile office from his heavenly master; but when he urged the necessity, and in some measure showed the symbolical intent of it, he permitted him to do just what he thought fit.

When our Lord had made an end of washing his apostles' feet, he put on his garment, and sat down at table again, and began to tell them the meaning of what he had done, namely, 'that since he, who was justly acknowledged to be their lord and master, had so far debased himself as to wash their feet, they, in imitation of his example, ought to think it no disparagement to them to perform the meanest offices of kindness and charity to one another: for though they were exalted to the dignity of his apostles, yet still they were but his servants; and that therefore it would be a high piece of arrogance in them to assume more state and grandeur than their master had done before them.'^e

Soon after this, reflecting with himself how well he had loved, and, upon all occasions, how kindly he had treated these his disciples, he was not a little concerned that any of them should prove so base and ungrateful as to betray him; and when he had declared the thing, and Peter desirous to know the person, beckoned to John, who was nearest his master, to ask him the question, he signified to him that it was Judas Iscariot, to whom he gave soften the heart of Judas, and confirm and encourage his other disciples in their duty; he condescended to stoop down and wash those feet which had followed him in many a long and fatiguing journey, giving his faithful followers in that significant action a pledge of the high honour which awaited them, and the pure and elevated joy which was to cheer their hearts in his service, and crown their labours after they had finished their appointed course. The example of humility which he set them on this occasion was absolutely incomparable: no instance ever occurred among the Jews of a lord or master washing the feet of his servants or disciples. Besides, the Son of God was not ignorant that the Father had committed all things into his hands; and that a name was soon to be given him, at which every knee should bow, and every tongue confess. Yet he did not hesitate to wash the feet of his own servants, proving by this very act, that he 'came not to be ministered unto, but to minister.' Nor did he humble himself to the hosts of heaven; but to sinful and miserable men, and even to his most atrocious betrayer. 'Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands, and that he was come from God and went to God; he riseth from supper, and laid aside his upper garments: and took a towel and girded himself. After that he poureth water into a basin, and began to wash the disciples' feet, and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded.' (John xiii. 3—5).—Parson's Illustrations, vol. iii. pp. 100, 101.—Ed.

^e That all this happened at Bethany whilst our Lord was with his apostles at supper in the house of Martha, seems to me very improbable. When he washed his apostles' feet no person appears to have been present but he and they; and he surely acted as master of the house, or at least of the supper, himself. Dr Hales is of opinion that it was after he had eaten with his disciples the paschal supper in Jerusalem, and immediately before he instituted his own supper, that he washed their feet, to give them a lesson of humility; and notwithstanding the powerful objections urged against that opinion by Whitby, I am strongly inclined to adopt it. The words πρὸ δὲ τῆς ἑσπέρης τοῦ πάσχα, which our translators render, 'Now before the feast of the pass-over,' do not mean days before it, but rather just before they were to enter on the celebration; and though it was not till the paschal supper, or at least the first course of it, was finished, (δὲ σπρου γενομένην) that our Lord girt himself with the towel, &c. it seems to have been just before he sat down to supper, that he resolved to exhibit this proof of his love to his own. a sop, as he told John he would, and when he had so done, ^a bade him go about what he had to do with all expedition; which the rest of the apostles, being ignorant of the signal which our Lord had given John, supposed to be an order to Judas, as he was the purse-bearer, either to give something to the poor, or to provide what was necessary for the feast.

As soon as supper was ended, Judas being now confirmed in his wicked resolution, left Bethany in haste; and understanding that the Sanhedrim was met at the high priest's house, thither he repaired, and upon their giving him a sufficient reward offered to betray his master, and, in the manner that they desired, to deliver him privately into their hands. This proposition was highly pleasing to the council, who immediately bargained with him for thirty pieces of silver; ^b and when Judas had received the money, from that moment he sought an opportunity to betray his Master in the absence of the multitude.

While Judas was thus bartering for his Master's blood, his Master was preparing the rest of his apostles for his departure, and endeavouring to comfort them with this consideration.—That his death would be a means to display both his own and his Father's glory, as it was a preliminary to his resurrection and ascension into heaven: As therefore it was decreed, that he must leave them, the stronger should their union be with one another; and therefore he recommended very earnestly to them the duty of mutual love, a duty which hitherto had been so much neglected, that his injoining it then might well be accounted a new commandment, and what was to be the common badge and character of his true disciples ^c for ever after.

^a This was not a command to Judas to go on with his wicked enterprise, but only a declaration made by Christ of his readiness to suffer death; "This is not a voice of commanding, but obeying; not of fear, but preparation for death," says Leo, on the Suffering, (ser. vii).—Calmel's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^b These pieces were staters or shekels of the sanctuary, thirty of which amounted to three pounds and fifteen shillings of our money, the usual price that was given for a man or a maid servant, (Exod. xxi. 32.) It is hardly supposable, that any of those pieces are, at this time, extant, though both at Rome and Paris there are pieces shown which are pretended to be the very same that were part of the price of the purchase of our Saviour's blood; but persons, well skilled in that art, assure us, that these pieces are only the ancient medals of Rhodes, on the one side stamped with a Coloss, which represents the sun, and on the other with a rose, which was the city arms, as we call it.—Eachard's Ecclesiastical History, b. i. c. 4, and Calmel's Commentary.

^c The disciples of the Baptist were known by the austerity of their lives, and the disciples of the Pharisees by their habit and separation from other men; but our blessed Saviour was willing to have his disciples known by their mutual love and affection to each other, which, in the primitive ages, was so great, that it made the heathens, with admiration, cry out, 'See how they love one another! and even hate and envy them for their mutual affection.'—Whitby's Annotations.

^d The words in St Matthew, xxvi. 17, are, 'the first day of the feast;' but it is no uncommon thing to put the word first for that which properly went before. Thus, in the Old Testament it is said, 'that the hands of the witnesses shall be first upon him,' that is condemned to die, 'to put him to death, and afterwards the hands of all the people,' (Deut. xvii. 7.) But if the hands of the witnesses should first despatch him, there would be no occasion for the hands of the people; and therefore the sense of the word first in this place must be, that the witnesses should come, our Lord sent Peter and John to Jerusalem to prepare all things according to the law; and lest they should want a convenient room for the celebration of the Paschal supper, he had predisposed the heart of a certain host in the city ^e to accommodate them with one. They therefore having provided a lamb, slain it in the temple, sprinkled its blood on the altar, and done every thing else that was required of them, returned to their Master at Bethany; who perceiving that his late discourse about leaving the world and them had blasted all their hopes of secular greatness, and left them melancholy and disconsolate, staid a good part of the day with them, in order to raise their drooping spirits with the assurances of an happy immortality, which, as he told them, he was going before ^f to prepare for them in heaven, and wanted not power to do it, because he and his Father, as to their divinity, were perfectly the same; and with the promise of sending them the Holy Spirit from above, which he took care to represent as a comforter, ^g to support them in their afflictions; as a teacher, to instruct them in all necessary truths; and as an advocate, to plead and defend their cause against their enemies. So that they had no reason to be dejected, because, in this sense, he would be always with them; because, whatever they asked in his name, his Father would give them; and because, when he was gone, they should be enabled to do miracles, ^h greater than what they had seen him do:

smite him before he was delivered into the hands of the people. In the first book of Maccabees, it is twice said of Alexander the Great that he reigned the first over Greece, (Chap. i. 1, and vi. 2,) but every one knows that before him there were several kings in Macedonia; and therefore the meaning of the words must be, that he reigned in Macedonia before he reigned in Asia; and to the same purpose in the New Testament, we find St Paul styling our Blessed Lord 'the first born of every creature,' (Col. i. 15,) that is, begotten of the Father before the production of any creature; and telling us, that 'the husbandman that labourereth must first partake of the fruits, (2 Tim. ii. 6,) that is, he must labour, before he can reap the fruits of his travel; and, in the like acceptation of the word, 'the first day of the feast' may be interpreted the day before the feast, as might be proved likewise by examples from Heathen authors.—Calmel's Commentary.

^e It is to be observed, that the houses in Jerusalem, at this time of the feast, were of common right to any that would eat the Passover in them, and yet it is not unlikely that our Lord might be well known to the master of this house, who, very probably, took it as an high honour that he had made choice of his rather than any other, to eat the Paschal supper in.—Whitby's Annotations, and Calmel's Commentary.

^f Our Saviour speaks thus in allusion to travellers, who send generally one of the company before to provide good accommodation for the rest.—Beausobre's Annotations.

^g The word παράκλητος, in this place, signifies both an advocate and a comforter; and the Holy Spirit, when he descended upon the apostles, did the part of an advocate, by confirming their testimony by signs and miracles, and various gifts imparted to them, and by pleading their cause before kings and rulers, and against all their adversaries, (Matth. x. 18, and Luke xxi. 1,) and he did the part of a comforter likewise, as he was sent for the consolation of the apostles, and all succeeding Christians, in all their troubles, filling their hearts with joy and gladness, and giving them an inward testimony of God's love to them together with an assurance of their future happiness, (Rom. viii. 15, 16).—Whitby's and Beausobre's Annotations.

^h What interpreters say of diseases healed by the shadow of Peter, and by napkins sent from St Paul, of more miracles performed throughout the world, and, for the space of three whole centuries, devils ejected every where, is not unfitly mentioned here as answering to our Saviour's words; and yet, we cannot but think that this should chiefly be referred to the wonderful and therefore 'peace I leave with you,' says he, taking his farewell, 'my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you ^a; let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid.'

As soon as he had ended his discourse, he arose, and, with his disciples, going towards Jerusalem, arrived at the place where they were to eat the Paschal lamb. In the evening when it grew dark, they sat down to the table in a leaning posture; ^b and, as he began to success of the gospel preached by the apostles, after the descent of the Holy Ghost upon them; to the gift of tongues, and the interpretation of them; of prophecy and discerning of spirits; and the imparting these gifts to others by baptism, and the imposition of the apostles' hands. For as this was a greater work in our Blessed Saviour to assist so many with his mighty power, when absent at so great a distance as the earth is from heaven, than to do miracles in their presence; so to communicate these gifts to men, and to enable them to transfer them to others, is, as Arnobius expresses it, "belonging to a power raised above all, and containing within it the cause of all things, and the seed of reason and philosophy," (b. i. p. 32,) and especially when our Lord succeeded so little in his three years' preaching here on earth, and had so few sincere disciples, that he should enable his apostles, at one sermon, to convert some thousands, and cause his gospel to fly like lightning through the world, and beat down all the strong holds of opposition, this is truly wonderful.—Whitby's Annotations.

^a That is, in empty wishes of what they neither do, nor can give; or that external peace, which is both temporary and uncertain; but inward peace of conscience, arising from the pardon of your sins, (Rom. v. 1,) from the sense of the favour of God, and of my presence with you by the Blessed Spirit; that peace, which no man taketh from you, which will keep your hearts in the faith, (Phil. i. 7,) and free you from all solicitude and fear of the world.—Whitby's Annotations.

^b At the first institution of the Paschal supper the Israelites were commanded to eat it in a standing posture and in haste, (Exod. xii. 11.) but here we find our Saviour and his apostles eating it lying down, or inclining on their left side, as it was then the manner of the Jews. When, or upon what account, this alteration came to be made, we have no other information than what we find in the writings of their Rabbins, namely, that they used this leaning posture as freemen do, in memory of their freedom. The custom of reclining was introduced from the nations of the east, and particularly from Persia, where it seems to have been adopted at a very early period; the Jews appear to have borrowed this custom from the Persians and Chaldeans, for we do not find that it was practised in the early part of their state. At the entertainments, the tables were constructed of three different parts, or separate tables, making but one in the whole. One was placed at the upper end cross ways, and the two others joined to its ends, one on each side, so as to leave an open space between, by which the attendants could readily wait at all the three. Round these tables were placed beds or couches, one to each table; each of these beds was called clinium; and three of these being united, to surround the three tables, made the triclinium. At the end of each clinium was a footstool, for the convenience of mounting up to it. These beds were formed of mattresses, and supported on frames of wood, often highly ornamented; the mattresses were covered with cloth or tapestry, according to the quality of the entertainer. At the splendid feast which Ahasuerus made for the nobles of his kingdom, beds of silver and gold were placed round the tables; according to a custom in the east of naming a thing from its principal ornament; these must have been couches profusely ornamented with the precious metals. To this day, the cushions in the hall of audience, and also in the room for receiving guests in private houses, are placed round the carpet in cases of gold and silver kincod, or of scarlet cloth embroidered: these are occasionally moved into the courts and gardens and placed under the canopy for the accommodation of company. (Esth. i. 5, 6, Forbes's Orient. Mem. vol. iii. p. 192.) Each guest inclined the superior part of his body upon his left arm, the lower part being stretched out at length, or a little bent; his head was raised up, and his back sometimes supported with pillows. If several persons lay upon the same bed, then the first lay on the uppermost part, with his legs stretched out behind the renew his discourse, 'that one in the company should certainly betray him, but that better it had been for the man who did so, if he had never been born,' the concern and sadness was so general, that every one began to inquire for himself, 'whether he was the man?' Until it came to Judas's turn, who, having the confidence to ask the same question, received a positive answer, 'that he was:' whereupon he soon withdrew ^c from his Master, and adjoined himself to his enemies, who were impatiently expecting the performance of his promise.

When the Paschal supper was ended, our Saviour proceeded to the institution of another, in commemoration of his own death and passion. For he took bread, and when he had blessed it, and broken it, he distributed it to his apostles, calling it 'his body,' and after he had so done he took the cup of wine, and having in like manner blessed it, he gave it among them, calling it his ^d 'blood of the new covenant,' and commanding them to do the same, that is, to eat bread and drink wine in this second person's back; the second person's head lay below the bosom of the former, his feet being placed behind the third person's back; and the rest in like manner: for though it was accounted mean or sordid at Rome to place more than three or four upon one bed, yet, as we are informed by Cicero, the Greeks used to crowd five, and often a greater number, into the same bed. Persons beloved commonly lay in the bosoms of those that loved them: the fact is thus attested by Juvenal:—"The supper is waiting, the new-married bride lies in the lap of her husband." (Sat. ii. 120.) And for the same reason, according to the well-known custom, the beloved disciple lay in the bosom of his Lord, at the celebration of the passover. The head of the second being opposite to the bosom of the first, if he wanted to speak to him, especially if the thing was to be secret, he was obliged to lean upon his bosom: thus the apostle John, wishing to speak secretly to his Lord, leaned from necessity upon his bosom. (John xiii. 23, Potter's Antiq. vol. ii. p. 377, Plin. Epist. iv. p. 22.) In conversation, those who spoke, raised themselves almost upright, supported by cushions. When they ate, they raised themselves on their elbow, and made use of the right hand; (Horace, Ode i. 27,) which is the reason our Lord mentions the hand of Judas in the singular number; 'He that dipeth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me.' (Mat. xxvi. 23.) Sometimes the Greeks and Romans used both hands, to which practice, the manus unctæ of Horace refers; (Epist. i. 16, 23,) but if the custom existed among the Jews, the right hand was commonly used; or at the time when our Lord made that declaration, he and his disciples were using only their right hands.—Paxton's Illustrations, vol. iii. p. 92—94.—Ed.

^c The question whether Judas partook of the Lord's Supper, or not, must be decided by the interpretation given to the second verse. If the supper was ended, when Jesus washed the feet of his disciples, Judas must have been present at the institution of the Lord's Supper: if the supper was then only prepared or begun, it is probable that Judas retired, before the Lord's Supper was appointed. Yet even in this supposition, much might be urged on the other side, and at least it is to us of little consequence. No discipline can exclude plausible hypocrites; and scriptural discipline would exclude openly immoral and ungodly persons, and infidels.—Scott's Commentary.—Ed.

^d The reason which our Saviour gives for our participating of the cup, namely, 'because it is the blood of the New Testament, which is shed for the remission of sins,' concerns the laity, as well as the priests, because his blood was equally shed for both; and therefore the command, 'drink ye all of this,' to which the reason is annexed, concerns them likewise. But there is another reason why our Lord said to his apostles, 'Eat this bread, and drink this cup,' namely, that by so doing, they might remember his death, his body broken, and his blood shed for them, says St Luke, and show it forth till his second coming, (1 Cor. xi. 26.) now this, as St Paul demonstrates, concerns all believers, as well as priests; and therefore the drinking of the cup, by which this commemoration is made, as well as eating of the bread, must equally concern them.—Whitby's Annotations.

After this institution of the form of that memorial, which his apostles and their posterity were to continue, he gave them to understand, that this was the last paschal supper which he should eat, and the last wine that he should drink with them, until ^a he drank it new in the kingdom of God: from which words some of his apostles inferring, that though his kingdom was not to be then, yet it would not fail to commence immediately after his resurrection, they fell into unseasonable contentions about priority, or who should have the office of the highest, trust and honour about their Master; which our Lord endeavoured to repress, by the same arguments that he had employed ¹ upon the like occasion. And then turning to Peter, he apprised him of the imminent danger which he and his brethren were in, and what a severe trial the great enemy of mankind would very speedily bring upon them; to whom Peter, in confidence of his own courage and resolution, answered for himself, that 'he was ready to go with him to prison, and to death:' but our Saviour, who best knew his weakness, gave him to understand, that ^b 'before the crowing of the cock he should deny him thrice.'

^a Some are of opinion, that by the kingdom of God here, as in several other places, we are not to understand heaven, or the happiness we are there to enjoy, but rather the gospel-state, and the kingdom of Christ, which began at his resurrection, and was more fully established, when he sat down at the right-hand of power, and was made heir of all things; and consequently, that our Lord's drinking of wine may then relate to his eating and drinking with his disciples after he arose from the dead, (Acts x. 41.) but because the felicities of heaven are frequently represented under the metaphors of eating and drinking, (Mat. xxvi. 29. Luke xxii. 18.) others make the sense of our Saviour's words to be this—'I will not henceforth drink of the fruit of the vine, but both you and I, in my Father's glory, shall be satisfied with rivers of pleasures, far sweeter, and more excellent, than the richest wines can be.' There is, however, a third way of interpreting this passage, which, by comparing it with the words of St Luke, seems by much the most probable, and that is, by making the 'fruit of the vine' signify, in a peculiar manner, the cup in the passover, or the 'cup of charity,' in the postecenium of the passover, wherein the sacrament of Christ's body and blood was founded. For that Christ was now to die, and neither before, nor after his resurrection, to eat any more passovers with his apostles, or any more to drink this cup of charity, now designed to a christian use, is sufficiently evident. It is observable, therefore, in St Luke, (chap. xxii. 16.) that the words are directly applied to the passover: 'I have desired to eat this passover, for I will no more eat of it;' and by repeating the cup, (ver. 18.) the evangelist must mean, 'the cup of the passover,' or the 'sacramental cup of charity,' which succeeded it; and consequently, our Saviour's meaning must be,—That he would no more use these typical adumbrations, being himself now ready to perform what was signified and expressed by them, that is, to pass suddenly from earth to heaven, through a Red sea of blood, and there to complete the mystery of the sacrament, by uniting his disciples one to another, and making them all partakers of his heavenly riches.—Whitby's, Poole's, and Hammond's Annotations.

^b It is commonly remarked by profane authors, that the cock usually crows twice in a night; once about midnight, and the second time at the fourth watch of the night, or much about the break of day: that this latter as being the louder and more observable, is that which is properly called ἀλεκτροφωνία, or cock-crowing; and that of this crowing of the cock the evangelists are to be understood, when they relate Christ's words thus, 'Before the cock crow, that is, before that time of the night which is emphatically so called, 'thou shalt deny me thrice,' appears from St Mark's saying, that the cock crow after his first

After this, our Lord, in his final exhortation to his apostles, reminded them of the choice which he had made of them, and the kind treatment which he had all along shown them; and that therefore it was their duty and their interest both, to adhere to him, as the branch did to the vine, in order to bring forth the fruits of righteousness, and to continue immovable in the profession of his religion, notwithstanding all the persecutions they should meet with, which indeed would prove so violent and outrageous, that some men would think they did God service in killing them. This however should not utterly deject them, because his absence from them would not be long. His death was but to usher in his resurrection and ascension; and the benefits which would accrue to them from these, namely, in the mission of the Holy Ghost to be their guide and comforter, in his own intercession for them at God's right hand, and in their prayers and supplications, which, if offered up in his name, would not fail of admittance to the throne of grace, would abundantly compensate the want of his presence: and ² 'therefore I have told you these things,' says he, 'that in me ye might have peace: In the world ye shall have tribulation; but ^c be of good cheer, I have overcome the world.' ^d

These comfortable exhortations to his apostles were attended with a solemn prayer and intercession to Almighty God; for himself, that as he had executed the commission for which he came into the world, he might denial of Christ, (chap. xiv. 68.) and crew the second time after his third denial, (ver. 72.)—Whitby's Annotations.—For a fuller explanation of the apparent discrepancy here taken notice of, see Parton's Illustrations, vol. ii. pp. 358. to 314.—Ed.

^c Though to be of good cheer under tribulation does by no means infer that firmness of mind, as some philosophers of old miscalled it, which preserves a man from being at all afflicted with calamities, or moved from his usual easiness of temper; yet thus much it certainly means,—That neither the sharpness of any affliction we feel, nor the terror of any we fear, should so far vanquish our reason and religion, as to drive us upon unlawful methods of declining the one or delivering ourselves from the other. We are to satisfy ourselves in the justice, the wisdom, and goodness of him, who orders all the events that befall us; to entertain them all with meekness, and much patience; to bring our will into subjection to the divine will; to rejoice in the testimony of a good conscience, and preserve it at any rate, though with the hazard, nay certain loss, of all our worldly advantages; and to set the supports and rewards of persecuted truth, and afflicted piety, in opposition to all the discouragements and pressures from abroad, and all the frailties of feeble and too yielding flesh and blood at home. Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iii.

^d By the world, in this passage, we are, no doubt, to understand the evil of the world, the wickedness, the malice, the temptations, the troubles, all that we have reason to fear, or to flee from, either in this or the next life. Now the wickedness of the world Christ has overcome, by expiating the sins of mankind in the sacrifice of himself upon the cross, and by the powerful assistance of his grace, enabling all the faithful to conquer the passions of corrupt nature. The malice of it he overcame, by disappointing the designs of the devil, and his wicked instruments, against himself and his gospel, making his own sufferings fatal to the contrivers, and saving to all penitent believers. The temptations of it he overcame, by that severe, but still social virtue, and heavenly piety, which shone so bright in all his conversation; and the troubles of it, by submitting to hunger and thirst, to poverty and grief, to live like the meanest, and to be treated like the worst of men. Nay, even death itself, our last and most dreaded enemy, he has overcome; taken from this strong man, the armour wherein he trusted, and divided his spoils.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iii.

be reinstated in the same glory which he had with his Father from all eternity; for his apostles, that they might live in brotherly love and unity, be preserved in all dangers, and sanctified in their minds and conversations; and for all succeeding christians, that they might continue in the communion of the saints here, and be admitted to the sight and participation of his glory and felicity hereafter: and, having concluded all with an hymn,^a which he and his apostles sung together, he left the city, and passing over the brook Cedron,^b came to a place called Gethsemane,^c where there was a garden, well known to Judas, because thither our Lord and his apostles used frequently to repair, both for retirement and devotion.

As they were going to this place, our Lord, with mighty concern, began to tell them, that that very night¹

^a This hymn is supposed by most interpreters to be part of the great Allelujah, which began at the 113th, and ended at the 118th Psalm, and, by the Jewish rituals, was ordered to be sung constantly at the paschal supper. Others think, that it was a different hymn, composed by Christ, and accommodated to the particular institution of the Eucharist; but Grotius is of opinion, that it was no other than that thanksgiving of his, which St John has recorded in the 17th chapter of his gospel. As our blessed Saviour however, in all his religious conduct, was no lover of innovations, it seems more probable, that, upon this occasion, he made use of the psalms that were then customary in the Jewish church, in which, as the Jews observe, are mentioned the sorrows of the Messiah and the resurrection of the dead.—Hovel's History, in the notes, and Calmet's Commentary.

^b Which in the Old Testament is called Kidron, and runs along the bottom of the valley of Jehoshaphat, which lies to the east between Jerusalem and Mount Olivet. Into this valley was conveyed the blood, poured out at the foot of the altar, which, as it discoloured the water, gave it the name of Cedron, as some think, from the word Keddar, which signifies blackness, though others rather imagine, that it had that name from the cedar-trees that were planted on each side of it.—Hell's Geography of the New Testament, part i. and Whitby's Alphabetical table.

^c Between the foot of the hill and the brook Kedron, proceeding from Jerusalem, is the garden of Gethsemane; an even piece of ground, according to Mr Maundrell, 57 yards square, and thickly planted with olive-trees of an ancient growth, and asserted to be the same which stood there in the time of our Lord, though of course with little probability; as, if the trees themselves could have lasted so long, Titus is said to have cut down all the wood about Jerusalem. Chateaubriand, however, states, that some of these very trees can unquestionably be traced to the time of the Eastern empire, and from the following circumstance: in Turkey, every olive-tree found standing by the Musselmans when they conquered Asia, pays one medine to the treasury; while each of those planted since the conquest, is taxed half its produce by the grand Seigneur. Now eight of these trees, very large and old, are still charged only eight medines. Dr Clarke found in this garden a grove of ancient olive-trees, of most immense size; which, as a spontaneous produce uninterruptedly resulting from the original growth of this part of the mountain, it is impossible to view with indifference; and adds, "It is truly a curious and an interesting fact, that, during a period of little more than 2000 years, Hebrews, Assyrians, Romans, Moslems, and Christians, have been successively in possession of the rocky mountains of Palestine, yet the olive still vindicates its paternal soil, and is found at this day upon the same spot which was called by the Hebrew writers 'mount Olivet,' and the mount of Olives, 11 centuries before the Christian era. In this garden is shown the place where our Saviour sweated blood as he pronounced the words, 'Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me.' A grotto has been erected on this spot, with the usual appendage of altars, &c. A few paces from hence is shown the place where Judas betrayed his Master with a kiss.—Mansford's Scripture Gazetteer, p. 346.—ED the prophecy^d of Zechariah, concerning the Shepherd's being smitten, and the whole flock dispersed, would be fulfilled in his and their persons, forasmuch as every one of them upon the distress that was going to befall him, would flee away from him and forsake him. This Peter thought a disparagement to his courage, and therefore assured our Lord, that 'though all mankind should forsake him, yet would not he;' and being told again, that he would certainly deny him before the time of cock-crowing, with the utmost vehemence he affirmed, that 'though he should die, he would not deny him; and the like profession of undaunted adherence made all the rest.

When they were come to the garden, our Lord ordered the rest of his apostles to tarry for him at a certain place, whilst himself, with the three that were most intimate with him, namely Peter, James, and John, retired a while to his private devotions; and as they were going along, he required them to join their prayers with his, that they might not be delivered over to temptation. But they were not gone above the distance of a stone's cast, before he found his spirits depressed, and his soul 'sadly sorrowful even unto death:' which when he had discovered to the three apostles, and desired them to watch with him a little in this trying and momentous juncture, he withdrew from them; and then throwing himself prostrate on the ground,^f begged of God, 'that, if it was possible, as all things were possible to him, he might be excused from drinking the bitter potion,^g whose black ^d The passage to which our Saviour alludes is this, 'Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, and against the man that is my fellow, saith the Lord of hosts. Smite the Shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered, and I will turn my hand upon the little ones,' (Zech. xiii. 7.) where we may observe, that our Saviour only cites the words in the middle of the verse, because indeed those that both preceded and followed them, were not at all to his purpose: and in this he imitated the ancient doctors of the Jewish church, who, in their allegations of Scripture passages, were wont to make use of no more than what was subservient to their argument. Some however imagine, because the words of Zechariah seem primarily to relate to an evil shepherd, to whom God threatens the sword, that Christ does not mention them as a prediction concerning him and his apostles, but only as a proverbial expression; but this I think is sufficiently confuted by our Lord's saying, 'for it is written,' (ver. 31.) Nor is the change of the person in the evangelist, from what occurs in the prophet of any moment, because it was very customary with the Jewish doctors, in their citations of Scripture, to make such alterations.—Surenhusii Concil. in loc. ex Vet. Test. apud Mat. and Whitby's Annotations.

^e We may be bold to affirm of this resolution, that it was as honest an one, that is, both as just in the matter, and as sincere in the intention, as ever was made by man, or ever shall be made to the end of the world; and yet this resolution miscarried, and ended only in the shame of the resolver. St Chrysostom takes notice of three faults that may be reckoned in it. 1st. The little consideration Peter had of our Saviour's predictions concerning his fall. 2dly. The preference which he gave himself above the rest of his brethren. And, 3dly. The presumption he placed in his own strength, instead of imploring ability of him, whence all human sufficiency is derived; and therefore the Son of God, says he, suffered him to fall, in order to cure his arrogance and vain confidence in himself.—Young's Sermons, vol. ii. and Chrysostom on Mat. hom. 83.

^g What we are to understand by the 'bitter potion' which our Lord here deprecates, we shall explain at large in our answer to the following objections, and need only here observe, that the afflictions which God sends on men or nations, are often in scripture expressed by the name of a cup, (Ezek. xxiii. 31, 32.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33. OR A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

ingredients filled him with horror and amazement; nevertheless in this he submitted himself entirely to his divine pleasure: and having prayed to this effect, he returned to his apostles, but finding them asleep, he awoke them, and, in a reproof full of love, reminded Peter more especially of his late promises, and present neglect of him, when he most of all stood in need of his comfort and assistance. He advised him therefore to keep himself awake, for fear of the temptations that were busy about him, and added this compassionate observation, that though 'the ^a spirit was willing,' and ready enough to make good resolutions, yet 'the flesh was weak,' and unable very often to put them in execution.

Thrice did our blessed Lord retire and pray in this manner; but, in the last time, his sense of God's indignation against the sins of mankind, and the dismal prospect of what he was to suffer in the expiation of them, made his prayer more vehement, and his agonies so violent, that the sweat, which fell from his body, was like large drops of blood; ^b and human nature must have Matth. xx. 23, Rev. xiv. 10,) and that this is a metaphor borrowed from an ancient custom of giving a cup full of poison, among heathen nations, to those that were condemned to die, and of gall on such occasions, among the Jews, to lessen the pain of the person that was to suffer.—Beausobre's Annotations, and Howell's History, in the notes.

^a These words of our Saviour are not intended as an excuse or mitigation of the apostles' sinful neglect of their master, but as a motive to their vigilance and prayer, and seem to imply thus much,—“You have all made large promises, that if you should die with me, you would not forsake me, and this you said really, and with a purpose so to do; yet let me tell you, when the temptation actually assaults; when fear, shame, and pain, the danger of punishment, and of death, are within view, and present to your sense, the weakness of the flesh will certainly prevail over these resolutions, if you use not the greatest vigilance, and do not pray with fervency for the divine assistance.—Whitby's Annotations.

^b In Luke xxii. 48, it is said, ‘and being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly, and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground.’ The word agony is taken from the anxiety, fear, effort, and strong emotion, of the wrestlers in the Greek games, about to engage in a mighty struggle. Here it denotes the extreme anguish of mind; the strong conflict produced between sinking human nature and the prospect of deep and overwhelming calamities. ‘Great drops of blood,’ (Luke xxii. 44.) The word here rendered great drops, does not mean drops gently falling on the ground, but rather thick and clammy masses of gore, pressed by inward agony through the skin, and mixing with the sweat, falling thus to the ground. It has been doubted, by some, whether the sacred writer meant to say that there was actually blood in this sweat, or only that the sweat was in the form of great drops. The natural meaning is, doubtless, that the blood was mingled with his sweat; that it fell profusely—falling masses of gore: that it was pressed out by his inward anguish; and that this was caused in some way in view of his approaching death. This effect of extreme sufferings—of mental anguish—has been known in several other instances. Aerial sweats have been mentioned by many writers as caused by extreme suffering. Dr Doddridge says (note on Luke xxii. 44.) that “Aristotle and Diodorus Siculus both mention bloody sweats, as attending some extraordinary agony of mind; and I find Loti, in his life of Pope Sextus V., and Sir John Chardin, in his history of Persia, mentioning a like phenomenon, to which Dr Jackson adds another from Tiuamee.” Various opinions have been given of the probable causes of these sorrows of the Saviour. Some have thought it was a strong shrinking from the manner of dying on the cross, or from an apprehension of being forsaken there by the Father; others that Satan was permitted in a peculiar manner to try him, and to fill his mind with horrors: having departed from him at the beginning of his ministry for a season (Luke iv. 12,) only to renew his temptations in a more dreadful manner now; and others been exhausted under it, had not an angel ^c from heaven been immediately sent to strengthen and support him. With this recruit he returned a third time to his apostles, but, finding them still in the same sleepy condition, he told them, that now they might sleep on as long as they pleased, because he had no further occasion for their assistance; that, however, it would not be improper for them to arise, because the traitor, who was to deliver him up to his enemies, was just at hand. Nor were the words well out of his mouth, before Judas, accompanied with ^d a band of soldiers, and officers, together with some of the chief priests, Pharisees, and elders of the people, all armed with swords and staves, ^e came to apprehend him.

To prevent all mistakes, the traitor had given them a sign, that the person whom he should kiss was the man they were to apprehend; and therefore approaching our Lord with an address of seeming civility, he saluted him, and, in return, received a reproof of his perfidy, ^f that these sufferings were sent upon him as the wrath of God manifested against sin: that God inflicted them directly upon him by his own hand, to show his abhorrence of the sins of men, for which he was about to die. Where the scriptures are silent about the cause, it does not become us confidently to express an opinion. We may suppose, perhaps, without presumption, that a part or all these things were combined to produce this awful suffering. There is no need of supposing that there was a single thing that produced it; but is rather probable that it was a rush of feeling from every quarter: his situation, his approaching death, the temptations of the enemy, and the awful sufferings on account of men's sins, and God's hatred of it about to be manifested in his own death: all coming upon his soul at once—sorrow flowing in from every quarter—the concentration of the sufferings of the atonement pouring together upon him, and filling him with unspeakable anguish.—Barnes.—Ed.

^c St Luke is the only evangelist that makes mention of this angelical attendance upon our Saviour in this time of his agony; and as there were several, both Latin and Greek copies, that, in St Jerom's, time wanted this part of history, Epiphanius imagines that this was a correction of some ignorant, though perhaps well meaning Christians, who being offended at the supposed weakness that appears in our Saviour upon this occasion, left it out of their copies, never considering that the divinity which dwelt in him had at this time subtracted its influence, so that, being left to his human nature only, he needed the comfort of an angel: otherwise, as with a word he made the whole band of soldiers fall to the ground, and with a touch healed the ear of Malchus, he even now gave sufficient indications of the divinity residing in him.—Whitby's Annotations, and Cabnet's Commentary.

^d At the time of the Passover, it was customary for the Roman president to send a whole band of a thousand men for a guard to the temple; and it seems to be some of these that came to apprehend our Saviour; because, by Judas' giving them a sign, whereby they might know him, it looks as if they were strangers to his person.—Whitby's Annotations, and Cabnet's Commentary.

^e It is probable, that Judas thought they could not do this, but that, as Jesus had at other times conveyed himself from the multitude, when they attempted to stone him, (John viii. 59.) and to cast him down a precipice, (Luke iv. 59.) so he would have done now; and that when he found he did not rescue himself, he repented, and went and hanged himself, (Mat. xxvii. 5).—Whitby's Annotations.

^f The reproof is expressed in these words: ‘Judas, betrayest thou the Son of Man with a kiss?’ (Luke xxii. 48.) Ist, To betray in this case was equivalent to murder. It was to deliver him into their hands, who, he knew, both from common rumour and his master's own words (Mat. xvi. 21.) had a design upon his life: and therefore this could not be done without express malice; but, 2dly, This betrayer was a servant; one who had given up his name and faith to our Lord, and done himself the honour at least, if not the benefit, to preach his gospel, and to work miracles in the power of his commission; and therefore,

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

but in such gentle and easy terms, as spake a mind perfectly calm and undisturbed; and then stepping forward with an air of majesty, our Lord demanded of the soldiers 'Whom they wanted?' They told him 'Jesus of Nazareth.' He replied that he was the person: but, when they were going to lay rude hands upon him, the impetuous rays of glory which darted from his divine face struck so fiercely upon their eyes, that they fell to the ground. However, instead of taking the advantage of their consternation to make his escape, as he had done at other times, he again demanded of them 'who it was they wanted?' And, when they again made him the same answer, he told them, 'that, if he was the person, he expected that his disciples should depart unmolested.

When the multitude began to lay hands on Jesus, some of his apostles, having swords ^a with them, asked their master if they might draw in his defence; but before they had his answer, Peter had drawn his sword, and in great fury struck at Malchus, one of the high priest's servants, with a design to cleave his head, though he happened only to cut off his right ear. Our Saviour however, rebuking his intemperate zeal, commanded him to put up his sword, ^b because he had no occasion for such an one to betray him, could not be done without great perfidiousness. 3dly, The person betrayed is called the 'Son of Man,' which is both the humblest and most obliging of our Saviour's titles, and implies that even to Judas himself he had always been a kind and gracious master, had treated him with the same respect, and given him the same advice and overtures that he had done to the rest of the twelve; and therefore to betray him was high ingratitude. 4thly, and lastly, To betray him with a kiss, which all the world had been used to interpret as a constant symbol either of love or homage, (both which his master had so well merited at his hands) and now to make this a signal of his treason, was to play a piece of the most gross hypocrisy. So severe is the accusation which our Lord brings against his abandoned apostle, though expressed in the mildest terms!—Young's Sermons, vol. ii.

^a Before our Saviour left the house where he supped, he had said to his apostles, 'He that has no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one.' (Luke xii. 36.) But that this is no command to them to buy swords, or to use them in the defence of their master, when he should be apprehended, is apparent from his saying that 'two swords were enough,' (ver. 38.) which certainly could never be sufficient to repel that band of armed men which he foreknew would come against him; and from his reprehending Peter for using one in this manner, (Mat. xxvi. 52.) which, if he intended his words to be understood literally, was no commendable thing. They therefore are only a moution to his apostles, that times were now become so perilous, that, if things were to be acted by human power, there would be more need for swords than ever: for such symbolical ways of expression were very common among the eastern people. Some annotators however have observed, that the reason why any swords, as we read but of two, were found in our Saviour's family, was, that thereby they might secure themselves from beasts of prey, which, in those parts, were very frequent and dangerous in the night time.—Whitby's Annotations, and Taylor's Life of Christ, part ii. s. 15.

^b Our Saviour's words to Peter are these, 'Put up thy sword into its place, for all that take the sword shall perish by the sword,' (Mat. xxvi. 52.) This passage is capable of different significations. 1st, They who resist by the sword the civil magistrate shall be punished; and it is dangerous, therefore, to oppose those who come with the authority of the civil ruler. 2d, These men, Jews and Romans, who have taken the sword against the innocent shall perish by the sword. God will take vengeance on them. But, 3d, The most satisfactory interpretation is that which regards it as a caution to Peter. Peter was rash. Alone, he had attacked the whole band. Jesus told him that his unseasonable and imprudent defence might be the occasion for any human aid, who had legions ^c of angels at his command; and then, having cured the man's ear with a touch, he turned about and expostulated with the soldiery the indignity of apprehending him in so scandalous a manner, as if he were a thief or some vile malefactor, when they had daily an opportunity of taking him in the temple. But, say what he would, it availed nothing. They immediately bound him, and led him away.

The apostles now seeing their master thus treated, lost all their courage, and, as he had foretold them, left him and betook themselves to flight. For such was the violence of the soldiers, that, seeing a young man ^d following the company, with nothing but a night-gown on, and supposing him to be one of our Lord's disciples, they laid hold on him; but he, by quitting his garment, slipped out of their hands, and fled away naked.

The company, thus carrying away Jesus, brought him first before Annas, ^e who was father-in-law to Caiaphas of his own destruction. In doing it, he would endanger his life, for they who took the sword perished by it. This was probably a proverb, denoting that they who engaged in wars commonly perished there.—Barnes.—Ed.

^c A legion in the Roman militia was a body of men consisting of six thousand, composed each of ten cohorts, as a cohort was of fifty maniples, and a manipule of fifteen men; so that twelve legions would amount to seventy thousand angels; but in this our Saviour means no more than a great number.—Calmet's Commentary.

^d Who this young man has been a matter of some dispute among the ancients. Epiphanes and St Jerome are of opinion that it was James the brother of our Lord; but upon our Lord's being apprehended, he, among the rest, forsook him and fled; and we hear nothing of his return. St Chrysostom, Ambrose, and Gregory have a strong imagination that it was John, the beloved apostle; but John, we read, was with Christ in the garden clothed, and cannot therefore easily conceive how he came to fly away naked. It seems most probable, therefore, that this young man might be no wise related to our Saviour, but hearing a noise in the garden, which might not be far distant from the house where he lodged in the village of Gethsemane, he arose and followed the company in his night-gown, as we have rendered it, in pure curiosity to see what was the matter, and that when the guards were for seizing him, he fled away naked, that is, with nothing but his shirt on; for so the expression may be understood.—Calmet's Commentary, Whitby's and Beausobre's Annotations.—Poecke observes, describing the dresses of the people of Egypt, that "it is almost a general custom among the Arab and Mohammedan natives of the country to wear a large blanket either white or brown, and in summer a blue and white cotton sheet, which the Christians constantly use in the country: putting one corner before, over the left shoulder, they bring it behind, and under the right arm, and so over their bodies, throwing it behind over the left shoulder, and so the right arm is left bare for action. When it is hot, and they are on horseback, they let it fall down on the saddle round them: and about Faiume, I particularly observed, that young people especially, and the poorer sort, had nothing on whatever but this blanket: and it is probable the young man was clothed in this manner, who followed our Saviour when he was taken, having a linen cloth east about his naked body; and when the young men laid hold on him, he left the linen cloth, and fled naked."—(Trav. vol. i. p. 190.)—Ed.
